Senator Roblin: It is not only the province of Alberta that is affected. The province of Manitoba is equally concerned with this issue. Sugar beet is very important to that province as well.

I am not aware of the statement of policy by the Government of Alberta in this regard, but it might represent a useful initiative to follow up.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to ask some further questions on this same subject. I am glad to see that my colleague from Alberta, where the other plant in the west is located, is asking questions as well.

The minister has said that no decision has been made by the government. I would like to point out that this matter was brought to the government's attention months ago. It is my understanding that B.C. Sugar, which is the parent company of the Alberta plant and the Manitoba plant, approached the government last November. The Sugar Beet Growers Association was here last fall and met with the government, at which time they pointed out what the problem was.

In February of this year there were news stories, including one in the Globe and Mail, about this problem, indicating again that pressure had been put on the government and that the plants had said that they could not issue contracts in the present situation. The situation is critical, because, in a matter of days, farmers have to start their planting. By the end of April they will be well into it. As my honourable friend knows, since he comes from Manitoba, by the middle of May the planting will be completed. They cannot proceed unless they have a contract. There are a whole lot of subsidiary problems involved in it. For example, there is the question of herbicides. There are special herbicides for the sugar beet crop. If there are no contracts issued, the people who bring in the herbicides cannot take a chance. So it is a critical situation, which must be resolved now. Both houses will adjourn, presumably, today and it is unlikely that the cabinet will meet next week. In the meantime, farmers are left in an intolerable situation. Can my honourable friend not get a decision from the government?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is not the problem that is in question, it is the solution. My friend is right in saying that this matter has been under consideration for some time, but it is not a problem that lends itself to an easy solution, particularly as it is one that, in my opinion, requires the co-operation of the provinces concerned. That is why I was interested to hear the report from the Province of Alberta. If the Province of Manitoba were equally forthcoming, I am sure it would help us to reach a speedy decision.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

TRADEMARK LEGISLATION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on February 5, 1985, I asked a question concerning the Trade Marks Act. I believe that the Leader of the Government received an answer which he did not consider to be satisfactory. My original question on this subject goes back to 1981. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he would keep bugging the department so that by the time the Senate returns following the Easter break we might have an answer to this important question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I always do my best to oblige my honourable friend.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-38, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Neiman will speak to this bill.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, Senator Frith has kindly yielded to me in continuing second reading of Bill C-38 to which I spoke briefly yesterday. I am happy to have the opportunity to put further questions to my learned friend, Senator Nurgitz. It is obvious that every member of the Senate understands and sympathizes with the government's concern that prompt action should be taken to plug the hole in our laws as they cover the importation of obscene and pornographic material. This hiatus was occasioned by the recent decision of the Federal Court of Appeal, in which a certain Tom Luscher was the appellant, and in which it struck down what had been the governing provisions in the Customs Tariff with respect to immoral and offensive material. I must say that Mr. Justice Hugessen's judgment is an important addition to the law which is beginning to accumulate on the application of section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and for that reason alone we must welcome it. However, it has left us with a dilemma with which the government wishes to deal promptly. On the other hand, I am not quite sure that the situation required the type of so-called stop-gap measures provided in Bill C-38, which called for the bill to be passed through all three stages in the House of Commons, and now in the Senate, and then to receive Royal Assent, all within a matter of two days. There are a number of important questions which must be addressed even in connection with such a short bill as this, because it addresses the much larger questions with which the government and, I believe, many people have been concerned over the past several years. One of these is the definition of obscenity, not only in publications but in films. Then there is the question of what constitutes child abuse, which has been well covered in the Badgley report. Now we are awaiting the Fraser report. The Minister of Justice has given an indication that as soon as he receives the Fraser report, which is expected within a matter of a couple of weeks, he will commence reviewing the relevant sections of the Criminal Code and certainly those sections which are specifically referred to in Bill C-38 and tied into the provisions of the Customs Tariff.

It would have been helpful if we had been given more time to review the bill and an opportunity to question the ministers who will have to make policy decisions in this area. I am afraid that some of the questions that occur to us today concerning the procedures that will have to be put into effect and the decisions that will have to be taken by persons, who, unfortunately, are probably not qualified to make decisions affecting the rights and freedoms of other people, will probably go unanswered. I am worried that the ordinary person is not going to be sufficiently protected. In an article in this morning's Toronto Star, Parliament receives a slight rap on the knuckles for proceeding with such unseemly haste on this bill. The article, which I am not of necessity supporting, goes on to point out that the customs officers who make the decisions with respect to the sections of the Customs Act struck down in the recent court decision are only required to have as formal education a high school diploma, and that they are required to spend only two or three days of their job training on dealing with potentially offensive material.

Senator Nurgitz has assured us that regulations and instructions will be prepared for customs officers. That is not good enough. I have looked up the sections of the Customs Tariff which deal with the procedures that are to be followed. It is obvious that what they call the line officers or the customs tariff officers who ordinarily work and deal with customs problems take the first decisions as to whether the material is obscene. They simply look at the material and then decide. The act provides that the recipient of the shipment of offensive material has 90 days to appeal the customs officer's decision. If he appeals the decision, it is sent on to a person who is termed a Dominion—which is a word I have not seen for some time—appraiser. That is the second stage of the process. Should the recipient lose his appeal to the Dominion appraiser, he has a further 90 days to appeal to the Deputy Minister of the Department of National Revenue. Obviously, that is what happened in the Tom Luscher case. I feel that these areas are neither sufficiently covered nor considered.

I am not sure whether we should put our questions to Senator Nurgitz now.

Senator Frith: We are going into Committee of the Whole.

Senator Neiman: Perhaps I will hold my questions until then.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Gigantès, did you want to take the floor on second reading?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, but I am not too clear as to what the situation is. If the debate on second reading is closed now, do we get a chance to speak again?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If you want to speak on second reading, I will let you speak.

Senator Doody: The honourable senator can speak in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should explain to Senator Gigantès and other honourable senators what is going to happen. This is the second reading debate on the principle of the bill, and under our rules if the sponsor of the bill speaks a second time he closes the debate on the principle of the bill. After the principle of the bill is accepted, if it is, we will be going into Committee of the Whole, when of course we can debate specific provisions of the bill, and we can ask the sponsor questions about them.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I call on Senator Nurgitz, and his speech will close the debate on second reading.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments. I am sure that several senators, including Senator Neiman, will have specific questions when we move into Committee of the Whole.

I appreciate Senator Neiman's sympathy with the purposes sought to be achieved by the bill. I want to point out, however, that it is well known that in the field of the commercial distribution of child pornography, for example, this stuff gets mailed into our country from other countries on a very regular basis. Since it cannot all be caught, those people who subscribe to it have little slips which they fill in to notify the distributor that a certain volume did not arrive. And the distributors are prepared to be persistent and to make every effort to get the material through, or as much of it as they can, knowing that it cannot all get caught.

In the current situation, as a result of the judgment in the case heard on March 14 by the Federal Court of Appeal, all of that material is getting through and there is no method whatever of stopping it. In addition, there are at ports of entry on any given business day, even with a restriction in place, almost 20 shipments daily, ranging from single magazines to truckloads, and this is on a regular basis. Therefore, when Senator Neiman raises the question of urgency, I say to you that there is, I believe, some urgency.

With respect to raising policy questions with ministers, I quite agree that it will be difficult in these particular circumstances to get that kind of policy. I think what we are being asked is to wait one year after the presentation of the Fraser report, commissioned by the previous government, and which will be out in a matter of weeks. Then the government will formulate a policy, and will give an opportunity for full consideration of a comprehensive bill to deal with this problem. That opportunity will arise, and I trust it will arise soon. As you see, this bill has a clause indicating that it expires on June 30, 1986.

With that, I will close the debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that this bill be now referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

● (1430)

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Heath Macquarrie in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to take into consideration Bill C-38, to amend the Customs Tariff.

According to our rules, senators in committee speak only from their place. However, I would ask the Senate to indulge the Chairman's wishes for a very practical reason, namely that we ask the sponsor of the bill, Senator Nurgitz, to take a place in the front row, the more readily to answer questions.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Only temporarily!

The Chairman: As Senator Flynn says, only temporarily. Shall consideration of the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall we now give consideration to clause 1?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Nurgitz would like to begin by dealing with the questions we raised yesterday and run through the problems raised as to definitions: Who is to decide whether the material is of a treasonable or seditious character; who is to deem that it is obscene and who is to decide if it constitutes hate propaganda?

Senator Nurgitz: In response to those particular questions, of which I certainly had notice yesterday when Senator Frith raised those matters with me: In clause 1(a) the words "of a treasonable or seditious character" constitute a continuation of the wording in the former Customs Tariff, 99201-1. Therefore, nothing has changed.

Senator Frith: How, then, did that function? Did the officer make the decision?

Senator Nurgitz: I am informed that there has never been an incident of a piece of treasonable or seditious material coming to the attention of a customs officer.

Senator Frith: Was the intent that it would be the customs officer who would make the decision?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. I intended to deal with the question that Senator Neiman raised yesterday, and again today, in terms of how that would operate. Perhaps now would be an appropriate moment.

The customs officer of questionable or unreasonable education is a person at the point of entry who only "has reason to believe" that the material is of such a nature and therefore only holds the material. I suppose one could consider that perhaps someone's rights are being affected by just the holding of the material. However, the final decision on whether it can or cannot pass is not made at that moment. The decision made at that time is simply a decision to hold the material and it then goes to what is known as a district office where there are various levels of officials within the Customs and Excise service.

As you have perhaps noticed in the British Columbia case, which has brought us here today, the deputy minister is named as the defendant in the suit. In fact, it does not even get to that level: under the act, the deputy minister has delegated the authority to an associate deputy minister who does, in fact, make ultimate decisions such as this.

Senator Frith: I suppose it is clear from the case that gave rise to this amendment to the act that those decisions are judicially reviewable by the Federal Court?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. Let me explain that. Under the statute, there is provision for appeal to the deputy minister. I suppose that some people would view an appeal to the deputy minister as being not much of an appeal, since he would stand behind his staff.

There is, in British Columbia and Ontario, an appeal to the County Courts, and in all other provinces where there is no County Court level, there is an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench.

There is provision for a further appeal from there to the Federal Court of Appeal, which is precisely the procedure which was followed in the British Columbia case with which we are dealing.

While I am on my feet, I can answer two questions raised by the Honourable Senator Frith yesterday regarding clause 1, subclauses (b) and (c). Those subclauses state:

(b) that are deemed to be obscene under subsection 159(8) of the Criminal Code; or

(c) that constitute hate propaganda within the meaning of subsection 281.3(8) of the Criminal Code.

The reason for the use of that language is that the Criminal Code uses those words. When one looks at the Criminal Code for a definition of "obscene," the reference in the Criminal Code is "material that is deemed to be obscene." When one refers to "hate propaganda," the wording of section 281.3(8) of the Criminal Code is "that constitutes hate propaganda." There is no other reason good or bad for the use of that language.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Neiman: Senator Nurgitz, to go back to the procedure sections again. Section 46.(1) of the Customs Act states, in part:

—a determination of the tariff classification or an appraisal . . . made at the time of their entry, is final and conclusive unless the importer, within ninety days of the date of entry, makes a written request in prescribed form . . . to a Dominion customs appraiser—

Subsection (2) states, in part:

A Dominion customs appraiser may re-determine the tariff classification—

So, he acts as the person to whom one can make an appeal.

The rest of that subsection states:

(a) in accordance with a request made pursuant to subsection (1), or

(b) in any other case where he deems it advisable, within two years of the date of entry.

I do not know if that is particularly applicable as long as the importer involved makes the written application for a review within the 90 days. Is that the relevant section?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am informed that the 90 days is the time within which one must appeal. Assuming an appeal is made, a decision must be made right away. There is not a two-year period allowed to the government to sit on it, if that is the concern.

The time limit for a person wishing to launch an appeal is 90 days. The decision must then be made.

Senator Neiman: Is the customs officer required to make his decision within a specific time?

Senator Nurgitz: I am informed that he must make it at the time the goods are brought forward for entry.

Senator Neiman: Almost immediately.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

• (1440)

Senator Neiman: I did want to get clarification of those three paragraphs of Bill C-38 because I do not know if there are any semantic nuances following from the differences in the wording of those paragraphs. I have no problem with paragraph (a) which reads "of a treasonable or seditious character" since we do not deal with that too often. But paragraph (b) uses the words "that are deemed to be obscene" while the wording of paragraph (c) is "that constitute . . .". There seems to be a difference there.

The Chairman: I believe that question was answered.

Senator Neiman: Then I will not pursue it.

To deal with the procedure part again—and I know that Senator Nurgitz cannot answer this for me—

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Neiman: Because it probably deals with a decision that would have to be made by the Minister of National Revenue. I am wondering why a separate section is not set up almost immediately at the point of entry at the primary level, when it is determined that certain shipments are coming through. For instance, if Time magazine or another magazine of that kind were coming across the border, the customs officials in general are not going to be too concerned, but I am sure that they can readily spot the kinds of material which probably require a careful second look. I am wondering why such materials that may be of a suspicious character are not relegated into a separate section entirely where the officials who make the primary decision have had some further training in determining what may be deemed obscene under our new sections or under the definition of material that might constitute hate propaganda. I assume that police officers who must prosecute these types of offences in other instances have been trained and given the appropriate instructions so that they can make a determination that would not lead the Toronto Star or other elements of the media to allege that they are uninformed.

Senator Nurgitz: The idea of taking the suspicious material and putting it aside is not new. In practice that is exactly what happens. About 80 per cent of the material enters at three entry points in the country.

Senator Guay: There are more entry points than that.

Senator Nurgitz: The entry points at which the most serious problems are encountered are Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. At those points this material is set aside by a customs officer initially and it is, in fact, examined by people of more expertise or with some training in the matter. Yesterday the question of guidelines was raised by Senator Neiman and I should like to mention that because there is going to be a different standard applied, regrettably not as strict a standard as we had before March 14 when the other section was struck down. The Minister of National Revenue has distributed to every point of entry a rather detailed set of guidelines which, of course, are not to be used or to be put into effect pending the outcome of proceedings like these today and those in the House of Commons. In the event of Royal Assent being given to this bill, they can be called to put them into place today in Vancouver.

Senator Neiman: I should point out perhaps that I noticed in yesterday's Hansard at one point you are quoted as saying that 4,000 shipments of obscene material were stopped in one year, and then on the next page you say that 4,000 shipments were stopped in a week.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, I noticed that. It must have been an awfully dirty week. That is clearly an error in the record. It should have been 4,000 shipments in a year.

Senator Neiman: I should now like to move to the definitions in Bill C-38, and in particular I refer to paragraph (b) which states:

that are deemed to be obscene under subsection 159(8) of the Criminal Code;

I know that there has been considerable study made about the definitions of obscenity, and there have been many differences of opinion. We will probably be dealing with that in more detail when the Minister of Justice makes amendments to the Criminal Code. However, subsection (8) on which this particular legislation will rely, states:

For the purposes of this Act, any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene.

In light of some of the comments of Mr. Justice Hugessen I have a question to raise, because this section seems to be disjunctive and there is one area that would constitute obscenity just with the undue exploitation of sex. Whereas it would appear that our modern judgments today are not too concerned with that element in itself, that it has to be, in fact, linked to some of the other elements that are listed, such as violence and pornography, I am wondering if, in pursuance of this legislation, the regulations are going to stress the fact that the two elements must be joined in some way which, I believe, is the recommendation that is being made, or are they going to follow precisely the wording of the section here?

Senator Nurgitz: I am not absolutely certain as to how it would be viewed, but perhaps I could give you an example. Child pornography could well be deemed to be obscene in itself without an accompanying piece of violence, or whatever the other elements were.

Senator Neiman: That was the other branch of my question because I was wondering how they are going to catch child pornography, as recommended in the Badgley report, under this definition. Would it have to be under that first section alone referring to undue exploitation of sex?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. The advice I am given is that it would be the undue exploitation of sex, or sex and crime, horror or violence.

Senator Neiman: Thank you.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am concerned about paragraph (a) which states "of a treasonable or seditious character." There have been many instances in the past where customs officers have notified the RCMP about the entry of material which the customs officer himself may have considered to be treasonable, seditious or subversive. The RCMP, tipped off by customs officers, had quite often gone to public service officials and accused public servants of being disloyal, subversive and seditious—on totally insufficient evidence, as it turned out in the end.

One of the instances involved a lady, a public servant, who worked at the National Arts Centre. She sat an examination to enter a government department and was successful. However, she was denied clearance on the grounds that she was, first, subversive, and, second, a regular recipient of communist publications. Her job at the National Arts Centre involved travelling frequently to iron curtain countries to book artistic acts for the NAC. It was the government who sent her there. She was refused security clearance.

Honourable senators, there was another instance where the John Birch Society sent some calumnies to the Canadian Intelligence Service. This is not an official agency; it is that group in Flesherton, Ontario—a hate literature disseminating factory. They were accusing a Canadian public servant of being disloyal. This material crossed the border. The customs officers notified the RCMP. The RCMP paid a visit to the employer of that particular public servant, who had to spend 11 years to have his name and those of his relatives finally cleared. Even though, three and a half years after the accusation, that particular public servant had received top secret clearance, he and his relatives still had problems on the ground that there is no smoke without fire.

In the act which was passed last year, establishing the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, people have some protection against this. This is not a partisan issue; everyone on both sides of the house would like this kind of nonsense to be avoided. However, in talking to some people who are cognizant of these facts, what seems to be happening is that somebody involved with security tells a senior public servant, "Don't make a fuss about this, but don't refuse to promote this person on the ground that this person is not trustworthy; find some other reason."

Is there anything we can do to prevent this sort of co-operation stemming from insufficient sophistication, insufficient generosity and insufficient awareness on the part of customs officers in collaboration with RCMP officers, who have the same defects, which can harm the reputation of innocent Canadians?

A former deputy minister told me that, during his tenure, he had 40 cases of senior public servants who were falsely accused by the RCMP of such things as receiving scholarly Soviet publications which it was their job to follow and read so as to be able to analyze Soviet policy.

What can be found in this bill which will provide some protection to innocent and loyal Canadians who find themselves in a squeeze play between an uninformed customs officer talking to an unsophisticated security officer and then find their reputation has been besmirched?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am not unsympathetic to the kind of problem raised by Senator Gigantès, but he raises a problem that is, indeed, a public service and/or a security and/or a police problem.

I can assure the honourable senator that in the past, roughly, 30 years, never has there been one piece or one item held up or examined for treason or sedition.

However, there may well be situations where police officers or others, supposedly in intelligence work, would use the legitimate receipt of that kind of material for other purposes. However, when that material goes through the mail without being questioned, that is your assurance that at least the customs and excise people are not looking upon it as being other than what it is, that is, a piece of academic work.

For the purposes of this bill, and in dealing with these matters, this is not a problem.

As I say, honourable senators, I am not unsympathetic to Senator Gigantès' position, but I do not know where he should be referred to. These are other matters to be dealt with in other legislation.

Senator Gigantès: I thank Senator Nurgitz for his explanation. What worries me is that while this material may not be stopped—and perhaps it should be—the fact that an accusation is made by a hate merchant abroad and is then transmitted by a customs officer to a security officer is, in many ways, worse than the material being stopped in the mail. The particular recipient, I am sure, would rather not receive the magazine than be subjected to calumny.

I would like some assurance that the government will consider this with a view to ensuring that these disagreeable, dangerous episodes that have occurred in the past will not continue to be repeated.

Senator Nurgitz: I will see to it that the inquiry goes forward.

Senator Neiman: I wonder whether Senator Nurgitz is aware of any instances when material has been stopped or attempted to be stopped under the general heading of what now constitutes hate propaganda in the section of the bill now before us.

Under the present law, there is a list of prohibitions on what is set out as treasonable, seditious, immoral and indecent types of material.

Why are we now being asked to add this section to the act when it is difficult to interpret?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, that is a good question. Under the former Customs Tariff, which was just mentioned by Senator Neiman, it was considered broad enough to include what we generally refer to as "hate literature." I am sure we all understand what is meant by that expression.

[Senator Gigantès.]

We do know that since March 14 some material that otherwise would not have gone through, has cleared customs. There not being an effective prohibition in place, people have demanded that material and have received it or are about to receive it. This bill is intended to put a stop to the same kind of material that they were attempting to stop before.

Senator Neiman: My concern relates to the probable difficulty of prosecution under that section.

The first branch of the definition of hate propaganda, which refers to genocide, is fairly straightforward, but the second branch, which specifies a communication by any person which would be an offence under section 281(2) of the Criminal Code, is not only difficult to interpret but it may cause problems in terms of bringing about a successful prosecution. Part of the definition under section 281(2) states that proof must be offered or accepted that "the communication incites hatred against any identifiable group." That part may, very easily, be self-evident. However, the section goes on to state "where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace."

When that happens with written material that is distributed in many different areas across Canada, I question whether a successful prosecution could ever be maintained.

Senator Nurgitz: First, I should point out that here we are not dealing with a prosecution; rather, we are dealing with something that would give customs officials reasonable and probable grounds to withhold material. Prosecution is quite a separate matter.

Senator Frith: Something which would allow the officials to stop the material at the border.

Senator Nurgitz: To stop it at the border, yes. You and I could go off into a corner and produce a domestic variety right here, and that could be made an offence under the Criminal Code. Here we are dealing with point of entry only and something which points to some degree of certainty.

If one looks at the Luscher case, the argument of the court is that the tariff item should be struck down because of its vagueness and uncertainty.

I should also point out to Senator Neiman that the reference in section 281.3(8) is to all of section 281.2, which includes the offence of wilfully promoting hatred in 281.2(2).

Senator Neiman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION

MOTION TO URGE GOVERNMENT TO SET ASIDE SPECIAL WEEK—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 28, 1985, moved:

That the Senate urge the Government to declare a special week for soil conservation in 1985 and every year thereafter;

That it be called National Soil Conservation Week;

That it be declared for the week May 12-19 in 1985, in conjunction with the Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week; and

That it be declared at a suitable period in subsequent years.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall only keep you for a few minutes. I hope that after I speak to the motion you will see fit to pass it. I believe it is somewhat of a formality, although there may be other opinions relating to that formality. First, I would like to thank honourable senators who spoke in the debate on the Report of the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee entitled "Soil at Risk—Canada's Eroding Future." The subject matter of that report has been referred back to the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee. We decided to wait until that report was referred back to committee before bringing this motion forward. I hope the report will come before this chamber again to allow other people the opportunity to discuss the issue and to keep the issue alive as long as possible.

Now that the report has been referred back to committee, we can pursue the recommendations in it. One of those recommendations is manifested in this motion. I would point out that the report was presented to this house last fall. Recommendation No. 17 asks that the federal government declare a National Soil Conservation Week to ensure that soil conservation becomes and remains an important national issue.

Soil is perhaps the basic resource of Canada and the foundation of our renewable resource industries. Soil degradation is a serious problem in all regions of Canada and one which threatens the future of the prosperity of all Canadians. A major commitment to conserving the soil is necessary by all Canadians and by all levels of government. The public focusing of efforts and activities would greatly assist in promoting awareness and commitment to this subject. Of course, one such way is to declare a National Soil Conservation Week. The motion recommends that it be the week of May 12 to 19. I would point out that it is only a recommendation to the government. If the government decides not to follow the recommendation or to designate a week other than the one I have suggested, that is their decision. I chose that particular week because, as the motion indicates, it coincides with Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week and also with American Conservation Week. If they occurred simultaneously, the message of soil conservation could be more easily spread to all people.

Of course, unless what the motion recommends is adopted by the government shortly, we may not be able to have it on the week I propose. I point out again that the reason the motion is being presented at this late date is that we were awaiting the return of the report to committee. So, considering that we are adjourning for a couple of weeks, we are under somewhat of a time constraint. I appeal to all honourable senators to accept the motion, which is basically a motherhood motion. The issue of soil degradation is very crucial throughout this country. We are losing millions of acres of valuable topsoil and good land, and every day we lose in promoting the issue of soil conservation is extremely important. I hope that the motion will be discussed today and passed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if nobody else wishes to speak to the motion at this time, I would like to move the adjournment. I appreciate the comments of Senator Sparrow and I realize the importance of the issue. However, I think we on the government side would be remiss if we did not take the opportunity to add to this debate. I would hate to read Hansard six months from now and have it appear that we thought so little of this subject that we allowed it to pass without comment.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

CAROLE LEMAY—TRIBUTE ON COMPLETION OF TERM AS PAGE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I want to inform you that our good friend, Carole Lemay, is serving her last day as a Senate page after three and a half years of service. On your behalf I want to thank Carole for her loyal, efficient and faithful service.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I would also like to take this opportunity to wish all honourable senators a happy Easter.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 23, 1985 at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION DISSOLUTION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-43, to dissolve the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REVISED SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's seventh report approving the budget of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

He said: Honourable senators, inadvertently there was an error in the report pertaining to the description of the committee's order of reference. That is why I am now tabling the revised seventh report.

(For text of report see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. During the campaign last summer and prior to that, the Prime Minister had agreed that women's involvement in the economy was crucial to the future of this country, and that this applied especially to the role of women in key economic positions. A number of women have, in fact, been appointed to boards and commissions and we are very glad to see this, but we have been awaiting the appointment of women to key economic positions under this government.

Now we find that, far from appointing women to key economic positions, this government has fired one of Canada's most competent women. I am referring to Betty Hewes, the chairman of the board of CN. My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Why was she fired? Did the government find her work unsatisfactory? Did they find her incompetent? On what grounds has she been displaced by a non-woman at at least twice the price? This, of course, is very destructive to the board in general and it is a very discouraging example to the rest of us.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think it would be appropriate for me to undertake to provide an answer to my honourable friend's question as to why this change was made. If I were to do so, it would serve as a precedent for questions relating to all positions that are filled by Order in Council and I think it would be an invidious one to establish. Therefore, I am afraid I am not able to answer the question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Just as a supplementary to that, are we now being given to understand that we will get no answers to questions about appointments made by Order in Council?

Senator Roblin: No. It means that I will have to examine each question on its merits.

Senator Frith: Is there a particular lack of merit in this question, then? Why can the Leader of the Government not take this question as notice and undertake to try to give us an answer?

Senator Roblin: I do not think it would be appropriate in the circumstances.

Senator Frith: What makes it inappropriate?

Senator Roblin: I am afraid that my honourable friend will just have to accept my statement that I intend to make no further answer to this question. It is my right.

Senator Frith: I was, therefore, right the first time: We are not going to get any answers.

Senator Roblin: I will do my best to look at every question on its merits and when I feel that an answer can be appropriately provided, I will do so.

Senator Frith: We will, however, receive no evidence or indication as to what the criterion is for merit or lack of merit?

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend reflects upon the appointment process, with which he is very familiar as it has been in practice for the last 23 years, he will understand what I am talking about.

Senator Frith: No, I will not. We have never refused to answer questions about it.

Senator Roblin: I think that is a statement that cannot be justified.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to Senator Marsden's question. My question is with respect to the rumour that there will be a complete change in the board of CN, just as there has been in the boards of Air Canada, VIA Rail and, with one exception other than the officers of the company, Petro-Canada. I will not take too long with my question, since it has really been covered in a question asked earlier by Senator Sinclair. However, there is one thing I would like to raise in the context that it is very bad business to change completely the boards of companies, whether they be private or public, in terms of the continuity of management, committees of boards and so on and so forth.

Are steps being taken by the Government of Canada, through various departments, to maintain continuity to ensure that the work that has been partially completed by the previous boards is not lost, and that we in Canada will not suffer serious economic damage because of these complete changes in the composition of these boards of directors which, I think, is unprecedented in the private sector?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as my honourable colleague has acknowledged, that question was asked on a previous occasion, and I have already answered it.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CANADA-ALBERTA MEMORANDUM OF UNDERSTANDING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Senator Murray: Is this about the bank rate?

Senator Olson: I noticed a complete absence of comment from the other side regarding the bank rate and the value of the dollar as it was moving in a certain direction, which is a complete change of personality as far as Senator Murray is concerned.

Honourable senators, before I was diverted I was about to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question based on a news release I received yesterday regarding a Canada-Alberta memorandum of understanding on science and technology. I should like to ask the leader to provide us with a copy of the agreement. I searched my office thoroughly for a copy of that agreement and can say that I did not receive one.

More importantly, could the leader, at the same time, find out what expanded activity we will be involved in as a result of the signing of this memorandum of understanding? This news release lists the initial priority areas as including: agriculture, cold regions, energy, forestry, medical equipment, systems, drugs and diagnostics and micro-electronics, to name a few.

What is new about that? There has been an agreement and a high level of co-operation between those doing that kind of research in Alberta and those doing that kind of research at the federal level for a long time now. There has been a high level of co-operation with respect to all of the items I have mentioned. Therefore, I wonder if this is just a façade to give the impression that there is something new. Could the leader indicate whether there is something new in this agreement?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will make inquiries as to the memorandum of understanding signed between the two levels of government. As my honourable friend knows, as a rule, documents affecting both governments require the consent of both governments before they are made public.

Respecting the other items mentioned by my honourable friend, I do not know what his definition of "new" is. If he means a new subject to be examined—I see that he is shaking his head—I can tell him that in areas involving agriculture and cold regions there is just no end to the new directions which are being developed by those interested in the science of those matters.

What this agreement says, among other things, is that investigations in those fields—which have by no means been completed—where new avenues are opening up every time the subject is examined, continuing close co-operation between the two levels of government will take place.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. I expect that there has already been agreement from both levels of government that the memorandum be made public, or surely a news release related to that memorandum would not have been issued. I hope that that is not going to be an impediment to our obtaining a copy of the agreement.

I think the Leader of the Government missed the substance or the gist of the question I intended to raise with him because in the news release the last paragraph states in part that:

Canada and Alberta agree that their initial priority areas will include: agriculture; cold regions; energy; forestry... medical equipment, systems, drugs and—micro-electronics;—

There is nothing new about that. Those have been priority areas of co-operative research between the Alberta Research Council and various departments of the federal government before. I think it is reasonable to ask what will happen to the people who are going to be affected in that region of Canada as a result of this agreement. According to the press release, there is nothing new.

Senator Roblin: I must tell my honourable friend that I am duty bound when accepting a question for a return that if there is a constitutional impediment with respect to it, as there is in this case, I am duty bound to make reference to it. If the two governments have agreed, then no problem arises.

With respect to the novelty of the situation, I repeat my point that agriculture is not new. It never has been new since the beginning of settled civilization, but every day that passes brings some new aspect of agriculture to the fore in respect to scientific research. If my honourable friend wants me to try to find something about the programs that are being considered under these heads, I will be glad to do so.

Senator Olson: I have a final supplementary. Now we are getting very precise about it, and if the Leader of the Government wants that precision in the way I ask the questions, I will be glad to frame them accordingly in the future. I know that there are some new things that are evolving day by day. Could he just tell us what they are or make an inquiry?

Senator Roblin: Certainly I will be glad to make an inquiry because they are very important matters, but whether they will meet my honourable friend's definition of "new," I have no idea.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. During the Easter adjournment, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, was reported in the Globe and Mail as saying that his May budget would have an inflationary impact. This is the first time in Canadian history, to my knowledge, that a Minister of Finance has made such a startling statement. My question is the following: Is it now government policy to fuel inflationary expectations amongst Canadians as a means of stimulating the economy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I can give my honourable friend the answer he expects. The answer is no.

THE BUDGET

STATEMENT BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government somewhat related to the question asked by Senator Grafstein. What steps does the government intend to take in light of the disclosures made in Calgary by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the contents of the next budget?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think the government needs to take any steps with respect to the minister's statement in Calgary.

Senator MacEachen: Is it now the view of the government that it is appropriate for a minister to disclose, prior to the budget, the tax measures that will be included in the budget, and that that is acceptable conduct?

Senator Roblin: I do not believe that my honourable friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, made any such disclosure.

Senator MacEachen: Obviously, the Leader of the Government has not informed himself as to what the minister said in Calgary. He said that the budget of next month would include tax measures to encourage foreign investment. That is a disclosure if I know anything. He went on to say that one of the candidates for elimination was the crown share or the back-in, and then he went on to say that the crown share was bad policy. If that is not a disclosure, I would like to know what the Leader of the Government wants to have. Does he need a blackboard in order to understand obvious facts?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that I need a blackboard. My honourable friend is a pretty good instructor in these matters. I can tell him, however, that this question of the back-in has been dealt with by the minister in charge of energy on more occasions than one, and has made clear what the policy of the government is with respect to that matter. There is nothing new in that statement. The Prime Minister has done the same thing, as I am reminded, but I would not be surprised if we were to hear more statements about the budget. Ministers might be inclined to say that the budget will be designed to improve the chances for employment. They may say the budget will be drafted to deal with the question of our deficit and matters of that sort. Surely to goodness, statements of a general character can cause no perturbation in the mind of my honourable friend.

Senator MacEachen: The honourable leader is, of course, evading the problem with which he is confronted. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that there would be tax measures to increase foreign investment. That is a specific assertion. He then went on to say that the crown share was bad Canadian policy and it was a candidate for elimination.

Is that not showing rather clearly what the intention of the government is with respect to a very important tax measure that is to be dealt with in the budget? Does that not give notice, particularly to the multinational corporations, as to what the probable tax treatment will be resulting from the budget?

I cannot understand why the minister would dismiss it so easily. It is not a general statement about measures to improve the state of the Canadian economy; it is very specific.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would, at least, tell the Secretary of State for External Affairs to button up, that he is doing enough damage in foreign affairs without coming to the assistance of the embattled Minister of Finance.

Senator Roblin: I will not be so rude as to suggest to my honourable friend that he should button up, but, if it is sauce for the goose, it is also sauce for the gander.

I will tell my honourable friend, in respect of that particular matter, that no one in the international financial field will know what tax measures are going to be effected that will influence them one way or another. It is absolutely ridiculous to suggest that because the minister says there will be some tax changes aimed toward a certain event, he has, therefore, by some curious logic, departed from the principle of budget secrecy. The whole idea is preposterous.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is obviously unaware of the tradition that has prevailed. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated what is to be in the budget; he has pinpointed the area, namely, foreign investment; and he has pinpointed the tax measures that will be invoked in order to bring about that foreign investment. How much more specific can you get? How much closer can you get to a clear violation of the principle of budget secrecy?

I ask the Leader of the Government to take this matter somewhat seriously because it is further evidence of the erosion of confidence in the financial policies of the government.

Senator Roblin: If the point were a serious one, I would take it seriously, but it is not, because a mere statement that some tax measures are going to be changed enables no one to do anything as a result of that particular statement having been made. That is the principle of budget secrecy that is important under our Constitution.

I would not be surprised if other ministers made other statements respecting trends in the budget. I do not see why not. They have been telegraphing them now for the last six months.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has made an extraordinary statement. He has said that it is possible for a minister now to pre-announce tax measures that are to be in the budget and that that does not constitute a budget leak. That is exactly what he has said. Of course, we are worlds apart. If that is his understanding, he is totally wrong.

Senator Roblin: Exactly what tax measure has been announced that will affect anyone's conduct? None.

Senator Frith: How do you know?

Senator Roblin: Exactly. You are saying, "How do you know?" You do not know.

Senator Frith: You are going to tell us there are going to be.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to ask a question, or if he wants to enscribe a resolution of condemnation of the minister concerned for debate in the Senate, let him go ahead and do so, but, as to the substance of this matter, it is just plain—I am afraid I must use senatorial language and say that it does not impress me.

FINANCE

PAYMENT OF MINISTERIAL AIDE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask another question on which the Leader of the Government may be more helpful.

Is it a fact that a person called Douglas Robson, who is the vice-president of Lawson Murray Ltd. and the president of the riding association in the riding represented by the Minister of Finance, worked in the minister's office for six weeks? Is it a fact that he worked without pay from the government but was in receipt of full pay from his private employer?

Would the Leader of the Government confirm or deny these assertions, because the minister himself has stated that the person in question did work in his office, but I want to know who paid his salary during those six weeks. Was it his former employer?

• (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am always helpful to my honourable friend. I give him the amount of help that he deserves. I can tell him that in this instance, I am going to be very helpful. I am going to provide him with the full text of what was said in the other place, where this matter was investigated thoroughly the other day.

Some Hon. Senators: Ah!

Senator Roblin: I hear some honourable senators saying "Ah!" Let me point out to them one principle of Question Period in this legislative body and any other, that being that one can only answer questions of which one has some knowledge; questions that come within one's portfolio, if one has a portfolio.

I can on occasion give honourable senators the benefit of my opinion on other matters, which perhaps I should not do; but on this particular occasion I have no intention of answering a question of which I have no personal knowledge.

Senator Olson: You can take the question as notice.

Senator Roblin: I shall take the question as notice and provide my honourable friend with what information I can.

Senator Flynn: Don't get excited, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: About what? Say something exciting and I'll get excited.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for making reference to what transpired in the House of Commons. As I understand it, it was in that place that the Minister of Finance stated that Mr. Robson was not paid by the government but by his employer, an employer from which he had not detached himself during his service with the Minister of Finance. It was on that point that I wanted confirmation before proceeding to a further question.

If the individual in question was paid by his private sector employer and was at the same time discharging public responsibilities, he was in a clear conflict of interest situation, not in appearance but in substance. One cannot be in private sector employment receiving private sector pay and discharge public responsibilities without being in a poisonous case of conflict of interest.

The Leader of the Government has said that he will confirm the source of the pay of this person. Will he also clarify for me how this situation of conflict of interest could be allowed to prevail in the office of the Minister of Finance?

I do not point to the fact that 13 days after he left, his firm received a very fat government contract. That is another question. I am raising the question of the conflict of interest; namely, the conflict between the source of his pay and his responsibilities to the public interest.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend makes a number of assumptions that I can by no means accept at their face value. The first is that there is a conflict of interest within the minister's office. That remains to be seen. We do not know the answer to the question previously posed.

The second point is that the Minister of Finance himself did not authorize this contract. It was arranged in other ways.

My honourable friend has asked a question. I am not in a position to give him an answer at the present time. I shall do my best to find out.

RESTRUCTURING OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—POSSIBLE COMMITTEE STUDY OF DISCUSSION PAPER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The Honourable Barbara McDougall, Minister of State (Finance), has tabled an important government document on the restructuring of Canada's financial institutions. I understand that document is to be referred to a committee of the other place for study.

I listened carefully to the list of documents tabled in the Senate today by the Leader of the Government, and I did not hear it mentioned among them. Would the Leader of the Government determine for us whether that document is going to be tabled in the Senate and whether or not a committee of the Senate will have an opportunity to study that document?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That document was in fact tabled in the Senate this afternoon. The title may have escaped my friend's notice.

Consultations are now going on between the chairman and the members of the committee that would be involved with this document in terms of the attitude that should be taken, and no doubt we will have their view of it in due course.

THE SENATE OFFICE OF SPEAKER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Riel, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to his tenure as Speaker of the Senate, his experiences and his recommendations to the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Riel, P.C.)

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I feel almost as though I were talking about the subject for the first time, because my inquiry has been pending since December 12. I feel like a lawyer who gets back to the Court of Appeal after being off a case for a couple of months. I think I knew more about the subject three months ago than I do today. However, I know you will bear with me. It seems I am being asked to continue.

I have answers to some questions by Senators Thompson and Thériault. Senator Thompson's question was about the use of the Ontario Assembly Chamber. I found out that the chamber had been lent in the past to an organization of young parliamentarians, and on one occasion for an international meeting. Its use for future events would have to be discussed.

Senator Flynn's question was about statistics. He asked how many senators Sir John A. Macdonald had appointed during his term as Prime Minister. I said that Sir John A. Macdonald had appointed 117. He appointed 117 during his term, including one Liberal and one Independent, counting those appointed by the Constitution Act, 1867. Senator Flynn, you will find the reference in "The Modern Senate of Canada" by M. Kuntz.

I am not saying this to bore you, but merely to prove there has been an ongoing tradition of appointing senators in Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald, as I said before, appointed 115 Conservative senators, as was his right. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who succeeded him in 1896, appointed 81. They happened to be 81 Liberals.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: What a coincidence!

Senator Riel: I may add that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came to power in 1896, he thought the Senate was lacking in Liberals. This situation was subsequently corrected. Senator Flynn told me that when Mr. Diefenbaker came to power in 1957, there were only five Conservatives in the Senate. There is still hope.

I suppose you could compare it with the ice age phenomenon: the icecap expands and contracts. I am not sure which cycle we are in, and of course it depends for whom.

It would appear that changes in the party in power directly affect Senate membership. That is why the last time I spoke, I had, without offending tradition or any individual or party, suggested that it might be useful to create a group of cross-benchers to be appointed ex officio. The group would consist of former prime ministers of Canada, former provincial premiers and former governors general.

In fact, the ex officio appointment of part of the membership of the House of Lords was considered in the course of discussions on the subject of the reform of the House of Lords in 1948 and 1958.

At the time, there was also a suggestion that the House of Lords should be replaced by members of the Privy Council. I am not sure this was not a good idea.

Seriously, why I think we should consider this possibility and why immediately the thought of appointing senators ex officio came to mind was that I had read a report submitted to the Parliament of Great Britain by Prime Minister Wilson in 1968, of which he had made a summary. As you all know, Prime Minister Wilson subsequently became Lord Wilson of Rievaulx. In his report on reform of the House of Lords—there is a copy in the Library of Parliament—he included all negotiations and suggestions undertaken and made since 1948 by party leaders and their representatives.

Interestingly, Mr. Wilson says, and I quote:

● (1430)

[English]

The Government considers that any reform of the House of Lords should be based on the following propositions:

(a) in the framework of a modern parliamentary system the second chamber has an essential role to play, complementary to but not rivalling that of the Commons;

In another paragraph he states:

The Government further believes that any reform should achieve the following objectives:

(a) the hereditary basis of members should be eliminated,

(b) no one party should possess a permanent majority;

(c) in normal circumstances the government of the day should be able to secure a reasonable working majority;

He refers also in his report to an "Automatic Issue of Writs to Peers who hold or have held certain offices."

[Translation]

That is why I was under the impression that former provincial premiers, Prime Ministers or Governors General could be automatically called to the Senate and make up a group of independent senators.

You know that the reform in England did take place. Parliament did adopt certain pieces of legislation such as the Life Peerage Act in 1958, but no law can provide that a party may not hold a majority in the House of Lords. It cannot provide that the government of the day, when it introduces various programs, must have a majority when needed under normal circumstances, as Lord Wilson says. That was not in the legislation because it cannot be done, of course. But they did appoint many independent peers or cross-benchers, yet they continued to appoint peers affiliated to various parties. That is why I had the idea that we could have supernumerary senators, in addition to the 104 we now have. We would have a supernumerary and ex officio appointed group made up of former premiers and Prime Ministers, prestigious people with nonpartisan views who would play a role which is essential here. As Mr. Wilson points out in his report, it is a good thing when no party holds a majority. But that requires a sufficient number of independent Lords—and that also applies in our case, of course. Besides, the independent peers are there to vote with the government when it has not enough members, and with the opposition when it is in a similar situation.

Obviously, any measure must be judged on its own merit. So that is what we will have to do if we want a truly independent chamber. What else can we do, with our traditions in this country. Traditions last. There will be Senate vacancies as years go by and there is not much we can do to prevent the new government from appointing senators from its own party. That is tradition. I am not suggesting that new appointees would not be good senators. However, having been appointed by one Prime Minister or another may influence our work. I was appointed by Mr. Trudeau, and that certainly influenced my thoughts or my reactions concerning some of the measures which he thought were important. Admittedly, there is nothing wrong with that, we are all human.

In my opinion, senators appointed by this government will always feel sympathy towards the Prime Minister, particularly if they are friends. Those things happen. We were brought up together, we attended the same schools, we have known one another for a long time. Those things cannot be changed and they do create inhibitions.

There is one aspect on which Mr. Wilson put some emphasis, however, and that is when he said that we cannot have an elected House of Lords, because it would necessarily rival with the House of Commons which is also elected. There cannot be two Houses elected by the same people in the same country. I would like to quote from his report.

Under Section 25, for instance, he states that if the second chamber is to have any influence at all, as a second chamber should have—

● (1440)

[English]

"It must possess a degree of genuine independence."

He goes on to say:

The present House had three characteristics on which such an independence could be founded. One is the fact already mentioned, that a peer, having once become a peer, cannot be deprived of his seat. Another is the participation of a considerable number of part-time members with wide interest and experience who can make contributions of high quality from time to time, and third is the presence of a number of cross-benchers who owe no allegiance to any party.

In article 72, he goes on to say:

Attention has been drawn to the importance of cross-benchers in the reformed house and to the fact that their presence is needed to safeguard its independence.

[Translation]

As I was reflecting on these matters, I came to think that an additional group of independent senators could help give some credibility to the Senate.

I also find in the Wilson report the idea that the leaders of the three parties contributed by sending delegates for 20 years. The Conservative member, Sir Cuthbert Hedlam, prepared the background papers.

You will also find in the Parliamentary Library an interesting work by an Assistant Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. Laundy, entitled—

[English]

Encyclopedia of Parliament by Wilding and Laundy, 1968 edition, page 366 under the reference "House of Lords Reform."

[Translation]

—which says that the reforms were carried out.

[English]

The reform of the House of Lords in England has not been written as such or as a whole, drastically, in one single or formal Act of Parliament. Several acts have been passed since 1948, but always reflecting the spirit of the Wilson report as mentioned in Article 6 of its first appendix. But what is more important, and as is very normal in the United Kingdom, the reform has taken place progressively, in fact, since 1948. "There was general agreement on these recommendations at the time, says Laundy and they have now, to a great extent, been implemented." It is, in my mind, a matter of common sense that if the various parties agree that a non-elected second chamber should not be a rival to, nor a competitor with, the other chamber which is elected, that it should act accordingly. At the same time, common sense also commands that, in such a case, there should be no majority in the second chamber.

[Translation]

However, in this case, before speaking of a new concept of the Senate, we must of course ask ourselves, as we are asked nearly each day, from my own experience, why does the Senate exist exactly. Does it not duplicate the role of the House of Commons?

I think that the Senate has a problem at this time. It is a problem of credibility which could be solved if the Senate were to prove its usefulness and protect its integrity.

In other words, I believe that, to acquire some credibility, the Senate should redefine its duties. All private corporations do so. Each year, or at least periodically, corporate employees at various levels must redefine their duties and functions. I have often been asked, and this was my experience when I was Speaker, why a Senate? In reflecting on this question, I found that it was much more important than whether or not the Senate should be elected and what its make-up should be.

Once the future role of the Senate is determined, it will be easier in my view to decide on its membership. Its prime role, according to the last report of the joint committee on Senate Reform, is regional representation. It will be recognized that this regional protection is neither a role or a responsibility that is very self-enlightening. It is not clear in the various documents where reference is made to it.

The powers and responsibilities of the Senate—meaning the present Senate—are many and this is what I am concerned about. That in my view is what must be defined, understood and published.

Why a senate, with Senators doing what? The answers to those two questions will prove the Senate's usefulness. One of its functions is representing the regions. Very well. This meant originally some kind of umbrella for the various colonies that were federating or confederating in 1867. They wanted to keep sufficient autonomy in order not to be economically or culturally dependent on a powerful central government, controlled by one or more of the former colonies having the greatest influence on it.

It is a shield. In my view this automatically influences the way of thinking of each senator. It is a call upon our conscience when alerted by some statute affecting our region, to exercise positive concern, whether it is about agriculture, the national economy, finance or regional development.

It must ensue that the Senate must be concerned not only with regional development but also with free trade between regions. We must also realize that with the passage of years, the concept of regional protection has evolved into a concept of minority protection. The Senate has become a chamber of nationalities with of course representatives of the founding nations, but also of the various ethnic groups, new Canadians, multicultural groups and native people.

The concept of regional protection will also include that of free trade between regions, which was indeed one of the reasons for founding the Canadian Confederation. Therefore, it includes the protection of principles governing regional development, multiculturalism and the development of native peoples and those in the Territories.

The Senate has among other responsibilities to monitor and promote, to protect above all conflicts if I may say so, the balance, whether economic, social or political, in the philosophical and higher sense of the term, between the various components of our country, both geographical and human. And it may be said by the way that according to the report on preconstitutional conferences, Quebec had joined Confederation only on the condition that it would have a third of the Senate seats, because it has special and specific rights to protect within a federated Canada.

This is not the only thing the Senate does. We always say it is a chamber of sober second thought. As an authority and a responsibility "second thought" is very vague and far-reaching. It is constantly exercised in my view, whether when discussing a bill sent by the House of Commons or introducing legislation on matters which are particular to the Senate.

The Senate is not just a Chamber, as stated by the Clerk of the British House of Lords, Sir David Stevens, and I quote:

• (1450)

[English]

"to delete or to delay."

[Translation]

This chamber must act and it does act positively through its special and standing committees, as well as in its proceedings. The Senate is comprised of experienced, knowledgeable and wise men. Senators benefit from the permanence of their tenancy. They do not go through an election process.

They do not work, therefore, for their own advancement. According to some authors, they are granted by the Constitution a sort of quasi-judiciary status. That is a notion which is found in Kuntz' A Modern Senate of Canada and which should be developed further.

In an article which I read recently concerning the House of Lords, I found the following comment:

[English]

"The constituency of a peer is under his hat."

[Translation]

I feel the constituency of a Canadian senator is inside his conscience. It follows him everywhere. Thinking is like praying or meditating. It can be done anywhere.

I know that our subjects for study are like shadows which never leave us. Once acquired, our quasi-judiciary status becomes second nature with us, just like the judiciary status of a judge becomes second nature with him—

Senator Flynn: Are you saying that yourself or are you quoting somebody?

Senator Riel: No, dear friend, I am quoting myself.

Senator Flynn: How admirable!

Senator Riel: Do you approve, so far?

Senator Flynn: Yes, but I say so between quotation marks.

Senator Riel: There is no need for quotation marks, because this is my own.

Also, the Senate should look into and debate the major problems of the Senate. That is also what Mr. Wilson thinks and what Sir David Stevens emphasized in his report on the House of Lords. It can be found in the Parliamentary Library. As a matter of fact, I am not inventing anything. We study and examine the major problems of the state which clearly require judgment, patience and continuity.

On page 12 of the last report on the Senate Reform, I read . . . And I may be quoting you, Senator Tremblay:

In recent years the Senate has investigated a number of important public issues, including poverty, the mass media, unemployment, inflation, aging, land use, science policy, national defence, relations with the United States and the proposed national security agency.

I add in French the word "nationale", because I feel it is meaningless without it.

For the past 20 years, the Parliamentary Library has kept up to date a detailed list of all the reports ever published by the Senate's standing, special and joint committees. A copy of this list is available. I have sent for one and found it most interesting. The summary which I have read and the sentence which I have quoted from the report of the Senate Reform committee are ample proof of the larger number of issues which the Senate has dealt with so far. I have read with interest the favourable newspaper comments which followed the tabling of the recent report on national defence and the recent report of the committee headed by Senator Sparrow and which dealt with the soil and the environment. At the same time, I noticed in this list prepared by the Parliamentary Library newspapers articles dating back to 1978 which stated:

[English]

Outside the chamber the Senate committee rooms are becoming the places where much of the action is, jostling the Commons for a share of the headlines and pushing boldly into areas where MPs have not yet dared to tread.

[Senator Riel.]

[Translation]

I have found three or four similar comments. I think that this fully demonstrates the usefulness of the Senate. Would you like me to read a couple of others, honourable senators?

Such important pieces of work deserve to be made public. I want to complete the list of our activities before coming to the next point. I wish to tell you that the active presence and participation of senators in the Joint Committees of the Senate and the House of Commons clearly demonstrate the competence and usefulness of the Senate.

The Senate has always been interested in problems of a general nature which it is able to consider, thanks to its permanent membership and the fact that it has no responsibility for a constituency.

The Senate is concerned not only with legislation but with the philosophy that is to be a part of that legislation. The Senate is also concerned with the problems arising from the sociological, technical or economic aspects of the events that cross our paths daily.

We must continue in this vein. Senator Hébert initiated the creation of a committee on youth last year. This year, the committee is continuing its study of the problems confronting the youth of our country. I believe this is very important.

I was in France not long ago, and I read in the paper that the French Senate was being asked to consider a complete dossier on copyright.

The future of intellectual creativity and communications is at stake. How to manage artistic creation. The senators are examining proposed legislation on the copyright of authors, artists, audio and video performers and producers and audio-visual communications companies. It is an ambitious project because the proposed legislation will be updating the Literary and Artistic Copyright Act that is now 30 years old, while considering all new communications and broadcasting techniques including cable, satellite, and so forth. These have, in fact, altered the landscape of artistic creativity in France.

This, I believe, is an area where a committee of the Senate could do a tremendous service to the world of the arts and technology in this country, considering the extraordinary developments taking place in communications and computer technology.

How to protect those who are entitled to protection from "piracy" and assure that they enjoy the fruits of their intellectual labour, while opening a perspective on future technological developments.

It would be possible to do several special long-term studies each year.

The Senate could set up a special committee to study deficits, not only Canada's national deficit but deficits throughout the world. What the deficit in this country needs is an in-depth study instead of a series of speeches by our various political parties.

In centuries gone by, deficits have been seen as a cancer that, like unemployment, has destroyed civilizations.

The Senate could take one, two or three years to make a thorough study of the problem. In fact, that is why the Senate has a permanent membership.

This was the summary I made of various activities that demonstrate the usefulness of the Senate. It is not an exhaustive list. I drew up the list according to my own lights, but I would urge my fellow senators to add to the list or to correct it—I am not oversensitive in that respect—but in any case, I think that if we do not demonstrate or publicize the usefulness of the Senate in our parliamentary system, we will never have any credibility among the people of this country. Otherwise, our Senate may go the way of the Senate under the Roman empire, when it finally disappeared after the emperors decided that it had outlived its usefulness.

When everyone has gone home, the party is over.

Senator Flynn: Ave Caesar.

Senator Riel: Ave Caesar, morituri te salutant. I would therefore urge honourable senators to submit their views, because this is not a partisan effort. We are talking about what the Senate means. I think it is something that is very little known. Actually, it means what we do and what we can do. In fact, if people knew about everything we do, they would be pinning medals on us.

I want to raise another point. I mentioned the usefulness of the Senate, and now I would like to talk about the integrity of the Senate. I do not want to tax your patience. I noticed recently that some of our colleagues had written letters concerning the administration of the restaurant.

Apparently, Senate integrity is always under attack, an issue I raised in the first part of my intervention a long time ago already, last fall. It had to do with those people from outside who come here to tell Senate officials—the Speaker, the Clerk and others—what to do in certain circumstances when we have visitors. Parliament has to be master in its own house. There are adjoining rooms, the Rotunda, the Entrance Hall, the Remembrance Hall. None of that ought to be forgotten. It is there for the integrity of the Senate, not for the incumbents of certain positions. That is part of the respect which the Senate commands. Otherwise, we will become a second-class chamber and people will forget about us. What I said and what I mean about the restaurant—and it applies to the library, to the parliamentary relations secretariat—is that those are under joint administration.

Joint administration was not defined or decided on the strength of numbers or the monetary contribution made by each chamber—to the restaurant, the library or the secretariat, for instance—because in fact any monetary contribution does not come from the House of Commons or the Senate, it comes from taxes. It is nothing more than a book-keeping entry when the words “House of Commons” appear next to $3 million worth of joint maintenance, for which we pay only $1 million.

Joint administration is just like joint property. Joint property is administered with the agreement of all owners. If there are two, one owning 75 per cent and the other 25 per cent, they have to agree. The $3 million or $4 million deficit is not due to the fact that the Senate was involved in the administration of the restaurant. It has nothing to do with joint administration. It just happened that way and I do not know why. It seems that a number of committees studied the matter. As I said in my previous intervention, the same thing happened in England, and they solved the problem.

In England, the money comes directly from the Department of Finance, the Treasury. Neither the House of Commons nor the House of Lords enjoy the benefit of a book entry. And anyway, currently it is a deficit. There is not much to be shared. The offense is that on the House of Commons' block diagram, parliamentary restaurant services are provided free of charge to the Senate by the House of Commons. This is nonsense and double talk. It has not been so since Parliament was established. There is an acquisitive prescription, almost a hundred years old, which proves that the Senate has always been co-operating in joint and undivided undertakings, sharing in the administration of these joint or common services.

What might and will happen is that the House of Commons, which provides us (and saying so if we do not protest) free of charge with those services as stated, may some day withdraw that whenever they want. What is given free of charge is easily withdrawn. This has happened before, and for this reason Senator Bosa or someone else in the Senate wrote us a letter about that. One day he realized (during a House of Commons recess) that the restaurant was closed. It so happened that the Senate was sitting during that period. Of course, the unhappy senators could not get to the restaurant, which is called not the House of Commons' Restaurant, but the Parliamentary Restaurant, just as the Library is the Parliamentary Library. Those are not services that come under the exclusive or main administration of the House of Commons or that belong exclusively to the House of Commons.

They have joint administrations, undivided administrations. If I am referring to that it is because we are thereby losing part of our integrity. I referred to ceremonies from which our Senate officers, the Clerk, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, had been excluded, and even the Speaker. We were told about what was going to happen.

The integrity of the Senate is threatened, it is not being respected. What happens is we are told by people who are our employees: “This is not your business”. They do not answer our questions or they do as they please, looking elsewhere for instructions.

There are three things that are essential to our Senate: its usefulness, its integrity, and its credibility.

If we are going to have credibility, we must exist, and enjoy the full possession and exercise of all the privileges granted to the Senate, to the Speaker of the Senate and to the officers of the Senate.

This is all for this afternoon, gentlemen, and I thank you very much for your kind attention. I will ask for leave to adjourn this debate because I still have something else to say. I will keep it for you so that you can prepare for a week-end of total rest.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Would Senator Riel allow a question?

Senator Riel: Very well.

Senator Lapointe: Were ladies excluded and barred from listening to your speech, for you said: "Thank you, Gentlemen"?

Senator Riel: I am of the old school, Senator Lapointe, where it was stated in the Interpretation Act that the masculine gender always includes the feminine, but you are so very near to my heart.

On motion of Senator Riel, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.
Prayers.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday he was unable to explain to us, or perhaps did not want to explain to us, why Betty Hewes is no longer the chairman of the board of CN.

Recently, our distinguished former colleague, Senator Florence Bird, was, according to all accounts, most discourteously treated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in terms of her membership of the Refugee Advisory Council. Can the Leader of the Government explain to us the grounds on which she was not re-appointed, because, as I understand it, her work was highly valued by the government.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the highest regard for our former colleague, Senator Florence Bird. She was a valuable member of this chamber and is, I am happy to say, a friend of mine. I would be unhappy if she were discourteously treated by anyone. I will try to find out what the circumstances were.

Senator Marsden: As a supplementary question, I understand from newspaper reports that she was notified by form letter which did not in any way reflect the nature of her work for this country. I wonder if, on behalf of all senators in this chamber, the Leader of the Government would write to Senator Bird—

Senator Flynn: Speak for yourself.

Senator Marsden: —and extend our regret about the way in which she was treated.

Senator Roblin: I have not seen the newspaper reports referred to, and even if I had I would make no comment on them.

Senator Marsden: Would the Leader of the Government, therefore, be prepared to ascertain the circumstances and then write such a letter on our behalf?

Senator Roblin: I think I shall have to let my previous answer stand.

Senator Marsden: I wonder, then, if I may raise another question, because as you can see I am very concerned about what is happening—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is this a further question on the same matter?

Senator Marsden: It is a similar matter, as it relates to the appointment of women to senior positions in this country, a matter upon which the present government expressed itself in a very positive way before the election.

I also note that my distinguished scientist colleague from the University of Toronto, Professor Ursula Franklin—who has been both summoned to and dismissed from the Atomic Energy Control Board—has suffered a similar discourtesy, or what is described as an insult, by this government.

I am wondering whether you can explain how that occurred, and I wonder, also, whether you can explain why so many women, distinguished women, women who have contributed a great deal to this country, are receiving this treatment at the hands of the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I think I can say, on behalf of the government—

Senator Frith: Smile, Jacques. Don't get excited!

Senator Flynn: Have mercy!

Senator Roblin: I think I can say, on behalf of the government, that more women have been appointed to important and responsible positions in the last nine months than ever before in the history of this country.

Senator Frith: Where does it say that?

Senator Steuart: Your saying that does not make it so.

Senator Flynn: You would not understand.

Senator McElman: There have been more dismissals, though.

Senator Frith: What is the net position? That is the problem. There is a deficit.

Senator Roblin: I doubt that any other government could point to such a record in the first nine months of its administration as that of the present government in respect of its treatment of women.

Senator Frith: That goes for dismissals, too.

Senator Roblin: In fact, I feel so enthusiastic about the matter that I am going to let my honourable friend have a list of those appointments so that she can inform herself on what has actually been done.

Senator Frith: Will you include the dismissals?

Senator Steuart: Include the ones you have fired.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Roblin: With respect to the particular case she has referred to, I regret that I have no information.

Senator Flynn: If the term is over, the term is over.

Senator Marsden: I thank you for the offer of a list. I should like to have a list of all of the appointments, male and female, because proportion, of course, always enters into this question.

My question is not specifically about women in general—and I am aware that the government has made a number of appointments—but about women in senior positions, and I am particularly interested in the situation of three very distinguished women in Canada—

Senator Flynn: That is your opinion.

Senator Marsden: —who have lost jobs. I should like to know in particular about those three cases, involving three women who were hardly in their jobs long enough to lose them. How can this continue? What is behind it? Perhaps at the same time as supplying the list of appointments you could also deal with those three specific cases.

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that I can provide information to my honourable friend. If they are order-in-council appointments, they are at pleasure, and I think one has to accept the right of the government to make those appointments as it sees fit. If there are other circumstances which can be reported upon to my honourable friend, I shall be glad to do so.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It now appears that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism has been unable to reach a satisfactory accord with Canadian citizens of Japanese descent on the issue of a government apology and compensation to the members of that community as a result of actions taken by the Government of Canada during and immediately after the Second World War.

It also appears that the Prime Minister, despite his undertaking during the election campaign to treat this as a personal priority, refuses to intervene in this process or to use his powers of reconciliation to resolve this particular problem.

Having raised the expectations of this community in terms of there being a form of satisfactory settlement, the Prime Minister, by prolonging the problem by extending the process rather than solving the matter and putting it behind us, is now re-opening old wounds causing divisions in the country. We are now hearing criticism from corners of the country that have not been heard from before on this issue. The problem, rather than being solved, has been intensified.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us whether or not there is a timetable in respect of the resolution of this issue such that the issue can be settled in a way that will be reasonable, satisfactory and just to these Canadian citizens who were so unfairly treated by a government of this country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): While I have every sympathy for the position of the Japanese-Canadians, I can by no means accept the description of the situation that has just been given by my honourable friend, which I think is quite tendentious. I would say, however, that the government has made it a priority in its program of action to try to reach a solution in this respect, and it has offered, and, indeed, I believe it has prepared the wording of, an appropriate resolution that might be passed by both houses of Parliament in connection with this matter. The problem is, of course, that the Japanese-Canadians have not accepted the proposal that has been made—and I have no objection to that; it is their right to do so.

On the other hand, one cannot give them carte blanche to decide for the government what the government should do. The government must take the responsibility for doing that and, if it does not lead to an immediate agreement in the matter, that is to be deeply regretted. But I believe the position of the government is fair. It has offered an apology. It has offered to memorialize the situation so that it should not be lost from public sight. But it has not agreed to personal indemnification for those who are concerned. I do not believe it has ever been suggested by any administration that that should be done, and certainly that is the sticking point at the present time.

So far as the timetable is concerned, we will continue to be open to discussion with the Japanese-Canadian community in the hope that we will be able to come to a meeting of minds on this important matter.

Senator Grafstein: As a supplementary question, apparently the Prime Minister has offered an open-door policy to solve problems of this nature, but has refused to pursue the matter. Can the Leader of the Government tell us what the Prime Minister's intention may be in terms of allowing this community some direct access to him so that he might intervene in this process and hear their side of the story?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend was careful to use the word "apparently" with respect to the Prime Minister's attitude. It is wise that he has done so, because I believe the Prime Minister is quite capable of expressing his own opinion and his own stand on the matter, and I regret that I am not able to speak for him.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—DR. URSULA FRANKLIN

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I wish to follow up on a question asked earlier by Senator Marsden concerning the appointment, followed by the non-appointment, of Dr. Franklin to the Atomic Energy Control Board. The Leader of the Government mentioned that order-in-council appointments are made "at pleasure." In this case it would appear that the pleasure lasted less than 24 hours. Apparently, Dr. Franklin received a letter from the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advising her of the appointment and thanking her for agreeing to serve. However, the next day she received a telephone call advising her that she had not been appointed.

I would be interested in knowing exactly how this kind of confusion—and, indeed, insult—could take place in respect of a person who has such a distinguished reputation. One wonders whether the government is making appointments so hand-over-fist that it has forgotten whom it is appointing and why.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it appears, from the information I have, which I must verify, that the invitation was extended to the distinguished lady before she had been appointed. That certainly is to be much regretted, and I am sure that certain conversations are taking place in the minister's office with regard to that unfortunate incident. The fact appears to be, however, that she never was appointed, but she was advised of the probability, it appears, incorrectly. So far as I am concerned, I much regret that, as I am sure does the minister, because no one would wish to cause embarrassment or discomfort, or be discourteous to any person, let alone the lady in question.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

LONG-TERM ILLEGAL MIGRANTS REVIEW COMMITTEE—
POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION OF CONDUCT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning an article that appeared in today's issue of the Globe and Mail. The article is headed "Immigration review chairman denies conflict". The Globe and Mail arranged to have someone, posing as an illegal immigrant, with a concealed tape recorder, call upon Mr. Donald Greenbaum, who is the chairman of the Immigration Minister's Review Committee of Long-term Illegal Migrants. During the course of this interview, Mr. Greenbaum, after explaining the conflict of interest, proceeded to take down the details of the application this man wanted to make to the committee. Mr. Greenbaum arranged for the man to go to the lawyer who is sharing an office with him and told him that this lawyer would look after him for $500. Mr. Greenbaum indicated that he would charge the man $100 for taking down the details, but he would not give a receipt.

Senator Doody: Those lawyers!

Senator Godfrey: Perhaps it was for reasons of income tax or perhaps he did not want such evidence to exist. Then Mr. Greenbaum told the man to come back when he was all finished and he would complete the job for him for $1,000 and that his chances of getting through the immigration committee were 80 per cent. I suggest that he was being very modest and that the chance is probably closer to 100 per cent.

My question is: Is the government prepared to initiate an investigation into this matter to determine what actually happened and to produce a report as to the fitness of Mr. Donald Greenbaum to hold this position, in view of what has been disclosed and what, apparently, is on the tape of the Globe and Mail reporter?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend had read the rest of the article he would have found that it was the applicant who asked whether he had an 80 per cent chance of succeeding and that Mr. Greenbaum had replied that it was more like 99 per cent.

Senator Godfrey: You are quite right.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I am informed that the gentleman concerned has resigned from his post.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NAMIBIA—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERIM
ADMINISTRATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government has made any pronouncement on the proposal by the Government of South Africa to establish an interim administration in Namibia. Perhaps the government has made a statement, but if it has I have not seen it. I would like to know the attitude of the government on that point and whether or not it has joined with other western nations in opposing this particular move on the part of South Africa, which falls far short of the resolution of the United Nations on the independence of Namibia.

I would also like to know whether the group of five western nations, of which Canada is a member, has met recently to deal with this new situation and, indeed, whether the government will take any steps to get the five western nations to meet to see whether some progress can be made on securing independence for Namibia.

I realize that I have asked a series of questions, and I do not expect the Leader of the Government to answer them now. He might wish to bring in a delayed answer. However, I would like to have some up-to-date information and as much detail as possible on what is happening. As my honourable friend knows, Canada has been a member, along with the United States, the United Kingdom, France and West Germany, of the group that has worked very hard, but not yet successfully, on the question of Namibia. I wonder whether the government sees any role for this group of western nations in this situation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has given consideration to the proposal of the Republic of South Africa with respect to Namibia. It is not a proposal the Government of Canada regards as being satisfactory in the circumstances. Our position has been the one enunciated by my honourable friend, I believe, some time ago; namely, that Resolution 435 of the United Nations is the standard by which we judge any action of the Republic of South Africa. Therefore we do not agree with or approve of their activity, as my honourable friend has mentioned.

The contact group, to the best of my knowledge, has not met recently. It will be meeting soon. I would like to take that part of the question as notice.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government and would simply add a further comment by way of a question. Is it the government's view that the contact group has a useful role because, in a sense, the contact group has been asserting itself—in the case of some nations, rather at a distance—in concert with the direct effort being made by the United States to have some influence on South Africa. I think there is growing impatience, certainly in the neighbouring front-line African states, at the lack of success so far attained.

I suppose the nub of my question is whether the government is still of the view that it is worth while to move in concert with the United States, in a sense, in seeking a solution or, on the other hand, whether it is not now time to take a somewhat more aggressive stand with respect to the long failure of South Africa to respond to the universal opinion expressed by the United Nations that independence ought to be granted to this country.

Senator Roblin: The government has not departed in any way from its stand that independence ought to be granted to the territory of Namibia.

With respect to the usefulness of the contact group, I think one must continue to try. It is perfectly true that the lack of progress has been disappointing. It is also true that there has been some progress, even although it has been disappointing, which leads one to believe that you just have to keep on working away at it.

However, in order to deal with the matter more adequately for my honourable friend, I think, perhaps, I should get a statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that would accurately reflect the current situation.

Senator MacEachen: I would appreciate that.

HONDURAS AND NICARAGUA—U.S. MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO CONTRA FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I would also like to know from the minister whether the government has made any views known on the question of military assistance by the United States to the Contras in Honduras and in the areas surrounding Nicaragua. I know that some Canadian groups have expressed a view on that, and I wonder whether at this point the Government of Canada has expressed to the Government of the United States its concern about military assistance being granted to the Contras.

We know that in the initial stage the assistance is to be in the form of humanitarian assistance, but I wonder whether we have stated to the United States that we would be very much opposed if that humanitarian assistance were later to be transformed, as is planned by the President, into direct military assistance by way of funding of the military activities of the Contras. I know that Canada has opposed a military solution in that area—I think rightly—but I would like to know whether, in this case, we have made our views known to the United States.

Senator Roblin: I think our views are known to the United States to the extent that we are strong supporters of the efforts of the Contadora group to mediate a solution, and we are much encouraged by views recently expressed that the Contadora process is closer now than it has been before to a plan to demilitarize that area and to provide verification of that fact of the withdrawal of all foreign influences whatsoever.

It is very much the hope of the government that this Contadora process will be successful. Of course, that eliminates the need for any consideration of the Contras in the situation.

With respect to the precise point raised by my honourable friend—have we said anything to the Americans in recent days with respect to what is going on in their legislatures?—I will make inquiries. I rather think we would be a little guarded about appearing to interfere in their domestic legislative activities, although there may be an appropriate way to express our concern.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government could give us as much information on the Central American situation as possible, including information on the precise question I have asked.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT BY MINISTER TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not wish to overburden the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I should like him, at some point, to attempt to inform the Senate as to the results of the visit by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Soviet Union.

That visit was a significant one in that a Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs has not visited that country in quite some time. I wonder whether we could be told what happened, what was the nature of the conversations respecting arms control, and whether any particular agreements in the field of trade or cultural exchanges were concluded or are about to be concluded between Canada and the Soviet Union.

I am somewhat surprised at the low profile that has been attached to that particular trip in light of its importance. I should like to obtain some information as to what the result was and what the estimate of the government is as to the value of the trip and its effect on the current and future state of Canada-Soviet relations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if there is an impression that this was a low-profile trip, that was not the doing of the government. The government did not consider it to be a low-profile trip. "Profile" is used to describe the importance attributed by the media, and if there was no television camera over the minister's shoulder I guess they considered this as a low-profile trip.

I expect the minister will make a statement on his visit to Russia, and I will see that my honourable friend receives a copy. That may answer his questions.

Senator MacEachen: Will that statement be made relatively soon? Will it be made in the House of Commons, or will it be made before a committee of the House of Commons? I would be interested in knowing when we might expect that statement.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that the minister has decided what form the statement will take, but I expect that he will make that known when a decision has been made.

INTERNATIONAL CENTRE FOR OCEAN DEVELOPMENT

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REPLACEMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have before me an article published in the Globe and Mail of this date headed "Aid agency hit by patronage." The article refers to the International Centre for Ocean Development, which was founded in Halifax in 1983, which was "put on hold" when the Conservative government took over, and which, apparently, has now been re-organized. The original chairman of the board was a Halifax lawyer by the name of Brian Flemming who, while he was at one time a Liberal candidate and had considerable associations with the Liberal Party of Canada, had also gained a considerable reputation because of his knowledge of and participation in affairs having to do with the Law of the Sea. I am not complaining about Brian Flemming's replacement. Perhaps that was a thing to be expected.

But also such outstanding international people as David Hopper, a vice-chairman of the World Bank in Washington, Georges Léger, a diplomat who serves as a vice-president of Petro-Canada International, the subsidiary of the national oil company with responsibility for helping Third World countries, Dr. Verevat Hongskul of Thailand, president of the largest fisheries research institute in South-East Asia, and Wayne Hunte, a leading fish biologist from Barbados, all of those people were replaced, yet none had any association with any political party. They constituted the international flavour of the International Centre for Ocean Development.

Let us look at who they were replaced by. First of all, there is the chairman, Hanson Dowell, a pleasant enough young lawyer from my own county of Annapolis in Nova Scotia who is stated to have been an adviser on sea law to the Government of Nova Scotia. I am not sure what significance there is to this, but it was his Conservative connections that got him the job. Mr. Dowell was a national vice-president of the PC Party and served as counsel and special adviser to Elmer MacKay when the Mulroney cabinet member served as minister responsible for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the Clark government.

The other new board members are: Gastien Godin of Shippegan, New Brunswick, a Conservative candidate in the 1979 federal election; Robert Maguire, from Rimouski, Quebec, the riding held by Monique Vézina the Tory Minister for External Relations; Roy Cheeseman, the former Conservative Minister of Fisheries of Newfoundland; Ellen McLean, president of the International Association of Country Women, from Eureka, Nova Scotia; and two scientists, whom I do not know, one from Vancouver and one from the Bedford Institute of Oceanography in Halifax.

I am sorry for this rather long preamble, honourable senators, because I do not believe that questions ought to be asked in this way even though I know that we have been rather generous in allowing it to be done. This is my concern. The next paragraph states:

Some observers are concerned that the new appointments may mean ICOD's emphasis will shift from helping the most needy countries to developing export markets for Canadian products.

I would like the Leader of the Government, if he can, to comment on this and, I hope, to assure us that the international flavour of ICOD will not be destroyed as a result of these Tory patronage appointments which bring the whole organization back to Canada and completely destroy its international flavour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think my honourable friend need be concerned about the proper management of this organization. I am positive that it will be conducted in an appropriate manner by those who are in charge, whoever they are.

Senator Frith: We thought you would be.

Senator Roblin: He was fair enough to say that Mr. Fleming was a Liberal appointee, and he was twice a Liberal candidate, a fact which is mentioned in this report.

Senator Hicks: And this report also points out that he was the only member of the board with associations with the Liberal Party—the only one!

An Hon. Senator: Shame! Shame!

Senator Roblin: I find that an interesting point. He was also for two years the deputy principal secretary to Mr. Trudeau, so his credentials are well established, and we do not worry about that.

Senator Frith: No, let's get to the others.

Senator Roblin: With respect to the appointments, I think it is a little hard to say that because Robert Maguire, a public health physician from Rimouski, lives in the riding held by Monique Vézina that that is a blatant exercise of the right of patronage. He has to live some place and in the Province of Quebec most of the seats are held by Conservatives, so it is not surprising that he comes from a Conservative constituency. Of the other people who are mentioned, apart from Mr. Cheeseman and Mr. Godin, who have Conservative credentials according to this article, what about Ellen McLean, president of the International Association of Country Women? Nothing is said about her political affiliations, and I do not know what they are. My honourable friend would have done well, I think, to say that Sharon Proctor of the Vancouver Public Aquarium and John Vander Mullen of the Bedford Institute of Oceanography are also members of this committee. I do not find it at all necessary to apologize for the quality of the committee members.

Senator Frith: We didn't think you would.

Senator Roblin: I don't want to disappoint my honourable friend. I know that I seldom do disappoint him and I would not like to establish any precedent on this occasion.

Senator Frith: Especially along this line.

Senator Roblin: I should like to get to the nub of my honourable friend's question which is as to how this operation will be run in the future. We have the statement of the new president who says that:

My own inclination is to go where we can do the most good and not necessarily where they can do the most for us—

That is an expression of opinion which I find satisfactory, and he adds, and I must say this because it is part of the information:

But we've got to be aware of political reality.

I think that is a fact, too. It is necessary, if we are to have a successful operation, particularly one that will get an adequate measure of support from the public generally and also from the treasury, to take into account the interests of those people we are trying to help. This has to be the paramount concern, but I do not think it is illegitimate to say that if we can do so in a manner that helps the Canadian economy then that is not automatically or ipso facto to rule it out of bounds. I think that I can give my honourable friend the assurance that he seeks.

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Just to follow up on the question Senator Hicks asked, is it the intention of the government to add some international personalities to the board so that there will be international expertise as there has been on the board of the International Research Development Centre located in Ottawa, which has been an extremely effective model? It was in order to give international input to this international organization that those persons were selected. They had good standing in Third World countries. All of that has been removed.

I ask whether it would not be a good idea to reconsider this matter to ensure that at least three or four persons from Third World countries, who could add to the strength of the board, are included.

Senator Roblin: I think it essential that we seek the help and input we can get from those whom we are trying to assist, but I do not think it is essential that they be on the board.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand that the Minister of Justice, Mr. Crosbie, is vowing to introduce a tough anti-soliciting law. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether that will apply to Tory advertising agencies?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If it does, it will apply equally to Liberal advertising agencies.

Senator Frith: I suppose the leader might check to see if it is all right for them to do this from their own homes.

Senator Roblin: Under the Liberal administration, I do not know about it applying to this being done from their own homes. That has certain connotations which I do not wish to explore further at the moment.

However, I have to point out to my honourable friend that the process of dealing with advertising, et cetera, through a special committee which would allocate these matters from one firm to another, was the brainchild of Senator Keith Davey; he was certainly the foster father, if not the natural father, of that idea. I would tell my honourable friend that we are trying to rearrange our affairs to improve that situation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, when we start hearing about the Liberals, we always know there is no other answer to the question.

In any event, in this particular case, will the Leader of the Government agree that the whole situation does smack a bit of high "camp"?

Senator Doody: "High camp"; that is amusing.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend tells me what he means by that, I would be delighted to comment on it.

Senator Frith: Perhaps tomorrow I will address the question and speak more slowly.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can speak right now if he so wishes because I am willing to entertain the question.

Senator Frith: I cannot say it more clearly.

Senator Roblin: Pity.

Senator Frith: If the leader does not understand, then perhaps he is lacking, among other things, a sense of humour.

Senator Roblin: I have a well-developed sense of humour. I am able to chuckle at my honourable friend's joke, but if he wants to elaborate on the matter he is welcome to do so.

Senator Flynn: His jokes are not always good.

Senator Frith: To elaborate on a joke is to make it no longer a joke.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government relates to a serious matter, news of which is normally found in newspapers. Can he give us a progress report pertaining to the Garrison Dam as it affects Manitoba? While some may be of the view that this is not a serious matter, I would point out that, to those of us from Manitoba, such as the Leader of the Government and myself, it is of grave importance.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that as a result of the proceedings in the United States and the decision of the officials of the American administration, the plan for the Garrison Dam is now in shape to be accepted by Canadians.

The Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba agreed on a statement to be given to the authorities in the United States, in which they expressed their appreciation for a satisfactory solution to that problem. That means, insofar as the federal government of the United States is concerned, that the reorganization of the Garrison project is satisfactory in its protection of Manitoba interests.

With respect to the activities in the State of North Dakota, which is probably bothering my honourable friend, the legislation there seems to have come to a rather inconclusive end. For example, the cancellation of the Mandan line removed from the purview of the legislators of North Dakota any veto on the transfer of Canadian energy through their state, so that particular issue fell by the wayside.

So far as I am aware, of the seven bills which were introduced in the North Dakota legislature dealing with this matter, two were passed, but I believe their implementation is at the discretion of the Governor. At the present time, I have no indication the Governor intends to implement them.

Senator Guay: The reason I have asked for a progress report is the fact that the executive director of the United Family Farmers, Inc. in South Dakota, when recently making a representation before the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee on Appropriations, made a statement which confirmed our concern. He said:

Unfortunately, the polluted return flows that Canada doesn't want would be redirected to South Dakota if the Commission's recommendations are approved. The irrigation upstream from us in the James River valley would be tripled—to 113,360 acres. This would cause severe flooding of prime South Dakota farmland in the fall.

I would point out that the balance of this quotation is the important part. He went on to say:

Our river bottom land would be salted up and destroyed. Our Sand Lake National Wildlife Refuge—which is a major staging area for migratory waterfowl in the Central Flyway—would be severely impacted or destroyed.

His next statement was:

Our drinking water could be contaminated.

Honourable senators, this spokesman, Mr. Jay Davis, represents not 2,000 people, but 2,000 farm families. What we do not want to happen in Canada they also do not want to happen on their side of the border. I feel impelled to bring these remarks to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. This illustrates the nature of our success in having persuaded our American friends to send no water to the province of Manitoba.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION DISSOLUTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill C-43, to dissolve the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: I do not think I deserve the applause, because this is not a major piece of legislation. I will not go so far as to say that it is unimportant or straightforward, because in my experience, such statements have been magnificently rebuffed in this Chamber.

The Bill's purpose is to simplify Government administration. The rather long title substantially describes this purpose: "An Act to dissolve the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act and other Acts in consequence thereof." Practically everything has been said once we have read the title of the Bill.

I imagine a number of you know the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, and many will remember the previous corporation which was called the War Assets Disposal Corporation. This corporation was created in 1943 and had a major role to play at the time, especially at the end of the war in 1945 and in subsequent years. The corporation had been given the weighty task of disposing of surplus goods accumulated during the last war. It was subsequently replaced by the new corporation which was responsible for disposing of goods accumulating in the various departments, at the best possible price. You have all seen newspaper ads announcing sales of surplus goods by the corporation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As far as that goes, it is major legislation.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I suppose so. I do not expect any problems here, because the major decision that led to this Bill was made in 1982 by the previous Government, namely to transfer to the Department of Supply and Services the responsibility that until then had been assumed by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

All appointments of persons outside the Public Service to the board of directors have been terminated. Before, the chairman and members of the board of directors were appointed from outside the Public Service, with excellent salaries. These people have been replaced with public servants from the Department of Supply and Services. They were asked to stay on, as a matter of principle, so that today, we have a paper corporation, like a company that is no longer active once it has disposed of its assets.

The results were conclusive. The Department of Supply and Services has now absorbed the Corporation's employees and assumed the duties of the Corporation.

According to the present Minister, eliminating duplication of efforts has resulted in a saving of about $600,000. All employees have been absorbed by the Department. I gathered from the proceedings in the other place that in one or two cases, Corporation employees were not satisfied with the jobs they were given in the Department. Their grievances are now at the arbitration stage.

After this two-year trial period, the purpose of the Bill is to officially dissolve the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The Bill provides for consequential amendments, the impact of which will be to transfer all the Corporation's responsibilities to the Department, in terms of any action, suit or other legal proceedings that may be brought or were pending against the Corporation and any claims the Corporation might have on a third party. The operation is being continued by the Department. There have been no changes, either in staff or as far as the practical legal aspects are concerned, and in the consequential amendments, any reference to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has been changed to refer to the Department.

This is not a controversial Bill, and it implements a decision by the previous Government which has proved beneficial for the Government's administration and, as I said before, resulted in a saving in operating costs of over one half million dollars.

Bearing this in mind, I do not think the principle of the Bill could be challenged. However, if honourable senators would like to obtain more detailed information and I were not be able to provide it immediately, I would have no objection to having the Bill referred to a committee of this House. If I am in a position to reply, and my reply is satisfactory, I think we can dispense with the committee stage.

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to offer with respect to Bill C-43. I thank Senator Flynn for his usual erudite, detailed and explicit explanation.

I want to say that I am pleased, and somewhat relieved, that the short title of the proposed act is the "Crown Assets Disposal Corporation Dissolution Act" and not the "Crown Assets Disposal Corporation Abolition Act".

[Senator Flynn.]

The very mention of the words "disposal" and "abolition" together in today's unpredictable and somewhat nervous environment might strike terror in the hearts of some, if not all honourable senators.

I am also pleased that the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is being dissolved, as it removes yet another agency through which the government, in its present temperament, might have tried to get rid of the "moral majority" in this priceless asset.

Senator Doody: Never!

Senator Graham: This is not earth-shattering legislation, but it is, nonetheless, an important housekeeping bill. Some might even suggest that it has house-cleaning overtones. At any rate, it brings to an end an agency which, for a considerable period of time, served a useful and necessary purpose.

The corporation has undergone several name changes since it was first created in 1943, and the corporation's mandate has also changed over the years.

As has been mentioned, since 1982 almost all of the activities and the responsibilities of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation have been assumed by the Department of Supply and Services. At present it is a corporation in form only. As Senator Flynn stated, it is really what may be described as a "paper corporation."

The previous government had begun the process of dismantling the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation pursuant to recommendations contained in the Lambert Commission report. As was also suggested by Senator Flynn, this is really the final phase of a Liberal initiative.

The most substantive portion of the bill is contained in subclauses 5(1) and (2), which deal with the commencement or continuation of legal proceedings or actions related to obligations or liabilities incurred by the corporation in the past or in the process of closing out its affairs.

This, even to my untrained and, as I am sure you will agree, somewhat insensitive legal eye is a laudable protective mechanism and one for which I congratulate the government.

I understand that there is only one person still employed by the corporation, and that, probably, in a bookkeeping or some such useful function, and that most, if not all, former employees, as has already been indicated by the sponsor of the bill in the Senate, have either been transferred or offered employment in the Public Service. On that particular point, I should like to know if all of those former employees have been properly placed and whether there are any outstanding grievances—Senator Flynn mentioned one or two—resulting from the corporation's change in status.

I should like to have the assurance of the sponsor that no individual has suffered or will suffer undue hardship and that the rights of any individual Canadian will not be put in jeopardy as a result of this legislation.

Without going into specifics, will the sponsor give honourable senators some idea of the number and magnitude of any actions or liabilities that may be outstanding with respecting to crown assets and when it is perceived that any such actions or disputes may be concluded?

Further, are any major difficulties or payments anticipated? With respect to payments, they might be in the form of potential pay-outs or even receivables.

Those are my main points. I support the bill, and if my concerns and those of other honourable senators are adequately met, then I see no reason why we cannot, in our usual spirit of wholesome co-operation, deal with the bill expeditiously.

The sponsor may wish to deal with these matters today or tomorrow. If not, he may wish to recommend that we send the bill to the appropriate committee. Nevertheless, I believe that these concerns should be dealt with.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, as a former Minister of Supply and Services, allow me to share some of my thoughts with you.

The legislative machinery must turn very slowly indeed, for I vividly remember that, when I was Minister of Supply and Services, I had asked why we should have one agency to buy and another one to sell. It would have been so much easier to have only one institution—the department—to look after government purchases and sales. I am pleased to see that this practice has since been followed and that we are now confirming the fact.

My second thought, honourable senators, is that it is surprising to realize that government annual purchases amount to almost $6 billion, and that we sell surpluses valued at nearly $100 million. I would suggest that the wide gap between the two amounts indicates that there must be some leakage somewhere. Of course, a good many items bought by the government are used. When the department buys hundreds of kilos of meat for the Armed Forces, or pencils and erasers, they are used, of course. However, keeping in mind that we buy $6 billion of supplies year in and year out and that the corporation disposes of surpluses worth about $100 million, it must mean that a good many agencies do not sell their surpluses through the Department of Supply and Services or the corporation.

My third thought is that I would respectfully suggest to the government representative the possibility of adding a clause giving the minister full discretion to dispose of surplus goods, not by selling them to the highest bidder but rather to non-profit organizations and to municipalities. Here, is an example. A crown corporation had a surplus building in the riding I had the honour to represent. It was offered to the highest bidder, a gentleman who wanted to turn the building into a garage for storing snowblowers. We convinced the crown corporation to do a good deed and give the building to the municipality. It was eventually used to attract an employer who set up shop there and thus created jobs. Had the farsighted president of the crown corporation chosen to stick to the rules, the building would have gone to somebody who would now have a storage facility for his snowblowers. Fortunately, the building attracted a businessman who created jobs. I know of many other surplus buildings which, I think, municipalities or school boards could use for the common good.

I remind you that several provinces already have such a provision. Before selling any surplus goods to the general public they offer them free of charge to various public bodies.

Since it was announced recently that the government has decided to use its purchasing power to promote causes such as employment equity in major Canadian companies which deal with the government, I think that the surplus disposal policy can be used as a lever to achieve some of Canada's social and economic objectives.

Honourable senators, those are some of the thoughts inspired by this very appropriate measure.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators . . .

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform you that if the Honourable Senator Flynn speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Graham and Senator De Bané for their comments on this bill. I will do my best to provide them with the information requested. Senator De Bané mentioned the possibility of the department, now that it has the responsibility for disposing of the surplus assets, disposing of them other than by auction in cases where the assets would be helpful to non-lucrative corporations. I suggest that is possible through an amendment to the legislation.

The main purpose of the bill is to dissolve the corporation, which, up to now, has had the responsibility for the disposition of surplus assets. It is possible that such an amendment could eventually be made. I suppose the former minister did not have the occasion to propose such an amendment, but it is an idea that might be considered and eventually implemented.

With regard to Senator Graham's questions, I have before me a copy of the House of Commons Debates for April 19, 1985, which gives the minister's reply to questions relating to assets and liabilities of the corporation as of March 31, 1984. The minister's reply will be found at page 3928. The minister said:

. . . the following amounts are indicated in terms of this extraordinary income. For example, reversal of vacation pay liability, $131,262; reversal of termination benefits liability, $125,492; and the extraordinary loss, which is the lump sum settlement regarding the Montreal office accommodation lease, $95,000 for a total of extraordinary income in the amount of $161,753.

I am just reading what is here.

I hope the minister will bring the House up to date.

That was an indication given by someone, not by the minister.

● (1500)

The report on the minister's public accounts also points out that the receivables mature in 1984-85 and on up to 1999, for a total of $1,630,151, less the current portion of $263,000, giving a total for net receivables of $1,367,035.

With respect to the employees, as I said, they have all been absorbed by the Department of Supply and Services. At page 3931 of House of Commons Debates, the minister is reported to have said:

I am aware of a couple of individuals who feel that they have not been properly dealt with. They are going through due process now as members of the Public Service. Whether the Bill is passed or not does not affect their position because the Order in Council of 1982 established that they are moved into the Public Service if they so chose, and that was the procedure.

Clause 5 of the bill which deals with the transfer of assets and liabilities reads:

(1) Any action, suit or other legal proceeding in respect of an obligation or liability incurred by the Corporation, or by the Minister in closing out the affairs of the Corporation, may be brought against Her Majesty in any court that would have had jurisdiction if the action, suit or other legal proceeding had been brought against the Corporation.

(2) Any action, suit or other legal proceeding to which the Corporation is party pending in any court on the coming into force of this Act may be continued by or against Her Majesty in like manner and to the same extent as it could have been continued by or against the Corporation.

That is the information I have. If it is not satisfactory, I invite Senator Graham or any other honourable senator to so inform me and I shall try to make inquiries and introduce any information I get at third reading stage tomorrow. If someone wishes to have the bill sent to committee, I shall so move.

Senator Graham: I thank Senator Flynn for the answers he has provided. I do not see any reason to send the bill to committee. I believe Senator Flynn mentioned that by absorbing the crown assets into the Department of Supply and Services there would be a saving in printing costs of some $600,000. I wonder if he could tell us just how that saving is expected to be effected.

Senator Flynn: The only information I have in this respect is the statement made by the minister, and he does not give any details. I shall try to obtain his calculations of that amount and bring them to the Senate tomorrow, if that is satisfactory.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Flynn, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION

MOTION TO URGE GOVERNMENT TO SET ASIDE SPECIAL WEEK—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

[Senator Flynn.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That the Senate urge the Government to declare a special week for soil conservation in 1985 and every year thereafter;

That it be called National Soil Conservation Week;

That it be declared for the week May 12-19 in 1985, in conjunction with the Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week; and

That it be declared at a suitable period in subsequent years.—(Honourable Senator Doody.)

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak to the motion proposed by Senator Sparrow on April 3, 1985. Before I make any comment on the motion, I should like to pay tribute to Senator Sparrow for his dedication to the problem of soil degradation in Canada, both during the committee hearings on this subject and since the release of the report to the public on July 16, 1984 in Ottawa. On July 17, it was released across Canada by other members of the committee. Since that time Senator Sparrow has spared no effort in making the report known, and he has spoken to some 57 groups—farm groups, universities, provincial and national organizations of various kinds to name a few.

Initially, 15,000 copies of the report were printed. It soon became evident that a further 10,000 copies would be required. This supply was soon exhausted and requests for the report from across Canada as well as from other countries continued to mount. Permission to print another 10,000 copies was granted. I do not know whether or not they have been printed yet.

Because this report is so sought after, one can conclude that it contains some very pertinent, timely and worthwhile material put together in a very readable, interesting and understandable manner. For that, I should like to acknowledge the contribution of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry and express our thanks to all those who participated in the hearings across Canada and those who took the time to write to the committee to express their views. The diligence of Ms. Sally Rutherford, Director of Research, Mr. Len Christie and Mrs. Lynn Myers of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament is greatly appreciated. Mr. Denis Bouffard provided reliable assistance in the role of clerk of the committee and the hard work of Ms. Aileen Collins helped us to bring this report into being.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation whatsoever in supporting this motion. I do so in light of the confidence that the Honourable John Wise, Minister of Agriculture, has shown in speaking to various groups across the nation on this particular subject. In an address to the Kettle Creek Conservation Authority in St. Thomas, Ontario, which was released on March 15, 1985, the minister had this to say, among other things:

... our ability to produce food depends on the quality of our soils. A farmer's livelihood depends on it.

Unfortunately, Canada is rapidly losing productive land due to soil degradation. I have no hesitation in calling this the second most serious problem facing Canadian agriculture, next to the problem of farm financing.

The impact of soil erosion on farm income is not as obvious as the effect of high interest rates. Even when we see soil blowing or washing away, we don't see it as money we've lost. Yet farmers lose significantly when the quality of their soil deteriorates. Production costs are higher. Net farm income is reduced and our international competitiveness is diminished.

It is estimated that soil degradation due to erosion by water costs $68 million every year in Ontario.

Here in southwestern Ontario, where farming is so intensive, soil erosion costs farmers an estimated $56 million per year in yield reductions and increased fertilizer and pesticide costs.

On the Prairies, it is estimated that each year some 740,000 hectares of land are damaged by soil erosion. The cumulative cost to the Prairie farm economy as a result of reduced soil productivity is estimated to be $368 million per year.

In their report, Soil At Risk, released last summer, the Senate Standing Committee detailed the key problems we face in stopping soil degradation, and presented some worthy recommendations.

They found that improper tillage and cropping practices are a major cause of soil degradation in Canada. They pointed out that farmers are often not fully aware of such problems as erosion, acidity and compaction, and that there is not adequate research information available for solving these problems.

Moreover, the Senators pointed out that farmers are guided in their cropping practices by the need to maximize production at the least cost per acre.

The Senate report was welcomed by the federal government. We recognize the seriousness of the situation described in the report, and we have begun to act on its recommendations.

Among these recommendations is the need for national co-ordination of soil and water conservation policies and programs. In association with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, my department is involved in setting up a national action committee on soil conservation. Furthermore, Agriculture Canada is now in the process of developing a national agricultural soil and water strategy.

To assist in identifying the causes of soil degradation, we have reallocated funds and staff from the soil inventory section for the monitoring of soil degradation across Canada.

We have also shifted resources to soil and water conservation studies from other areas of research.

Because of the staggering deficit that the federal government inherited in September it has been necessary to reduce federal expenditures. Many areas of government are being cut back, but I assure you I will not support any reduction in soil and water research or programming.

That having been said by the minister, I feel I do not need to add anything more because obviously we do have his support.

The recommendation under discussion in the motion is Recommendation Number 17, one of 20 recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee in its report Soil At Risk.

I support this motion wholeheartedly.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

HEALTH

ILL EFFECTS OF SMOKING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the ill effects of smoking to smokers and non-smokers alike.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate at this time, I move that it be adjourned until May 14 next.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEES TO INVITE PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, generally the Senate ought to resist motions or bills that have the effect of limiting the control of the Senate over its own procedures. We have seen a fair number of such motions and bills in the last 15 to 20 years; I think this is lamentable. There is much to be said, however, in favour of standing arrangements that would enable provincial governments to make representations on motions or bills in which they have a special interest.

Senator Godfrey's motion leaves two points undecided. The first of these is the question: Who is to determine that a province has a special interest in a motion or a bill? The second question is: Who is to decide when a province has had a reasonable opportunity to make its representations? On these points, I tend to agree with what Senator Doody said earlier.

Honourable senators, the reason I wanted to say a few words about this motion is that, in an oblique way, it raises questions about the role that the Senate ought to be playing as a part of the Parliament of Canada.

It is interesting to remember that in the pre-Confederation conferences relatively little time was given to the problem of distinguishing those matters that were to be under the exclusive legislative authority of the provincial legislatures from those matters that were to be under the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada. It was thought that the list of matters set forth in section 92 was simple and clear: Those matters were to be under the provincial legislatures. The provincial legislatures were also to make law in relation to education in and for each province, with certain restrictions in relation to religion. They then continued and said that the provincial legislatures might make law with regard to agriculture in the provinces and with regard to immigration into the provinces. All other matters were to be under the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada. It was thought that that was a simple, clear and explicit division of legislative power.

Since these two sets of matters were distinct and different, the provincial authorities were to have no special relationship with either of the two houses of the Parliament of Canada. That, honourable senators, was the constitutional argument why provincial authorities were not given any part to play in the selection of members either of the House of Commons or of the Senate. Although the Senate was to be a house in which the divisions—that was the term they used—or the regions of the country were to be represented equally, the members of the Senate were to be selected, oddly enough, entirely by Ottawa.

Since then there have been two notable developments that bear on this matter. One is the acceptance of a new conception of the role of governments. Governments are now expected to create prosperity as well as to maintain peace. They are expected to create jobs; they are expected to promote economic growth; and they are expected to prevent economic disturbances. The result of that has been that matters that were thought to have been distinct and quite different have now become inextricably intertwined. It is impossible, except perhaps for an academic constitutional lawyer, to say what is distinctly a federal matter and what is distinctly a provincial matter in practice. In practice, those matters are hopelessly intermixed. That is one development.

The other development, of course, is that executive governments have become more and more dominant in their relationship to the legislatures. That has happened at Ottawa and also at the provincial capitals.

From these two developments—which make our situation quite different from that which prevailed 100 years ago—we have had the rise of federal-provincial conferences. As a result of those conferences—which take place all the time whether or not they are detected by the media—there are few bills, I suspect, that go before the Parliament of Canada on which provincial governments, if they have a genuine interest, have not made their views known to the executive government of Canada, to the cabinet, before the bill has gone very far forward in the parliamentary process. They have made their positions known. They have either been successful or unsuccessful in swaying the federal executive government.

If that is so, we can well ask: What would be gained by passing Senator Godfrey's motion? I think that there are three things to be said in that respect. The first is that Senator Godfrey's motion may encourage senators to propose amendments to bills. If a provincial government or a group of provincial governments appear before a Senate committee and make persuasive arguments, that committee, and then the Senate itself, might be prepared to propose amendments. I am not suggesting that the Senate would insist on those amendments, but those amendments would be batted up to the other place for disposal there—batted up for what one might call sober third thought.

The second thing which can be said is that even when provincial governments make their arguments to the federal government, it is not always the case that those arguments are recorded publicly, or that they receive much public attention. Senator Godfrey's motion opens up to the provincial governments the possibility of having a forum in which they could put their best case forward and deal with the questions that honourable senators might wish to address to them, either to demonstrate defects in that case, or to elicit additional information that would make the case stronger. I think that provincial governments might very well appreciate having the opportunity to appear in such a forum.

The third thing that might be said is, I think, the most important. This motion, in its own quiet way, is a step toward a more modern view of the role of the Senate in the Parliament of Canada. As I said, the Senate was established to represent the four divisions of the country. Of course, Newfoundland has been added and now there is also representation from the two territories; however, the basic representation is based on four divisions of the country. That may be reasonably realistic when one talks of a division of the country such as Ontario, which happens also to be a province; it may be realistic when talking about Quebec, a division of the country which happens also to be a province; but it is not very realistic when one is talking about the Maritime provinces division. That is just too big and amorphous an area of the country to be thought of as being represented by 24 senators. The same is even truer with regard to the four provinces west of Ontario.

Senator Godfrey's motion has the great merit of giving formal recognition for the first time to the fact that there is properly a relationship between the Parliament of Canada and the authorities in the provinces. It would be a move away from the notion that the Senate represents four divisions of the country, plus Newfoundland and the two territories, a move toward a much more realistic and, I submit, more modern notion that the Senate represents the people in the ten provinces plus the two territories.

I see Senator Godfrey's motion, whether he intended this or not, as the beginning of a move toward a reform of the role and the conception of the work of the Senate. It is principally for that reason that I think we should approve the motion.

As I said, I agree with Senator Doody that the wording of the motion begs a couple of questions. There is the question as to what a special interest is and who decides that. Then there is the question as to when it could be said that a province had had a reasonable opportunity to make its representations.

I think the point with which I started is valid, namely that this house ought not to allow external bodies, such as provincial governments, to have a vested position in its procedures. It would be unfortunate if government legislation were held up by recalcitrant provinces saying that they have a right to be heard by a Senate committee and have not yet had that opportunity. The ten provinces could take that position, and we know what that would mean.

Provided that that difficulty is overcome—and I do not think it is insuperable at all—this is a good motion. Senator Doody's suggestion that the matter be referred to a committee for the consideration of these specific questions of implementation is also sound.

I wish to congratulate Senator Godfrey for proposing this motion, and I also want to apologize to him for having imposed upon his patience for three or four weeks. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if no other senator is going to speak to this motion, I wonder if Senator Stewart would move that it be referred to committee—or would Senator Godfrey like to move that motion?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to make several comments. It never occurred to me that it would be anyone but the appropriate Senate committee itself that would make the decisions. They decide what witnesses are going to be called, and they would decide—I very carefully put in the words—general policy so that nobody is in any way bound. If they decide not to ask a province that has a special interest in the matter to appear before them, the onus is on the committee to justify that decision to those who do not agree with it, but there is nothing binding in this. This is just an expression of intent. In committee if there is any feeling that it could be improved, or if there should be another clause added to show that it is still up to the committee to decide—

Senator Frith: Including whether there is a special interest.

Senator Godfrey: Exactly, but the committee may not always agree. I should like to give one instance. I found great reluctance two years and nine months ago, before I originally put this motion, for committees to ask provincial representatives to appear before them. You may recall the bill which dealt with transportation companies was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Frith: That was Bill S-31.

Senator Godfrey: The chairman of the committee sent out an invitation to the provinces in which she said the committee would be pleased to hear their representations provided they confined themselves to constitutional matters. We were told that Quebec would never come before a Senate committee, but Mr. Parizeau came before the committee and gave evidence for three hours. He started off by saying that he was not the slightest bit interested in the constitutional aspects of that bill and he wanted to get down to the merits of it. The result of his and other representations was that we brought out a report and the bill was not proceeded with. I am using that as an example.

I detected in the past a certain reluctance by some committee chairmen to ask provincial representatives to appear before their committees. The purpose of this resolution is really almost to shift the onus, but certainly not to interfere in any way with the discretion of the committee. In view of the doubts that have been raised, the report of the committee might take care of some of these questions without even amending the resolution.

I have spoken to Senator Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, who said that he would be happy to consider this matter. Therefore, I move that it be referred to that committee.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am somewhat concerned because I was not under the impression that Senator Godfrey was speaking to close the debate. I thought he was answering a few questions that had been raised. I hope that his intervention will be considered as answers to questions.

Senator Frith: The point was never put by the Speaker.

Senator Roblin: That is right, and that is why I raise it now, and I think honourable senators will agree to look at it in that way. I say that for reasons of certainty and to pay due attention to the regular course of business here. By that I mean that if we wish it to be referred to committee, we will have to say so. I think that arrangements have been made to propose such an amendment to the motion, and I leave that point of order on the Table.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, to follow up on the remarks made by Senator Roblin, I wish to move an amendment to the motion. As I understand the rule, it requires the motion to be withdrawn in order to take it off the order paper. The proposed amendment will then move that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. We, on this side, have no objection to the motion as proposed by Senator Godfrey. I want to reiterate that the proposed amendment is merely a technical one in order to refer the subject matter to committee.

Therefore, honourable senators, in amendment, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the motion be withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the reason I did not advise the chamber a while ago that if Senator Godfrey were to speak now it would have the effect of closing the debate was because it was my understanding that another honourable senator was to move a motion. I now read:

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald,

That the motion be withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have no basis for quarrelling with this procedure, but I would like it clarified. It seems to me that if we want to refer the subject matter of a motion, then, obviously, this is the right procedure. Do I understand that it is out of order to refer a motion to a committee?

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Frith: Then, why is the motion not being referred to the committee? Perhaps it is out of order to do so, but it is news to me if it is. I am really not trying to cause any problems here but I am curious to know if it is a fact that a motion itself cannot be referred to a committee. Must it be the subject matter? If it can be the motion itself, then when we consider that the debate has taken place on the motion, it would be much better to refer the motion rather than the subject matter of the motion to committee.

Senator Doody: I am simply acting on the best advice that I can get, which is the advice of the learned people at the Table, and they have advised me that this is the correct way to proceed. If there is some difference of opinion or difficulty with that, we can go further into it.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we can leave it. It is an important matter, but it is not urgent that it be dealt with today. Can we ask that the debate on the point of order be adjourned until tomorrow and that the Speaker make a ruling on this question? The question is: Is it in order to refer a motion to a committee, as distinct from the subject matter of a motion? The Speaker could give us a ruling on that tomorrow, and we could proceed accordingly.

Senator Godfrey: It does not matter to me one way or the other, but it seems to make a lot of sense that you should be able to refer the actual motion to committee, and then it can, if necessary, be amended in the committee, but I bow to the experts.

Senator Roblin: The problem with using the wording of the motion is that it commits us to what is expressed in the terms of the motion. That is something that this particular mechanism does not do. I believe that is the reason why the motion is withdrawn and the subject matter referred. Because if the motion itself were adopted and simply referred to the committee, that would be quite a different thing from what is proposed in the amendment. Without presenting myself as an authority on the rules, I would suggest that that is the probable reason. However, we have absolutely no objection to the request of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I am sure that His Honour will reserve the matter and we can deal with it at another time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, what I am interested in is the point as to whether it can be done. It may well be that we will get a ruling saying that it is quite proper to refer the motion, and yet we will agree to refer the subject matter to committee. I just want the point clarified.

Senator Godfrey: The subject I became interested in a few years ago related to the question as to whether or not you could refer a bill to a committee without having agreed to the principle on second reading. We actually did so and I think we have established that as a precedent. I would not want to put forward the idea that referring a motion to a committee means that you are approving that motion any more than referring a bill to a committee, as we did a few years ago, means that we established a precedent for approving a bill without second reading.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, perhaps the solution would be that the motion be not now put, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. That is the way we sometimes do it on second reading or third reading. An honourable senator moves that the bill be not now read but that the subject matter be referred. I assume we could adopt the same course for a motion.

Senator Frith: Let us ask to have that point covered in the ruling.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment.

● (1540)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Are you moving the adjournment of the debate on the motion?

Senator Frith: I am moving the adjournment of the debate on the motion in amendment.

Senator Nurgitz: And whatever else there might be.

Senator Frith: And anything else we may find ought to be adjourned!

On motion of Senator Frith, debate on motion in amendment adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Dr. Paul David, has been summoned to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated.

Hon. Paul David, of Outremont, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Duff Roblin, P.C., and Hon. Martial Asselin, P.C.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, there are certain customs which might be described as being traditions of this chamber. I do not agree with some of those, one of which is that of not having welcoming speeches to new senators by the leaders in this house. I do not approve of that tradition and, therefore, I am going to break it.

I wish to welcome Senator David to the Senate. The Prime Minister has made an excellent choice and should be congratulated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: I suspect that on the strength of the appointment of Senators Doyle and David the Prime Minister will now feel free to make 500 or so partisan appointments to various government boards and agencies.

My hope is that Senator David enjoys being a senator as much as I do. Like everything else in this world, the more one puts into something the more one gets out. I should like to give one friendly word of advice. Last year when the Liberal Party was in government Senator Frith, the then Deputy Leader of the Government, referred to me as being a part of the "unofficial opposition." I rose and vigorously denied that and told him that I was one of the most loyal Liberals in the Senate; I was so loyal that I always tried to improve government legislation. I suggest to Senator David that if he takes the same attitude and always tries to improve government legislation, he will be more loyal to the Conservative Party and the government than he would be if he were to rubber-stamp supinely all government legislation.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I cannot let Senator Godfrey's provocation go unanswered. As far as his words of welcome are concerned, I wish he had said them on behalf of all senators, and especially those sitting on this side of the house who support the present government. We are very happy to see our troops reinforced by the distinguished presence of Senator David.

Regarding the advice he received today from Senator Godfrey, I would urge Senator David to be very circumspect. I remember, and no one who was here at the time will ever forget, that when Senator Godfrey arrived in the Senate a few days after he took his seat, he decided to lecture the members of this chamber, telling them their experience did not count and that he knew how the Senate ought to be run. I think that since then he has had reason to regret saying this. In any case, he has very often had occasion to regret what he says. That is why I would say to Senator David: Listen to Senator Godfrey, but think twice about taking his advice.

• (1410)

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, as a Quebecer and a member of the same generation as Dr. David, I am very pleased with his appointment and I want to say this publicly and for all to hear. I wish to offer him my congratulations and best wishes on his arrival in the Senate.

Dr. David, your grandfather and your father were mentioned in the press, but you yourself pursued a career in areas unknown to your father and your grandfather.

Your grandfather, L.-O. David, was a well-known journalist in Quebec at the turn of the century. It was no secret that he was a friend of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He wrote a biography of Sir Wilfrid, and I am the proud owner of a first edition. He also published a book on the patriots of 1837, a book we all read in high school with considerable emotion. The last pages of the book contained the stirring and moving speeches made by those who had been sentenced to death. This group of young people, most of whom came from my part of the province, announced the day before they were hanged, in a kind of farewell speech, that they would never give up their ideals.

Your father Athanas was Secretary of the Province of Quebec, at the time when the Department of the Secretary of the Province of Quebec was the Department of Education. The David Prize remains the most sought-after literary prize in Quebec and is a monument to its founder. I remember your father as a skilful orator.

I remember because I have a good memory, but I lack your father's eloquence. There was also—I am not sure senators from outside Montreal would know—a Mrs. David, the wife of Athanas and the doctor's mother. She worked tirelessly for the arts in Montreal, especially in organizing the Montreal Symphony Orchestra during the black years of the depression. I remember as a schoolboy going to concerts at the "chalet de la montagne". We sat on any folding chairs that were available. That was a very special time. We did not have the elegant concert halls we have or expect to have in Montreal. This was something that had to be done, and I believe it was a glorious chapter in your family's history.

A great deal has been said in praise of your father and grandfather. I think we could also mention your maternal grandfather. If I am not mistaken, he was a Conservative minister in the cabinet of Sir Robert Borden during the First World War. Is that right, Senator Flynn?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Yes, and I suppose that probably had some effect on the Prime Minister!

Senator Riel: I think the Prime Minister must have laughed when he read my latest speech, because he has managed to appoint people, at least in this particular case, with a reputation for being independent.

In concluding, Doctor David, I may say that although your family had made quite a name for itself in Quebec, you have been successful in your own way.

You were never involved in politics. You were dedicated to your profession, to your art at the Montreal Institute for Cardiology of which you are the founder and guiding spirit. Among our politicians from Quebec, you are probably one of the most famous, on an equal footing with people like Trudeau, Mulroney, Drapeau and even Gilles Vigneault and Jean Béliveau. You are one of the most highly respected Quebecers in Quebec and across Canada.

We are therefore delighted and proud to have you in the Senate. You will find some excellent colleagues, but you yourself are bringing something unique and valuable to the Senate. I am referring to the tremendous prestige you enjoy in Quebec, among Canadians and internationally, a prestige that you have earned on your own merits.

Welcome, Doctor David.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1985

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-18, to amend the Criminal Code, to amend an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to amend the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act, the Parole Act and the Weights and Measures Act, to repeal certain other Acts and to make other consequential amendments.

[Senator Riel.]

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

CUSTOMS ACT SPECIAL IMPORT MEASURES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-40, to confirm certain acts or things done on behalf of the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise and to amend the Customs Act and the Special Import Measures Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SUPPORT AND GOVERNMENT POLICY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, April 30, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the importance of research and development in every province and territory and the need for caution and sensitivity in the realignments of support, and of policy by government, which relates to research and development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Explain.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Most honourable senators are aware that, through the co-operation of the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, we now have authorized under that committee the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. Today at 3.30 p.m. we have as witnesses representatives of the Prisoners of War Association, and the women veterans of that association will be presenting a brief. The reason we would like the meeting to be held at 3.30 is one of timing; the witnesses are driving here.

I would also like to mention that there are 29 members of this chamber who are veterans. I extend an invitation to all of them to come, either while the meeting is in progress or afterwards—it should end by about 4.30 p.m.—to meet some of these veterans and to show them that we recognize their good work over the years.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g) moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 30, 1985 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should mention the obvious, that Senator Roblin is unavoidably absent this afternoon—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): How can you tell?

Senator Doody: —because he has been called to a meeting. It was the “unavoidable” part that I wanted to stress and the fact that he is not merely in the next room but is in another building. In his absence I would be pleased to take notice of questions, or perhaps honourable senators might wish to wait until Tuesday. I am at the disposal of the Senate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAYMENT OF PARKING TICKETS BY CANADIAN DIPLOMATS ABROAD

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this morning's Globe and Mail contains an interesting article by John Fraser.

Senator Flynn: Not the Globe and Mail again!

Senator Godfrey: Yes, the Globe and Mail. The article is headed “British plan to impose curbs on diplomatic corps abuses.” It says, in part:

... what annoys most Londoners is the parking scandal. As they drive blocks away from their destinations to find parking spaces, the sight of gleaming, high-priced cars with diplomatic licences parked in illegal spots draws instant ire.

The five worst offenders were Nigeria, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Brazil and Iraq, which together accounted for nearly 25,000 unpaid tickets last year. Canada had 42 unpaid tickets, but Australia, New Zealand, the Grenadines and St. Lucia had none.

My question to the acting leader is: Would he bring this matter to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and see that in the future any Canadian diplomats who receive parking tickets for illegal parking are told that they should pay those tickets so that we can reach the height of purity of Australia, New Zealand, the Grenadines and St. Lucia in that respect?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): By a happy coincidence, even as I speak, the Leader of the Government in the Senate is attending a meeting at External Affairs. If we could get that message down to him by hand, he might be able to return with the answer for the next sitting. In the unhappy event that that is not possible, I will certainly undertake to get the information to my colleague.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—HON. FLORENCE BIRD

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, my question today is for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Since the unwarranted dismissal of Florence Bird, I have had a great many people call and ask what the Senate is doing with regard to having Florence Bird reinstated as a member of the Refugee Advisory Council. This dismissal is not only a reflection on this chamber but a reflection on the qualities of an extraordinary woman who, because of her long experience in world affairs as a CBC producer and delegate to international conferences, has accumulated a fund of knowledge on refugee problems—

Senator Asselin: Senator Wood, Senator Marsden has already asked that question.

Senator Wood: I am not concerned about that. I wish to put my question today.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration, Flora MacDonald, said that the government—

... has decided to bring in some new people who would keep up the high standards and would appoint persons who have humanitarian concerns at heart.

Does this mean that Florence Bird could no longer keep up the standard, or that she has become less qualified or less concerned about people?

Therefore, my question to the Acting Leader of the Government today is this: Can we not unite, both sides of this chamber, and recommend, through you, to the Prime Minister that Florence Bird be reinstated in her position?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question is very similar to a question asked of the Leader of the Government in the Senate yesterday, and to which he replied. I think he spoke for all of us when he said that the Honourable Florence Bird was, indeed, a distinguished ex-member of this chamber, and he expressed our admiration for her work and ability.

With regard to the preamble to your question, Senator Wood, as to her dismissal being unwarranted, obviously I am not in a position to comment on that. I have no idea what the grounds were. I know that the minister has been quoted as saying that she has tremendous admiration for the work that Senator Bird has done. To say that she was "replaced," I think, would be a kinder word to use than "dismissed." I do not think that a dismissal was ever in the mind of the minister. The word "dismissal" has a certain unpleasant connotation in the circumstances. I appreciate the sentiments of Senator Wood, and I will certainly make what inquiries I can.

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—DR. URSULA FRANKLIN

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and today I would be very happy to have my question taken as notice. I think the situation to which my question relates is getting more and more confused. Yesterday I asked a question about Professor Ursula Franklin and her appointment to the AECB. In response to that question, Senator Roblin said:

The fact appears to be, however, that she never was appointed, but she was advised of the probability, it appears, incorrectly.

I phoned Professor Franklin this morning and she read to me a letter dated 15th April, postmarked April 16th received Monday the 22nd of April 1985 under the signature of what was very clearly the Minister of Energy which was delivered to her home. In this letter, it is said by the minister to Professor Franklin:

We are delighted to confirm your appointment for two years effective immediately.

Shortly thereafter, Professor Franklin was telephoned by someone from the AECB to arrange meetings and briefings. So, as far as they were concerned, she was now a member of this board. Of course, hitherto, she had not known anything about this appointment except from a comment that had appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. This is, therefore, all very confusing.

Today, we read in the Gazette that the assistant to the minister, Mr. Hutton, is quoted as saying that Professor Franklin was not aware of her proposed appointment when Mr. Mulroney and his cabinet scuttled the appointment last Friday.

[Senator Wood.]

My questions are: Who was right? Was the minister right? Was there ever an order in council? Were there two orders in council? What exactly happened in the case of Professor Franklin, who has not yet had an opportunity to say whether she would or would not like to serve on that board?

• (1430)

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): I can certainly take the question as notice and undertake to obtain information. As the honourable senator presents the situation, it certainly does sound quite confusing.

JURISDICTION OVER SERVICES

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have heard—and I do not know whether what I have heard is accurate or not—that the Chief of the Senate Security Service has been ordered to report to the Chief of Security in the House of Commons. I do not understand what that means. I wonder if that is a fact and, if so, if that means the services of the Senate are going to be under the heads of the services in the House of Commons.

I have noticed that the Restaurant of Parliament is being run by the staff of the House of Commons. Is this going to be the pattern in the future? Is the Senate going to be subservient to the other place?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): To answer the last part of the question first, I think I speak for all honourable senators when I say that the Senate has no intention of being subservient to the other place now or at any other time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Doody for leader!

Senator Doody: Where were you in '79?

Senator Frith: You never asked for my support.

Senator Flynn: We supported you often enough.

Senator Doody: With regard to the part of the question respecting the Chief of the Senate Security Service, I have not heard anything of that nature. I shall certainly pass the message on to the Honourable the Speaker. I am sure that in one of his various capacities he will be only too pleased to look into the matter for us.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

LONG-TERM ILLEGAL MIGRANTS REVIEW COMMITTEE— POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION OF CONDUCT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, questions were asked yesterday about the Greenbaum Toronto immigration matter. The answer that was given was that Mr. Greenbaum had resigned, and that has been confirmed by subsequent reports.

My question is: Does the government consider that the end of it? Have the whole exposé and information and sins disclosed now been purged by the resignation of Mr. Greenbaum, or are there other investigations under way?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I note with interest the chronology of the discourse; the announcement was made yesterday by the Leader of the Government and subsequently confirmed by the Globe and Mail.

Senator Frith: I did not mention the Globe and Mail.

Senator Doody: I just wanted to give the Globe and Mail a plug, too, since everyone else does that here once a day.

With respect to the rest of the question, I will have to take it as notice. I have no idea, quite honestly.

Senator Frith: Perhaps at the same time the Acting Leader of the Government will take into account another aspect to this affair, or another dimension to it. I raise this because, in spite of the resignation of Mr. Greenbaum, the minister has said that she had been assured by Mr. Greenbaum that there had been no impropriety in his actions, but that she felt the nature of his position was such that any hint of impropriety or controversy would undermine confidence in the process.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED IMPROPRIETY OF MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The government is taking the position with respect to certain statements that have been made regarding the budget and advertising contracts that there was no impropriety. I am thinking particularly of some aspects relating to conflict of interest raised by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. Since I do not think anyone could say there is no hint of impropriety in those cases—we think there is more than a hint—will the Acting Leader of the Government, when taking up this question, ask whether the principle which was applied in the case of Mr. Greenbaum will be applied equally in the case of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): That is really stretching it.

Senator Flynn: This is not the first time he has done that.

Senator Doody: I have great difficulty in accepting that parallel with as much ease as the honourable the Deputy Leader of the Opposition accepts it. To say that "nobody could say that there was not a hint" is obviously wrong. Somebody has obviously said that there was a hint of impropriety.

In any event, I have difficulty with the question. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will give me an opportunity to read the proceedings before I pursue it. The tie-in between Mr. Greenbaum and the other incident is tenuous, at best.

Senator Frith: Let me spell it out more clearly in case the record of the proceedings is not clear enough to the acting leader. The principle that was applied in the case of Mr.

Greenbaum was that, although the government was satisfied, apparently, that there was no impropriety, the possibility of there being any hint of impropriety was such that Mr. Greenbaum ought to resign.

Now, there have certainly been hints of impropriety and conflict of interest with reference to the matters raised in this place regarding the budget and advertising contracts. I am simply asking if that same principle—that which was applied to Mr. Greenbaum—is going to be applied by the government to the Minister of Finance, and if not, why not?

Senator Doody: I am beginning to think that I am glad you were not around in 1979.

Senator Frith: But I was.

Senator Flynn: It did not show.

Senator Frith: You're the last to be able to say that, Senator Flynn.

Senator Doody: In any event, I shall attempt to find out what I can for the honourable gentleman. I do not accept the premise on which he has based his question, but I will certainly attempt to obtain whatever information I can.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION DISSOLUTION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the third reading of Bill C-43, an Act to dissolve the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Yesterday, honourable senators, I promised Senator Graham to answer a question he had directed to me concerning the savings of about $600,000 which seem to have resulted, so far anyway, from the transfer of responsibilities of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation to the Department of Supply and Services.

I now have the answer. Producing the financial statement represents savings of $10,000. The reduction in overlapping duties amounts to 16 person-years, or $670,000. The salary of the five members of the board of directors who have been dismissed—public servants are now acting directors and receive no salary in that capacity—is a saving of $6,500. Another $10,000 comes from eliminating the distribution of the financial statement. There is a saving of $2,000 concerning liability insurance coverage for members of the board of directors, I imagine. All that adds up to $698,000. That is the information I have about the $600,000 figure I gave yesterday.

I would like to apologize to the Senate. Yesterday, in answer to Senator Graham's question concerning assets and liabilities of the corporation dissolved by this bill, I quoted figures taken from the House of Commons Debates. I said that it was the minister's reply, but I was wrong. It was the speech of Mr. Jim Fulton, the Member for Skeena, in which he quoted the latest annual report of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. I should think that the figures were accurate since they came from the annual report, but my mistake was to attribute the comments to the minister rather than to Mr. Fulton. I apologize.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, Senator Graham also raised in his speech yesterday a question concerning the employees. If I remember well, Senator Flynn also stated some facts on the same matter in his introductory remarks. Owing to Senator Graham's absence today, I should like to obtain further details. Was Senator Graham pleased with the reply he was given on the career and situation of employees affected by that change?

Senator Flynn: Yes, he was pleased. Moreover, I spoke to him after the sitting. The information which I provided during the debate yesterday comes this time from the minister's statement. It is clear that only two former employees of the corporation were not happy about their new duties in the Department of Supply and Services. Their case was submitted to arbitration, in accordance with the Public Service procedure which is now under way.

Senator Frith: Was Senator Graham pleased with that explanation?

Senator Flynn: I think that no other explanation could be provided at the moment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you support the motion of senator Flynn?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION

MOTION TO URGE GOVERNMENT TO SET ASIDE SPECIAL WEEK CONCURRED IN

On the Order:

[Senator Flynn]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That the Senate urge the Government to declare a special week for soil conservation in 1985 and every year thereafter;

That it be called National Soil Conservation Week;

That it be declared for the week May 12-19 in 1985, in conjunction with the Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week; and

That it be declared at a suitable period in subsequent years.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

● (1450)

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I am happy to join with Senator Sparrow and other senators who have supported his motion to establish a National Soil Conservation Week. Some senators will know that, during its study, the Committee on Soil Conservation visited my native region of New Brunswick, which is famous for growing potatoes of unequalled quality in Canada.

However, potatoes are grown in extremely delicate soil. We have been aware for many years of the need to find foolproof methods to eliminate or reduce as much as possible the disastrous effects of soil erosion.

The Senate committee mentioned this fact. Senator Sparrow asks now and rightly so, that the public be made aware of the need to act more quickly in order to conserve our soil in Canada, whatever problems might cause its degradation.

In passing, I should say that the previous government under the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau and his Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, had recognized the seriousness of soil erosion in the potato producing region of New Brunswick. We had indeed negotiated with the province of New Brunswick a development agreement under which considerable amounts, millions of dollars, had been allocated to help and encourage farmers to use improved methods and the best technology available to eliminate the harmful effects of erosion.

Naturally, this was only a beginning. I do not intend to claim that we had dealt with all the problems at the time. It was a beginning. I sincerely wish that this and future governments, in cooperation with the provincial administrations, will be able to build on what has already been done. At least, such is the wish of the farmers concerned.

The notion of putting aside a week to educate the public about the need to conserve our soil has a mostly symbolic value. In fact, I do not think that it will really change, anything. At the most, it could justify in the eyes of the Canadian taxpayers the allocation of funds by the various government levels wishing to deal seriously with the problem of soil degradation in this country.

The recommendation of the Committee to establish a Soil Conservation Week is No. 17 in a long list of recommendations. I agree with previous speakers that the 16 recommendations before No. 17 now under consideration are much more important. They require more urgent attention than they have been given so far.

Recommendation No. 1, which urges the federal, provincial and territorial governments to get together and join their efforts in addressing that problem in a more direct way than in the past has not been heeded to date.

Some time ago I rose in this chamber and asked that the item be placed on the agenda for the next first ministers's conference. I think this request just went unnoticed. The conference was held, but no one raised the issue. Almost a year after the committee report was tabled, there is still no agenda before us to indicate the direction in which the government wants to go to tackle that problem of soil degradation.

At any rate, farmers are not going to wait indefinitely for the government to show some leadership. Admittedly there are programs in place in each of the provinces, programs in conjunction with the central administration. But the Senate committee study did lay emphasis on the enormity of the problem. This is why all levels of government are urged to consult with the main parties involved with a view to launching an emergency program. We must go on repeating this if we are to get the government to finally consider the matter.

It is not enough to ask officials at the various levels of government to discuss the matter. There must be a positive and deliberate will of the governments themselves to alert the bureaucrats, the farming community and Canadians as a whole, and to exercise leadership and deal with this matter once and for all.

The process of erosion started the day the first settler set foot in this country. Certainly native peoples, Indians or Inuits, cannot be blamed for degrading our soil. The first settlers and all the generation that followed brought about the problem of soil degradation. We, the white people, have practically exterminated the Atlantic salmon. That extermination is not due to the native peoples.

It is about time we showed a positive will to tackle that problem, not in any casual way, with a bandaid here and a bandaid there, a few million dollars in one year and then nothing, with the excuse that all the governments have huge deficits.

The motion now before us is somewhat of a symbol. I support it. It certainly is not enough in the eyes of our farmers. If we are to avoid having some day to import food from abroad or from developing nations or from our neighbours down south, it is high time we woke up. Our total development potential has not even reached its cruising speed. While we reclaim new soils, others that have been farmed for a few centuries already are laid fallow.

This is what I had to say, honourable colleagues. I would like to join Senator Sparrow, and also—in a non-partisan way—all other senators (especially Senator Bielish) who are most concerned about this problem. They are calling for a greater effort with respect to soil problems in the prairies, with which I must say I am less familiar. I am very well aware of the soil degradation problems in the maritimes. I can tell you and repeat what others are saying, that this is urgent.

However, I am pleased today to call your attention on the fact that the New Brunswick Agronomists' Institute recognized, no later than 15 days ago, the merits of the Association for Soil and Farming Improvement of the Grand-Sault area, which has been the leader in soil conservation in New Brunswick. The Agronomists' Association has recognized the merit of that farmers' association this year by giving them an award for their meritorious work accomplished in the area of erosion abatement, and therefore soil conservation.

It is the first time that such a group has been given credit in New Brunswick. The committee contacted that group when they travelled to New Brunswick last year.

Honourable senators who were on that trip will be happy to hear that indeed positive, creative things are being done in New Brunswick, the province I am first and foremost concerned with.

I am afraid however that if we are to expect a greater effort still, that group will need the support of the central government, and more significant help from the provincial administration.

I therefore support the concept of an environment week, I am all for it. Let us not forget however the 16 critical and even more serious resolutions that stand before resolution No. 17 in the committee report. Let us go forward, let us promote public awareness. God knows we do not have to promote awareness among farmers who are the most concerned. What they want is sound technical support, because too often in the past they have had to listen to pseudo-experts who have led them into dead-end mazes with sometimes the loss of precious monetary resources. Let us talk about soil conservation, but above all let us act. I thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Sparrow has moved, seconded by Honourable Senator Molgat:

That the Senate urge the Government to declare a special week for soil conservation in 1985 and every year thereafter;

That it be called National Soil Conservation Week;

That it be declared for the week May 12-19 in 1985, in conjunction with the Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week; and

That it be declared at a suitable period in subsequent years.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, do I understand that Senator Sparrow does not wish to close the debate on the matter? Do we have information to that effect?

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Sparrow has not indicated that he wanted to speak on the matter.

Senator Frith: We have had no indication to that effect.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, that is correct.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the indication I received from Senator Sparrow, when he introduced the resolution, was that he was anxious that the debate be concluded as quickly as possible. He was hoping to catch up with the time frame set by the minister for the specification of the date suggested in the motion. I suspect that the sooner the debate is completed, the happier he will be.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEES TO INVITE PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that the motion be withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this motion has been stood to await a ruling from His Honour the Speaker on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that the ruling requested by Senator Frith on Senator Phillips' motion in amendment will be given on Tuesday next.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week I raised a number of questions concerning the dismissal—I think that is the correct word—of Betty Hewes from the chair of CN and that of the Honourable Florence Bird from the Refugee Advisory Council and the cancellation of the appointment of Professor Ursula Franklin. If the leader has delayed answers to those questions, could we have them now?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think my colleague, Senator Doody, took those questions as notice last Thursday, and when the reply is available I will be glad to produce it.

Senator Marsden: Last week the government leader said that he shared our concern about the circumstances under which the Honourable Florence Bird's appointment was not renewed. I wonder if over the weekend he had an opportunity to talk to her and clarify that situation.

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that I did exactly what my honourable friend has said I did. I certainly made known my high opinion of Senator Florence Bird, but I doubt that I said anything about the other aspects surrounding the point that my honourable friend raised, simply because I do not know them. When I do know them, I will be glad to report further.

Senator Marsden: May I ask him, then, what steps he will take to discover these circumstances; that is, could he please tell us whether he is planning to talk to Senator Bird or whether he is planning to take some other approach?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will have all the information I am able to provide when the reply to the question is made available.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT

BONN, WEST GERMANY—UNITED STATES INTEREST RATE POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can tell us what position the Prime Minister and his ministers will be taking at the Economic Summit, particularly with respect to the interest rate policy followed by the United States.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think I would like to scoop my leader by sharing with my honourable friend any information I have about what form his activities will take at the summit. He has made certain statements himself about some of the matters which he expects to raise at the summit, and I really have nothing further to add to those. I expect that when he returns to Canada, or perhaps as the meetings progress, we will have further information.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the Prime Minister will be making any criticisms of the interest rate policy being pursued by the United States?

It is stated publicly that European governments will be asking the President of the United States to take steps to reduce interest rates. That has been the position taken at previous summits. In those summits, the Canadian government, along with the European governments, took precisely the same view, that being that the interest rate policy of the United States was misguided. Now it is stated publicly that Canada will line up totally with the United States.

Can the Leader of the Government set our minds at ease on this point and tell us that the Prime Minister will indeed be urging the United States to moderate its high interest rate policy?

Senator Roblin: I am sure that a recurring theme at this summit will be the desire of everybody—and I imagine that that includes the President of the United States as well—to see some improvement in the situation respecting interest rates. We all want to see interest rates lowered; but I think we have to take into account that one of the factors—perhaps not the only one—that bears on this situation is not only the economic strength within the United States itself but the budgetary situation. It would seem a little difficult for the Prime Minister of Canada, who is now faced with a budget deficit proportionally larger than the budget deficit of the United States, to tell them how to handle their deficit, which is part of the problem with interest rates.

So, I think that you may expect that the Government of Canada will align its policy closely with that of the United States, insofar as it suits the interests of Canada to do so, but no further than that.

Senator MacEachen: I take it, then, that the Prime Minister will indeed be condemning the high interest rate policy of the United States, because such a policy is certainly not in the interests of Canada.

I must say, I disagree with the Leader of the Government when he states that because we have a high deficit, we ought to be mute with respect to the budgetary position of the United States government. The fact of the matter is, the size of the Canadian deficit does not impinge upon other countries of the world, whereas the size of the American deficit, along with the resultant high interest rates, has a profound effect on the economies of other countries, including Canada.

The reason I thought the Prime Minister would be vigorous in his appeal to the United States to reduce its interest rates is that the Prime Minister said that he intended to be the spokesman for the poor nations of the world at the summit, and of course we all know that the heaviest burden that the poor countries carry is the debt burden, which is in large measure caused by the very high American interest rates.

Will the Prime Minister be appealing to the President of the United States, if he is speaking for the poor countries, to take some additional measures to ease the debt burden? Or indeed, does the Canadian government have measures that it will be proposing to assist the poor countries in meeting their very heavy debt burden?

Senator Roblin: I agree with a good deal of what my honourable friend has said about the problems that face the world on account of high interest rates. I do not think for one minute that the Prime Minister of this country is himself happy about the fact that that is so. But my honourable friend is really asking me to second guess what the Prime Minister may say, or, failing that, to tell him in advance what the Prime Minister is going to say, and those are things that I cannot do. If my honourable friend will wait for a little while, the full position of the Government of Canada, as expressed by the Prime Minister, will be revealed for his examination, and for the examination of others.

Senator MacEachen: Just on that point, which has not been held secret by the Prime Minister, namely, that he intended to speak to the summit on behalf of the poor countries, in view of the fact that the government in its economic statement last fall reduced substantially its support for the poor countries, does this new view taken by the Prime Minister mean that we can expect the restoration of the aid that was cut by Mr. Wilson in the economic statement?

Senator Roblin: If the honourable senator takes note of the total amount of aid being provided by the Canadian government to Third World countries, he will find that it has not been reduced, but that it has, in fact, been increased substantially, mainly on account of the famine in Ethiopia but also for other reasons. I believe my honourable friend will find that the Canadian government will discharge its undoubted obligations to the Third World countries in a manner acceptable to the public.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I disagree with the Leader of the Government. If he looks back to the statement made by Mr. Wilson, he will realize that in that statement the amount of aid to the poorer countries of the world was cut by about $1 billion, with effect from the time of the statement to 1990, because the target figure of reaching .7 per cent of the GNP was extended, and the new target set for 1990 reduced the amount of aid in that period by, in my estimation, approximately $1 billion. I was very unhappy about that, and I wondered, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister that he was to speak at the summit for the poorer countries, whether he would put his own house in order and restore that lost aid.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will cast his mind back a few years, he will find that the setting of goals for the achievement of targets in connection with aid to Third World countries has been subject to variation over time. He will recall that in his own administration a similar rescheduling of this obligation was proposed and carried out. Therefore, it should come as no surprise if he finds that we vary it from time to time.

Senator MacEachen: It did come as a surprise, because the Secretary of State for External Affairs, just a few weeks before Mr. Wilson's announcement, told the United Nations that the target set by Canada would be honoured. Therefore, I was surprised that Mr. Wilson should have dishonoured it, but I was somewhat heartened by the Prime Minister's new-found interest in the Third World, which led me to believe that he might be ready to reverse Mr. Wilson in this case. But the Leader of the Government tells me that is not the case.

Senator Roblin: I tell my honourable friend that he will have to wait until the Prime Minister has made his statement about Third World countries to know what the facts are.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REPLACEMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a series of questions for the Leader of the Government. I am seeking information concerning the CN board. My first question is: Has the government asked for the resignation of all or some of the members of that board? If so, can he tell us why such resignations have been asked for, in view of the fact that those appointments are term appointments? Have the resignations been forthcoming, or are negotiations proceeding with reference to those resignations? Also, have any Canadian persons who are eligible been advised that they will be appointed to replace that board if the resignations are forthcoming?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am afraid that what my honourable friend reports to me comes as speculation. I have no information on the matter whatsoever. If there has been any newspaper speculation on it—and if there has been, then I must admit that I have missed it—I know of no facts at the present time that would support it. However, I will make some inquiries to see if there is anything that I can tell my honourable friend.

Senator Frith: I was not meaning to inform. I was asking for the information. As I understand it, the Leader of the Government will try to get that information for us.

Senator Roblin: Yes. To the extent that I am able to do so, I will report.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CANADA-ALBERTA MEMORANDUM OF UNDERSTANDING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, a few days ago I asked the Leader of the Government if he could provide us with a copy of the Canada-Alberta memorandum of agreement on technology, and he undertook to do so. He undertook to do so and to give an expanded explanation of what activities could be expected as a result of this memo. I think we have received the actual wording of the agreement but an expansion of what it will lead to did not accompany the agreement. Since there are a number of people from Alberta who are asking me what the response to my question was, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would give an undertaking, now, that a response will be provided reasonably soon.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must say that my honourable friend is one up on me if he has a copy of the document because I do not have one. However, I intend to answer the question, as was my undertaking.

Senator Olson: Could the government leader give us some indication of when we will get the reply?

Senator Roblin: I think the customary answer is "with all convenient speed."

Senator Frith: I think we used to say "due speed".

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF PRESIDENT REAGAN TO CEMETERY AT BITBURG, WEST GERMANY—PRIME MINISTER'S VIEWS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he tell us whether or not the Prime Minister communicated to the President of the United States his views concerning the proposed visit to the military cemetery at Bitburg, West Germany, inasmuch as the Prime Minister told journalists in London yesterday that in his view the President's decision was clearly unwise?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am not sure that my honourable friend has reported the full context of the statement made by the Prime Minister. I think he made some reference to the fact that sometimes hindsight is a little more precise than foresight in dealing with these questions. On the question of whether or not the Prime Minister has made any statement to the President of the United States in respect to the matter, I cannot undertake to provide an answer because it would be a matter of confidence insofar as the Prime Minister is concerned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I disagree with the stand taken by the Leader of the Government, that he cannot answer the question because it involves the element of confidence. Surely, in the case of the transmission of a message from one head of government to another, such a message should be made available to the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps you are right.

Senator MacEachen: I shall not debate the matter but I shall ask the Leader of the Government to consider it.

Senator Roblin: In response to my honourable friend's comment, he may be right because he has had considerable experience in the transmission of messages between heads of state. Although I decline to answer the question, I do not decline to investigate it because it may be that the situation is more fluid than I think.

DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

POSSIBLE NEGOTIATION OF SALE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government inform us whether or not the government is negotiating for the sale of de Havilland Aircraft to any other interests, particularly to a foreign interest? If the government is contemplating a sale to a foreign interest, could the leader tell us whether the government has developed any criteria which would establish for Canada a net benefit arising from any such sale?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that a number of crown corporations have been publicly advertised as being for sale. However, I do not know of any information that I can disclose at the moment as to the state of such negotiations or the terms and conditions under which they are being considered. I think the disclosure of such information would have to await the outcome of continuing negotiations and until such time as some decision has been reached.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I was wondering whether in the case of de Havilland there were active negotiations and whether the government is clearly of the view that it wishes to dispose of this corporation.

Senator Roblin: The latest statement of the government of which I am aware is that it wishes to dispose of the crown corporation. It may be that negotiations in this respect are in progress but at the moment they are not matters on which I feel I can undertake to give an answer.

Senator MacEachen: Would the minister consider letting us know at some future time whether the government has established any criteria that would come into play if the sale of de Havilland to a foreign interest were contemplated? For example, there is some concept, I believe, of benefit to Canada or

"net benefit" in the Investment Canada Bill, and I wonder whether a similar standard applies or is under consideration in the case of the disposition of a crown corporation to a foreign interest.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I will undertake to consult my colleague, the minister in charge of that particular matter, and to find out from him whether he is able to oblige my honourable friend with that information.

EDUCATION

POST SECONDARY—AVAILABILITY OF REPORT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers and, if no one objects, I propose that they be taken as read.

The first answer is to a question raised in the Senate by the Honourable Senator Stewart on February 18, 1985 regarding the availability of a report on post-secondary education.

The report prepared by Mr. Al Johnson on the financing of higher education and research was tabled in the House on March 14 and all senators received copies at that time.

To respond to the second part of Senator Stewart's question, the Secretary of State is actively consulting with provincial ministers and representatives of the post-secondary sector.

The Secretary of State has met twice already with the full Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, and plans further meetings in coming weeks. The major item on the agenda of these discussions is the arrangements under which the federal government transfers resources to the provinces for support of colleges and universities. This pace of consultation on education support matters is unprecedented and is certainly in line with both the government's commitment to consultation on major policy issues and with the spirit of those portions of the legislation that call for regular consultations on "the relationship between the programs and activities of the governments of Canada and the provinces that relate to post-secondary education."

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The next delayed answer is to a question from the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding regional industrial expansion in the Atlantic provinces and government assistance to industry.

With respect to the statement that "government is backing out of a commitment made by the previous government to help the Domtar Company in modernizing its establishment in Windsor, Quebec", it is my understanding that no such commitment was made.

An agreement was reached with Repap and providing the terms of the agreement are met the government will honour its obligations.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—ABSENCE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator MacEachen on March 19, 1985, regarding the Summit Meeting in Quebec City and the absence of the Governor General.

The Governor General was consulted throughout by the Prime Minister and she very kindly offered the use of the Citadel for a signing ceremony during what was a working visit, not a state visit. Her staff, headed by Mr. Butler, were in attendance.

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—DECLARATION ON INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator MacEachen regarding the Summit Meeting in Quebec City and the declaration on international security.

The declaration contains no new concepts or commitments. It is intended to reinvigorate the defence and security partnership between the two countries, including with respect to the Defence Development and Production Sharing Arrangements, and to reaffirm the commitment on both sides to consult closely on security and arms control issues.

The agreement on modernization of North American air defences and on the North Warning System contains no new obligations, and reaffirms the long-standing joint relationship underpinning NORAD. The only new "commitment" relates to increased sovereignty for Canada in that we will pay a substantial portion of the cost for, and will manage and operate, those parts of the North Warning System located on Canadian territory.

Canada continues to consult closely with the United States, and with other allies, on the Geneva arms control negotiations, in view of the importance of these negotiations to all of us. Recognizing that the recently resumed negotiations represent a new departure from the time when the INF and START negotiations were broken off by the Soviet Union, we are, as a result, consulting extensively with the United States, both bilaterally and in NATO forums, permitting us clearly to make known Canadian views and positions.

The need for close consultation on security and arms control matters has been endorsed, not only in the Quebec Declaration, but also in the December 1984 communiqué from the NATO foreign ministers' meeting, and in the March 1985 communiqué from the Nuclear Planning Group (NATO defence ministers) ministerial meeting.

NATIONAL HOUSING PROGRAM

EFFECT OF CUTBACKS ON NATIVE POPULATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The next delayed answer is to a question raised in the Senate on March 21, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Marchand regarding the effect of cutbacks in the National Housing Program on the native population.

At present, the overall allocation for 1985 to rural and native housing is under review and no final decision has been taken. However, 1,240 units have been provided for on-reserve housing through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and 1,000 units are available under the urban native program, which provides assistance to low-income natives in urban areas. There has been no reduction in these two programs for 1985.

Under the rural and native program, assistance is provided to homeowners and tenants of native and non-native origin in rural areas off reserve. In this respect, the previous government introduced a new program which called for unilateral action by the federal government. On the other hand, we are seeking open and strong cooperation with provinces to address housing concerns, including those in rural areas. Most provinces have indicated a strong desire to continue with complementary funding and delivery in some form. Through federal-provincial cooperation, we are confident that a significant number of units will be made available under the program this year.

In his consultation process, the minister is also addressing the concerns of improved targetting and program efficiency, including support for natives. The process involves discussions with provinces and a wide range of housing interest groups, including native groups. The minister is confident this will provide useful input to efforts by this government to improve targetting of resources to those in need, and to do more with the funds available.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the next delayed answer I have is to a question raised in the Senate on March 26, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Sinclair with respect to the National Conference on the Economy.

136 people accepted invitations to attend the National Economic Conference held on March 22 and 23, 1985. Four of those were unable to be present. In the period leading up to the conference, approximately 19 persons were unable or declined to accept invitations.

The government offered to pay the expenses (within Treasury Board guidelines) incurred by participants, as well as those incurred by the 36 observers who wrote issue papers for the conference or chaired the workshops at the conference. Each of these persons is free to submit a claim or not. As of April 17, 70 persons had submitted claims.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SHOOTING DOWN OF SOUTH KOREAN AIRCRAFT—SOVIET COMPENSATION FOR NEXT-OF-KIN OF CANADIAN VICTIMS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The next delayed answer is to a question raised in the Senate on April 2, 1985 by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen regarding compensation from the Soviet Union for next-of-kin of Canadian victims in the shooting down of the South Korean aircraft.

During the visit to the Soviet Union, the Secretary of State for External Affairs raised the question of KAL in a forceful and direct manner with Mr. Gromyko.

Mr. Gromyko, for his part, declined to discuss the issue.

In response, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stressed that Canadian lives were lost as a result of Soviet use of force, and that Canada would continue to raise this issue until it was resolved.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Since some of the answers relate to events that have taken place long since, I am wondering if the answers are also not a little dated.

Senator Roblin: I would say that is the case with most delayed answers to questions.

CUSTOMS ACT SPECIAL IMPORT MEASURES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 2:

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-40, to confirm certain acts or things done on behalf of the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise and to amend the Customs Act and the Special Import Measures Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has an important bearing on the capacity of the Department of National Revenue to carry out effectively its responsibilities in respect of the Customs Act, and to facilitate the efficient operation of the Department of National Revenue on behalf of the government and those members of the public which the department serves, particularly Canadian importers.

Essentially, Bill C-40 deals with the authority of persons authorized by the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise to exercise or perform any of his powers, duties or functions under the Customs Act and the Special Import Measures Act.

Specifically, subsection 46(4) of the Customs Act authorizes the deputy minister to redetermine the tariff classification or to re-appraise the value for duty of goods imported into Canada. This is an important function of the department, both to ensure that legitimate duties due to Canada are collected, and to ensure that importers are fairly dealt with.

The present Customs Act does not specifically authorize other persons to perform the functions of the deputy minister to make decisions under subsection 46(4). In practice, however, as the volume of such decisions has grown, the deputy minister has directed the appropriate assistant deputy minister, and officials working under his supervision, to make such decisions in his name. With the current volume of cases—an estimated 5,700 in the fiscal year just ended—it would be utterly impossible to do otherwise.

However, a serious difficulty has arisen as a result of a decision handed down by the Federal Court of Appeal on February 22.

In the fall of 1984, the Tariff Board, which hears appeals against decisions made under subsection 46(4) of the Customs Act, questioned whether it could legally hear appeals when the decisions appealed from were not made personally by the deputy minister. The board referred the matter to the Federal Court of Appeal which, in its February 22 judgment, agreed that the board lacked such jurisdiction, and further that the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise had no legal right to delegate his authority.

The department, of course, respects the court's decision and currently, aside from some cases of critical importance which are being made personally by the deputy minister, no action is being taken under the section. As a consequence, cases requiring decision are piling up. It is unfair to Canadian taxpayers and unsatisfactory to Canadian importers to allow this state of affairs to continue.

I might point out, honourable senators, that the situation created by the court's decision points up clearly the need for a completely revised and modernized Customs Act geared to the realities of business conditions as they now exist. The present act is more than 100 years old, and while it has been amended many times, it is simply not geared, in many of its provisions, to the volume and complexity of administering customs matters today.

The Minister of National Revenue has announced in the other place that he will bring forward a new bill which in turn will become a totally revamped and modernized Customs Act and which will deal with many of the archaic and outdated provisions of the current act, including the one before us today. In the meantime, however, speedy passage of Bill C-40 will restore the capability of the department to administer its responsibilities effectively.

[Senator Balfour]

Honourable senators, the recent ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal also has implications for decisions made under the former Anti-dumping Act. Although this act was repealed in December, 1984 and replaced by the Special Import Measures Act, many of the deputy minister's functions and duties under the former act, including making decisions appealable to the Tariff Board, were carried out on his behalf by other officials. By implication, the Federal Court's judgment also invalidates such decisions made under the Anti-dumping Act. It is important that we now validate the functions and duties performed by subordinate officers in the past or to be performed in the future under the terms of this act as well.

I should point out that the Special Import Measures Act, which is now the instrument for dealing with anti-dumping matters, is also being amended to clarify the authority of persons authorized by the deputy minister to exercise or perform his powers, duties and functions. Essentially, the bill accomplishes the following: It recognizes that the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise may authorize other persons to exercise or perform any of his powers, duties or functions under the Customs Act and the Special Import Measures Act; it validates acts done in the past by persons purporting to act on behalf of the deputy minister in exercising his powers or performing his functions or duties under the Special Import Measures Act and the Customs Act; it validates acts done in the past and in the future by persons authorized by the deputy minister to exercise his powers or perform his duties or functions under the Anti-dumping Act.

Honourable senators, the job of ruling effectively and fairly on the thousands of complex tariff cases that come before the department each year requires many highly trained specialists supporting the deputy minister. The provisions authorizing persons to carry out the deputy minister's powers, duties and functions will be dealt with clearly in the new Customs Act when it comes before the Senate. In the meantime, in the interests of getting on with the job, I ask the support of honourable senators in giving speedy passage to this legislation.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this bill, resulting from the decision of the Federal Court, points out the conditions which exist more in the regulatory field than in the field of acts, and that is the question of the legality of subdelegation. It is quite clear that something has to be done to legalize subdelegation in the matters dealt with in this bill. This bill went through second and third reading last Wednesday in the House of Commons on account of the urgency of its passage, but when I look at the date on which the decision of the court came down, which was February 22, and the date first reading was given to this bill, which was April 17, I am not impressed with the speed and urgency with which the government proceeded before introducing the bill in the other place.

I recall that I used to give a talk to students when they arrived in our law firm and I entitled it "Sense of Urgency," and I must say that the government has not shown any sense of urgency since the decision of the Federal Court. However, this bill should receive the approval of this chamber and I do not see any necessity for it to be referred to committee. When I read the bill I also read the speech of the Honourable Perrin Beatty in the House of Commons in which he said:

... it validates acts done in the past and in the future by people authorized by the Deputy Minister to exercise his powers or perform his duties or functions under the Anti-dumping Act.

I looked at the bill itself and I could not see any reference whatsoever in clause 1 or clause 2 to any questions of validating acts authorized by the deputy minister. Clause 1 of the bill reads:

Every act or thing done before the coming into force of this Act by a person purporting to act on behalf of the Deputy Minister ... in the exercise of a power ... shall be deemed for all purposes to have been done by the Deputy Minister at the time it was done by that person.

It seemed to me in reading that that anybody could come along and say that he was purporting to act on behalf of the deputy minister whether or not the deputy minister actually had authorized him. Therefore, it occurred to me that that clause should have included the words "authorized by and" before "purporting to act on behalf of the Deputy Minister."

I spoke to the official in the department who is in charge of the bill, and he pointed out that the word "authorized" in the dictionary means "give authority to" and the fact that the court has decided that the deputy minister cannot authorize, because he cannot "give authority to" anyone else, does create a drafting problem, and that my suggested amendment would not be technically correct. I agreed.

While I am not entirely happy with the way those two clauses are drafted, I could not come up with anything better myself, so that I cannot object to them. Therefore, I support this bill and, as I said before, I do not think it needs to be referred to committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Senator Balfour closes the debate on second reading of this bill, I have a question. If I understood the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, it decided that the delegated authority did not exist because of a general principle of law dealing with delegation of authority. Before we move to third reading, I wonder if Senator Balfour would ask if the Department of Justice is concerned about this same principle applying in other statutes, because there are other statutes where the deputy minister is given authority to do something and where he, in turn, has perhaps delegated, as he did here. That did not occur to me until I heard the lucid speech given by Senator Balfour in explaining the necessity for this bill. It seems to me that if the principle that was used is as wide-ranging as I suspect it is, then it might apply to some other departments and is something that the Department of Justice should look at. Perhaps he could give us that information when he moves third reading.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I would be happy to direct that inquiry to the Department of Justice. I assume that that is a matter of some concern and I will make further inquiries and report to the Senate on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Martial Asselin moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Criminal Code, to amend an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to amend the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act, the Parole Act and the Weights and Measures Act, to repeal certain other Acts and to make other consequential amendments.

He said: Honourable senators, some of you may be surprised to see the Speaker pro tempore sponsoring a Bill, since Speakers usually refrain from taking part in debate, and when they do, they do so very discreetly. However, since our rules allow the Speaker of the Senate to take part in debate, the Speaker of the Senate pro tempore certainly has a right to do so.

You will understand that our splendid isolation in the Chair coupled with our experience of parliamentary debate, makes it extremely difficult for us to remain silent in the heat of debate. While practising this serene impartiality, I have noticed since the beginning of the session that I liked the style of some senators far better when they were in the Opposition. Senator Flynn, for instance, was far more aggressive in the Opposition than he is now on the government side.

On the other hand, I think Senator Frith's style has become quite admirable since he took his seat on the opposition side. I think this style fits him like a glove. Of course, it is much easier to judge style from the Speaker's chair than when we are involved in the debate itself.

I agreed to sponsor Bill C-18 because I remembered the time when, as a young lawyer, I practised criminal law for several years. I did so because criminal law usually concerns the freedom of the individual. It is a law made by man which has some extremely important consequences for the individual involved in the lengthy judicial process.

My last appearance before a jury dates back to 1970 when I was defence counsel for a young man accused of murder. Thank God I was fortunate enough to have him acquitted and today I am proud to see him doing fine in life, raising a family as an outstanding citizen.

That is the kind of reward defence counsel enjoy now and again when they defend the rights of individuals who have to answer for their crimes.

Today, honourable senators, we are considering Bill C-18 which was first introduced under the previous administration. As you may recall, former ministers of justice in the preceding government had proposed this omnibus bill to amend certain Criminal Code provisions to make them consistent with those of the new Charter of Rights. You will note in Bill C-18 a good many provisions which the legislator sought to amend to bring them in line with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights.

It is a huge bill, an important legislative "brique" as we say in French. This being the second reading stage, I have no intention of going into minute details, for I must explain the principles of the new legislative provisions. Just the same, I would be remiss if I failed to mention the main points of this measure, just so you will have some idea of the amendments proposed by the legislator in Bill C-18.

The main purpose of the amendments is to improve the administration of justice. Some provisions are aimed at speeding up the mechanism of justice. We all know that the justiciable have long been complaining loudly about slow criminal proceedings, huge numbers of cases pending, judgments giving rise to sharp criticisms from the public, the bench and the legal professions as a whole. It is intended to correct those delays by first holding pre-hearing conferences. Those who are in law practice know that in Quebec we already have had pre-hearing conferences for a number of years. The judge asks counsel for the prosecution and the defendant to appear before him and discuss matters on which they can agree, in order to solve such matters before the hearing can open. This speeds up the judicial process and is more satisfactory to those who appear before the courts.

All matters that may promote fast and fair proceedings are examined. Preliminary matters will now be settled. You know that often in criminal law practice, a jury is asked to pass judgment on the accused.

Oftentimes, during the proceedings, points of law are debated. Those points introduce tremendous delays. In the future, instead of calling the jury immediately, swearing them in and having them sit and listen to lawyers debating points of law, such points will be settled between counsel for both sides and the judge before the jury is sworn in. This in my view, will be a significant improvement in the process of trial by jury.

There are also provisions dealing with people released on bail. These new provisions amend the bail procedure and avoid useless proceedings. The bill would allow a superior court judge to release an accused on bail with respect to the charges laid against him. An accused often appears before the court on a series of charges. He must appear before the court in the district where the offences were committed. Afterwards, he is brought before another court to appear on a charge for an offence committed in that other court's district. This bill will allow a judge to hear all the charges against an accused so as to rule on his release on bail.

With regard to the review of an order for release on bail, the judges will be granted greater powers in order to expedite proceedings. Thus, the judges reviewing the order for release on bail under Section 459 will have more discretion in setting the conditions pertaining to these orders. A greater number of accused could therefore be released. Under the present legislation, the judges had to choose from a list of conditions they could impose on the accused applying for a release on bail, which entails a risk. The judge will now have a wider assortment of conditions to choose from.

Evidence obtained by wiretaps will be admitted verbally and unofficially at the hearing of the application for release on bail. As you are aware, under Section 459 of the Code, application for the release of a person in custody cannot be made on the principle of habeas corpus. It is proposed to repeal this section because it goes against the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Another provision deals with the powers of judges and justices regarding the administration of justice. A judge will be able to preside at a preliminary hearing already started by another judge. We all know that, under our Criminal Code, when an accused is brought before a judge, this particular judge must hear the case. If the proceedings start before that judge, another judge cannot take over. If that judge takes sick or dies during the proceedings, the whole case must be retried. The bill will allow another judge, with the help of the transcript of evidence, to take over if the first judge takes sick or is incapacitated.

Appeal procedures will also be simplified. Some of the amendments proposed would allow one judge of the appeal court to hear applications for appeal and applications for review of orders for release on bail made by superior court judges. At the present time, the court sits with three judges in such matters. To speed up the proceedings before the appeal court, a single judge will be able to hear appeals to the appeals jurisdiction.

Let us now consider indictments. Under the law as it exists now, when an accused is discharged following a preliminary inquiry, the prosecutor can either refer the matter directly to the court or lay new charges. In the first case, the prosecutor must seek the consent of the Attorney General or the judge who has to deal with the accused. In nearly all provinces, we know that the practice is to seek the mandatory consent of the Attorney General. The fact that a judge can authorize such an action could create an apparent conflict of interest, since the judge is, under these circumstances, carrying out duties associated with the executive rather than the judiciary. Yet, the bill before us will reserve either to the Attorney General or his substitute the power to authorize the prosecutor to refer directly the matter to the court.

Concerning the protection of individual rights, we know that police officers have the right to seize documents. In this respect, there is the question of privileged communication between a lawyer and his client. As far as the seizure of documents is concerned, proper rules should be clearly established to protect both the interests of law enforcement people and those of the people needing legal counselling. Such rules are particularly evident whenever documents are likely to be covered by the provisions governing privileged communications between a lawyer and his client. We know that this topic has been much debated before our courts. The proposed amendments would establish procedures which would guarantee the respect of these privileges.

From now on, whenever the issue of professional secrecy is raised, the police officers involved in the seizure of documents will have to put these documents in an envelope, properly sealed and clearly identified, and entrust it to the custody of a sheriff.

Following a request to that effect, the envelope would be turned over to a judge of the Superior Court, a criminal jurisdiction, who would determine whether the enclosed documents are in fact privileged communications between a lawyer and his client. If he should decide in the affirmative, the sealed envelope with the documents would be returned to the lawyer or his client. I think this very important provision would protect the steady communications which a lawyer has with his client and which take the form of documents kept in the lawyer's office.

Another provision will forbid the publication of certain information concerning searches. Some searches may be in vain. However, revealing that a police officer has carried out a search may cause irreparable prejudice to the reputation of an individual or a corporation. In order to protect the innocent, it is proposed to forbid the media to reveal either the identity of a person whose premises have been searched or the location of these premises, unless charges have been laid, the accused is facing the courts, or the person involved agrees to the publication of such information. The proposed measures would in no way restrict the public's right to see the charge submitted to the court, with a view to obtaining a copy of the search warrant.

Another provision refers to the restitution of seized goods. When property is seized by the police to serve as evidence of an offence, it will be necessary to consider, at every stage of the case, whether it is necessary to detain the property. If it is found that the property in question is no longer needed, the proposed amendments will ensure the speedy return of such property to its owner.

Quite often, cars are seized by the police when a crime or an offence is committed. Occasionally, the police have had the right to detain a car or property for months because it was being used as evidence. Even when petitions were made to the court, asking the judge to release the property because it was indispensable or in any event useful to its owner, the police always gave the same answer. They said that the investigation was not completed and that it was a vital part of police evidence. Occasionally, the accused was acquitted after five or six months, which meant that the owner of the seized property had been deprived of it during all that time.

The bill also refers to measures to deal with new forms of crime. These measures deal with modern crime, that is, computer crime. The amendments relating to computer crime arise from a growing concern caused by people interfering with computer data, more specifically by destroying or falsifying such data and by the unauthorized use of computer systems.

There are three basic aspects to the problem. First of all, we have cases of unauthorized appropriation or destruction of equipment, including the computers themselves, instruments, magnetic tapes or print-outs. Then we have unauthorized appropriation and destruction of computer data, and finally, unauthorized use of computer services.

At the present time, the Criminal Code does not provide adequate protection for the victims of a criminal act covering the two latter categories.

The proposed amendments make it a criminal offence to deliberately destroy or falsify computer data, and to deliberately prevent, interrupt or hinder the legitimate use of computer data.

A new section would make it a criminal offence to use a computer without authorization for the purpose of modifying, destroying or unlawfully using data, to obtain computer services fraudulently and deliberately or to intercept any of these functions.

The bill interpretation raises a number of questions.

● (1450)

These amendments would make it possible to adapt the Criminal Code to new developments in computer science and the sometimes extremely important and delicate applications thereof.

I may add that if you read the reports of the committee of the House of Commons that examined this bill, you will find that there was some difference of opinion about including in the bill a legal definition that is so controversial.

Witnesses appearing before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs may be able to provide some clarification as to the significance of the provisions of this bill with respect to computer systems. There is also an important common law clause on credit card thefts.

The definition of weapon has been broadened to include any object used to threaten or physically injure someone. The possession of incendiary materials such as Molotov cocktails will also be banned.

The question of drugs is an important part of the provisions of this bill. In recent years the Department of Health and Welfare has uncovered evidence which strongly indicates that the use of medical prescriptions for therapeutic purposes is growing. This clause is of great significance for practitioners and pharmacists.

Each year close to 200 physicians come to the attention of the department because they are suspected of having prescribed drugs for illegal purposes.

We know that each year more than 3,700 persons seek or illegally obtain prescriptions to purchase drugs. Under existing legislation, both a practitioner who knowingly prescribes narcotics or controlled drugs—those included in Schedule G of the Food and Drugs Act—for nontherapeutic purposes, and a person who seeks or obtains such a prescription without telling the practitioner that other prescriptions were obtained within thirty days preceding the request are liable to a $500 fine, or six months in jail, or both.

People seeking narcotics or drugs visit many institutions in an attempt to obtain prescriptions from different practitioners in different localities to purchase drugs in pharmacies. It has become an uncontrollable problem.

Perhaps I ought to point out two other problems in this field. All a physician does is give the patient a piece of paper. He cannot be accused of drug trafficking. He simply tells his patient to use that piece of paper to get the drug. Since such infractions generally come to light only after the Department of Health and Welfare has checked the reports filed by pharmacists, a process which takes months, not only is the evidence destroyed, but most often the prescription's six-month limitation period has expired. With respect to drugs or drug trafficking, a six-month limitation period applies. As a result, most of the time the offenders are beyond the reach of justice.

Before coming to grips with the growing problem of drug use for non-therapeutic purposes, the bill amends the drug legislation so that it will be an offence to seek or obtain a prescription for drugs without disclosing any such prescription issued within the preceding thirty days. In other words, anyone who goes to a pharmacist or a physician to get a prescription and fails to tell the pharmacist or the physician that he did get such a prescription in the preceding thirty days is already guilty of an offence and will be prosecuted under the new provisions of the Act.

Offenders under this new provision will be liable to the same penalties now applicable to persons found guilty of possession of narcotics. Second, the Food and Drugs Act will provide that it is an offence to seek or obtain a prescription for controlled drugs without disclosing prescriptions already issued within the preceding thirty days. The penalties applicable to this new offence will be the same as those faced by people who are now found in possession of restricted drugs.

The idea is to broaden the concept of traffic so as to include the prescription of narcotics and controlled drugs as defined in Food and Drugs Act Section 33.

The other place was the scene of lengthy debates leading to serious controversy and amendments were made. I did not check to see whether those amendments had been accepted or rejected by the committee or by the House on third reading. It will have to be clarified. It must be added that it is not required in order to say that there is traffic in controlled drugs, that a commercial intent be proven. Today's jurisprudence is not clear in this regard. It is said that the intent must always be proven. As far as drug use or drug traffic are concerned, some courts and some jurisprudences claim that such an intent has not to be proven.

[Senator Asselin]

This is a piece of legislation in which repression will be more stringent concerning the use of drugs and especially the way prescriptions are obtained for getting drugs.

Another provision concerning corruption in municipal affairs will increase sentences from two to five years.

We have certain provisions concerning forcible confinement, extortion and conspiring to commit murder.

With respect to air safety the regulations are going to be made more stringent. There are people who own and use lighter airplanes, and they take chances when flying. They will have to fly more properly. Anyone flying an aircraft in such a way as to create a hazard for the public by flying too low will be committing an offence, that is a violation of the regulations established by the Department of Transport.

There are also provisions concerning hostage taking under the international convention signed by Canada in 1980. There are also offences with respect to nuclear materials. I do not have to provide details, because these will be considered in committee, when the bill is discussed clause by clause.

I would like to deal with the writ of assistance, rather the telewarrant. The Minister of Justice has tabled in the House of Commons a bill providing for the abolition of writs of assistance and the establishment of a system of telewarrants. That provision is aimed at regulating police authority with respect to the search of premises.

Currently, under a writ of assistance a small number of RCMP officers responsible for enforcing of the Drugs Act, Customs and Excise, may enter homes without warrants.

Some people feel that writs of assistance may infringe upon basic rights recognized by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including that to be secured against unreasonable search or seizure.

The telewarrant is nothing more than a standard warrant that is given over the telephone or other means of communication. As in the case of a standard warrant, the peace officer must submit information on oath to a justice official.

This means that if a police officer sees a crime being committed and there is a delay in making the search, bits of evidence will be forever destroyed. He will call a justice official over the telephone. He states under oath that a crime is being committed or has been committed and that evidence may be lost if a search is not done immediately. Under the new provisions, following the oath taken by the police officer and the information received by the justice official, the latter may authorize the police officer to issue telewarrant. The police officer does not have to appear before the justice official. He is sworn in over the telephone. Pursuant to the authority given by the justice official to use the telewarrant, the police officer may search and make whatever seizures he deems reasonable to try and prevent the commission of a crime or save evidence that would otherwise disappear if the seizure were not to be proceeded with immediately.

Telewarrants will be extremely useful in cases where RCMP or police officers are working in remote areas, for instance in the Canadian North. The police officer cannot go down to Edmonton to get a warrant from a justice official. He can be sworn in over the telephone, and he can tell the justice official that he has reasonable grounds to believe that a crime has been or is being committed and that if a seizure is not made immediately, important evidence will be lost.

The justice official allows him then to execute the warrant and to proceed with the search and seizures just as if he had a warrant from a justice of the peace in the performance of his duties.

I think that the key element in Bill C-18, honourable senators, is that part that deals with driving of a vehicle while under the influence of alcohol or drugs. I will conclude with that chapter of Bill C-18. So that you will better understand the provisions of this bill which deal with impaired driving, I am asking the Senate pages to distribute a comparative chart of the existing and the new legislation, which will enable you to follow the explanation I shall give you of these particular provisions of Bill C-18.

With your permission, honourable senators, I would like this chart to be printed in today's official report as part of my presentation. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

• (1500)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Asselin, could we examine it before we agree?

Senator Asselin: Very well.

Senator Frith: Am I to understand, Senator Asselin, that you will refer to it and not read it?

Senator Asselin: Exactly.

Senator Frith: Very well in that case.

The Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of document, see appendix, p. 830.)

Senator Asselin: It would be difficult to draw a complete picture of such a bill. I could always try to imitate someone who is a bit drunk, but it would not be appropriate today. Perhaps another time, but not today.

An Hon. Senator: Are they in both languages?

Senator Asselin: I have about one hundred copies available in English and in French.

Senator Frith: Are they available in English and in French?

Senator Asselin: I asked the department for both English and French versions. I hope that my instructions have been followed.

The purpose of the provisions on impaired driving is:

First, to extend application of the Criminal Code in cases where an impaired driver has caused bodily harm or death.

Second, to provide harsher penalties for the offences of dangerous driving and impaired driving.

Third, to facilitate application of the provisions on impaired driving by allowing the courts to authorize blood tests.

Fourth, to make the provisions on impaired driving applicable to airplanes and boats as well as to motor vehicles.

Honourable senators, if you follow your chart, you will find, first, dangerous driving or impaired driving causing death.

Those who commit such an offence are liable to a maximum penalty of 14 years imprisonment.

Dangerous driving or impaired driving causing bodily harm is punishable by a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment.

The law will be harsher than before for people who drive when impaired by alcohol or drugs, or with a blood-alcohol concentration exceeding 80 mg. in 100 ml. of blood.

I remember that when we were young lawyers, the limit was 1.5 per 100 ml. of blood. Today, it is .08.

In this case, the limit has not been set higher, but the penalty has become much harsher.

A new provision aims, on the one hand, at making the penalties applicable harsher and, on the other, at leaving more discretion to the courts to adjust the penalty according to the circumstances of the offence and the characteristics of the offender. The minimum penalty in the case of a first offence of impaired driving or refusal to provide a blood sample will be increased from $50 to $300.

The minimum penalties would be the same for minor offences punishable on summary conviction for serious crimes, that is: For the first offence, there would be a $300 fine. For the second offence, a 14-day jail term. For the third and any subsequent offence, a 90-day jail term.

With respect to offences punishable on summary conviction, the maximum sentence would be a six-month jail term and a $2000 fine or one of those two penalties alone. With respect to indictable offences, the maximum penalty would be raised to five years in jail while at present it is only two years. As for the fine to be levied, there would be no ceiling. The judge could impose anything.

The maximum term imposed for dangerous driving would be increased from two to five years in jail.

Always as a deterrent, the bill provides other penalties which could be added to the fine or jail term.

The court would automatically sentence an individual found guilty of impaired driving or with a concentration of alcohol in his blood exceeding .08 or for refusal to provide breath or blood samples to a three-month minimum prohibition from driving for a first offence, six months for a second offence and one year for a third or subsequent offence with a maximum prohibition of three years in all cases.

Thus the court could also disqualify a driver for a maximum period of one year. This is a new provision.

The court could also order for a maximum period of a year the impounding of a vehicle used to commit one of the offences concerned, if the accused is the owner of the vehicle or its main user. When the accused is not the owner of the vehicle involved, its owner would be advised of the situation and could make some comments to the court before the impounding is ordered. In such a case, the accused could ask that the order be amended if new facts seem to warrant it.

The bill is also aimed at facilitating the enforcement of the law. At present, the Criminal Code allows the use of breath samples to determine whether the driver is impaired or the concentration of alcohol in his blood is over .08. To make sure that the breath samples are correct, a proposed amendment to the Criminal Code would require in all cases a previous test to make sure that the instrument used for the analysis is effective.

I think that criminal lawyers who are called in the early hours of the morning to help someone who has been arrested for impaired driving closely watch the breathalyzer test to see that it is adequately administered. The officer taking the sample is required to check that the instrument has not been tampered with and is working properly. The lawyer trying to get his client off the hook will suggest that the instrument may have been tampered with.

It is sometimes impossible to carry out a breath analysis because of the physical or mental state of the individual involved. The famous blood sample is then taken. A great many things have been said before the courts about this. For instance, taking a blood sample under these conditions might be considered as an assault. A number of physicians have been taken to court for taking unauthorized blood samples for analysis purposes.

A number of them have had trouble because of this procedure. Taking blood samples will be made legal and such samples will become admissible evidence in court whenever it is felt that a conviction for impaired driving would be difficult or almost impossible to get for all sorts of reasons. Under such circumstances, a police officer could demand a blood sample as additional evidence.

However, to protect as much as possible the rights of the alleged offender, there are the following safeguards:

The taking of blood samples would be authorized only when breathalizers are impossible. First of all, a breathalyzer test must be attempted. Of course, when a person impaired is involved in a serious accident, special steps will be taken to reinforce the evidence. Under such circumstances, blood samples would be required. If the individual is conscious, a blood sample could be taken only with the consent of the individual.

In cases where people have been killed or injured and where the individual who is allegedly impaired is not in a position to agree to the taking of a blood sample—for instance if he is unconscious—it will be possible to take such a blood sample without the individual's consent, provided a judge has issued the necessary authorization.

From now on, a justice of the peace will have the power to authorize a police officer or a physician to take a blood sample even while the individual is unconscious.

When necessary, it will be possible to obtain this judiciary authorization through a telewarrant. This involves calling an officer of the judiciary or a justice of the peace and saying:

[Senator Asselin.]

"Here are the facts. I am prepared to swear that a blood sample is required to complete our case."

The accused could demand that another blood sample be taken for independent analysis. Obviously, a person who has a blood test done can have it double-checked by asking another physician of his choice to check the blood samples taken by the physician designated by the police officer.

A blood test can be done only by a duly qualified physician or person working under his direction. There will be no blood sample taken whenever a physician believes that the life or the health of the accused would be jeopardized.

Since physicians will take the blood sample with the consent of the accused or under a legal authority, they will be protected by law unless they act in a careless manner, of course. Therefore, the law will protect him ipso facto and the physician could not be prosecuted. Should there be any prosecutions, the Crown will defend the physician who was asked to take a blood sample.

The same provisions will also apply to a person driving a boat or a plane while being impaired.

In his statement, when he introduced the legislation concerning impaired driving, the minister said, of course, that all these measures are negative and punitive. He added that society had an important role to play as regards the education of people who insist on driving when impaired by alcohol. Let me quote the minister's words:

In order to complete the proposed legislation, I also intend to introduce, in close co-operation with the provinces, a legal system for the treatment of those responsible for serious alcohol-related offences.

Then, he added:

Members of all segments of society, particularly citizens' groups, must take part in the fight against impaired driving. Therefore I have authorized the preparation and distribution of an information kit within the coming months. Designed for the community, this kit will include various documents on impaired driving, as well as a guide designed to help citizens' groups to organize local campaigns to fight this plague. Only through close consultation between all Canadians shall we be in a position to reduce the number of human life losses and suffering induced by impaired driving.

In addition, having practised criminal law, we know to what extent some families have been afflicted by those deadly accidents caused by an impaired driver. Allow me to tell you this anecdote. I had to defend a client arrested for impaired driving. The police officer asked if they could take a blood sample. I gave my consent, and so did my client. Looking at him, I thought he was walking real straight. He had no problem walking. The next day, however, I was discouraged when I saw the blood analysis result. That same afternoon, I was even more discouraged when the medical practitioner from Quebec City who had taken the blood sample called me and asked at what time my client had died. He was so drunk according to medical standards that the physician wanted to know at what time he had died the day before. I thought he was a little tipsy but still able to walk straight and drive his car. I was somewhat surprised. I went to my client's home and asked him whether he was a heavy drinker. "Well," he told me, "I drink a 40-ounce bottle a day." Then I was no longer amazed at the high level of alcohol in his blood sample.

So, as you can see, when investigating, police officers must be able to verify in what condition the accused is. Oftentimes, someone can drink a 40-ounce bottle and his constitution can take it.

In Quebec as in every province, efforts are being made to try to improve public education. During the holidays, in my city, a few Laval University students set up what they called the "Red Nose Operation." About twenty students were gathered together. When someone found he was in no condition to drive his car, he just had to call someone from the "Red Nose" organization to drive him home for a ten dollar fee. The day after, our man found he had had no problems with the police and only a severe headache to take care of. This way of doing things is one of the solutions society has to consider to prevent this impaired driving plague.

Honourable senators, that is all I had to say on this bill. I apologize for having taken so much time. I will not be here to move that it be referred to committee, because I have to be away tomorrow and the day after tomorrow. I will ask one of my colleagues, Senator Nurgitz or Senator Flynn, to move the motion to refer this bill to committee.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEES TO INVITE PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—STATEMENT BY THE ACTING SPEAKER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that the motion be withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

● (1520)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, last Wednesday during debate on Senator Godfrey's motion, Senator Phillips moved that the motion be withdrawn and that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. Senator Frith then rose on a point of order and asked the Speaker to make a ruling on whether it was out of order to refer the motion to the committee. However, that was not the question before the Senate at that time, and I am reluctant to rule on a question in anticipation. In this regard, I would like to quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, citation 239(1), which reads in part:

The Speaker decides questions of order only when they actually arise and not in anticipation.

While I do not want to set a precedent by answering queries on procedure, nevertheless in order to assist the Senate in making a decision in this matter, I wish to inform the Senate that there are a number of precedents for referring the subject matter of motions to committee. The latest precedent, which occurred this session, was Senator Sparrow's motion respecting the printing of an additional 10,000 copies of the report intitled "Soil at Risk", and can be found at page 115 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

This has been the practice for many years. However, there is nothing in our rules to prohibit the referral of a motion to a committee, and in this regard a precedent can be found at page 77 of the Journals of the Senate, 1944-45.

There are therefore two ways of proceeding. In my opinion, the less cumbersome procedure would have been to simply move a motion, not an amendment, to refer the motion to a committee. Since such a motion was not proposed and instead Senator Phillips' amendment is before us, therefore, we will proceed with the debate on the amendment of Senator Phillips and it is up to honourable senators to decide on the amendment.

MODIFIED MOTION IN AMENDMENT AGREED TO AND MAIN MOTION REFERRED TO STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am a little baffled by the last statement in view of the fact that I did move that the motion be referred to the committee. It was after I made the motion—which seemed to be presumed to be out of order—that Senator Phillips then proceeded. I did not object because I did not know which was the correct procedure at the time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the main purpose of my point of order was to establish whether or not it was possible to refer a motion to a committee rather than just the subject matter of a motion. That has now been clarified. Therefore, I do not think it really matters which way we proceed.

I suppose we could accept His Honour's recommendation if Senator Phillips wants to withdraw the amendment, but I am not urging him to do so. If he did, I suppose we could then refer the motion to the committee. I leave it to him to decide as to whether he wants to do that, because one way or another we want the motion to go to the committee. All I really wanted clarified was whether it was possible to refer a motion and not just the subject matter of a motion. That has been clarified. How we proceed from here depends on Senator Phillips. If he wants to withdraw it and we proceed to refer the motion, that is in order also.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

In amendment, the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), moved:

That the motion be withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not want to be too nit-picking about this, but can it be right that the motion in amendment is that the motion "be withdrawn" rather than "not proceeded with"? Surely only the mover withdraws a motion. You do not move that somebody withdraw a motion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): You cannot amend it if it is gone.

Senator Frith: You cannot amend the motion if it is withdrawn. I wonder if Senator Phillips would like to reconsider and let us just refer the motion to the committee, since it is now clear that we can do that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I waited for a reply to my query.

Senator Frith: I am not quarrelling with anything that Your Honour has done but I am wondering, in view of the wording as it has been put, if the appropriate course would be for Senator Phillips to withdraw the amendment, and then we could just refer the motion to the committee.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Frith's objection could be met if the wording of the amendment were such that the motion would be withdrawn.

Senator Doody: Withdraw the word "withdrawn."

Senator Phillips: Yes.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: And just show it as the motion being referred to the committee.

Senator Flynn: As amended?

Senator Frith: As amended, yes.

Senator Phillips: If that will serve the purpose, yes.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SUPPORT AND GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lorna Marsden rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, April 25, 1985:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the importance of research and development in every province and territory and the need for caution and sensitivity in the realignments of support, and of policy by government, which relates to research and development.

She said: Honourable senators, of all the many subjects upon which one might launch an inquiry in this chamber at this time, let me explain why I have raised the issue of support in policy and funding of basic research in Canada. This inquiry has been inspired by the impact of the government's November cuts on research projects, researchers and Canadian research reputations, and by the approaching federal budget which we can anticipate will have further consequences. I trouble my honourable colleagues with this subject in the Senate because, while it is a matter of national concern, it is only through provincial initiatives with the national government that Canadians will ever see an improvement in our situation with respect to research.

While there are many important and distinguished federal research institutions, most notably the National Research Council laboratories, the agricultural research stations, Statistics Canada and the various councils and agencies in which research is carried forward, the vast amount of research and scholarship and the responsibility for the education and preparation of future scientists, scholars and researchers is carried at the provincial level. Although the private sector plays a role, universities across the country and their related hospitals and institutions are the backbone of the system. While the provincial jurisdiction is important in policy and decision-making, most of the money—59 per cent—comes from the federal rather than the provincial purse. This situation is most recently presented by A.W. Johnson in his February, 1985 report entitled "Giving Greater Point and Purpose to the Federal Financing of Post-Secondary Education and Research in Canada" presented to the Secretary of State recently.

My purpose in raising this inquiry, therefore, is to invite honourable senators to bring forward the important questions from the provinces and territories which they represent. I believe that there is a number of honourable senators who wish to speak during this inquiry.

It is unnecessary to review in detail for the Senate the reasons why Canada must give importance to the subject and support basic research and development.

A great deal has been written on this subject by scholars, scientists, public figures and senators over the years. Professor Paul Axelrod reminds us in his book Scholars and Dollars, Politics, Economics and the Universities of Ontario, 1945-1980 how precarious has been support for research and scholarship in the humanities and other fields not directly linked to the labour market or defence or economic priorities. Nonetheless, the Government of Canada has been directly involved in the funding of research since the National Research Council was established in 1916. Soon after, the NRC was providing research grants and fellowships to universities and there soon followed the forerunner of the Medical Research Council in 1938, the Canada Council in 1954, the Economic Council in 1963, the Science Council in 1966 and the separate Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the National Science and Engineering Research Council spinning off in 1977. The justification for all this research support has been well established in the Rowell-Sirois Commission report in 1940, the Massey Commission in 1951, the Bladen Commission in 1965, the MacDonald Report and the Lamontagne Report, the Symons Commission and several subsequent reports and commissions, some of which I will refer to later. I assert that there is widespread agreement in Canada that research is important and necessary but the questions remain: How is it to be funded? What standards of quality are to be induced? In which areas, if not all, should public funds support research? What is the role of the private sector in research and development? What is the federal-provincial relationship to be in research, in funding and in training? What are the conditions under which research in Canada will thrive and contribute to the national good?

In a booklet prepared for the March 22-23 National Economic Conference, the Minister of State for Science and Technology documented the necessity for research and the inadequacy of current funding and research effort in Canada. His booklet establishes the fact that: one, the ratio of gross expenditures on research and development to gross national product was 1.2 per cent in Canada in 1981, less than half the value for Germany, the U.S.A. and Japan; two, Canadian industry invests significantly less than industry invests in other major economies and the rate of increase in research and development funding by Canadian industry has dropped significantly; three, Canada imports most of our high and medium technology goods and the trade deficit in these goods is increasing; four, it is in the high and medium technology intensive industries that employment growth is fastest in Canada as is the real output growth; and five, although world demand is greatest for high technology goods, Canada has fewer research scientists and engineers per 10,000 in the labour force than most other major countries.

The minister rests his case on the need to spur the economy through the technology intensive industries. He states that "new technologies depend on continuing scientific research and their development and application require long-term investments including funding for education and academic research to meet our future needs for highly qualified people." Consistent with the history of how research and education are justified in this country, that is, through an appeal to the market implications of knowledge, the minister has focused on the benefits to the economy. However, that is not to say that he does not recognize the essential importance of basic research whether or not it appears to have market value or immediate application.

● (1540)

The day after the Economic Conference, the Toronto Sunday Star published an editorial on the need to boost university research. It was pointed out that there is no stability in the current funding arrangement and that stability is crucial; that there is no long-term plan for the support of university research; that the problems of overhead costs for sponsored research in universities mean that student support is beggared by university managers, to the detriment of both research and teaching.

The editorial went on to say:

Last August the Tories promised to double research and development in universities, federal labs and industry to 2.5% of gross national product . . . the Tories should back up this promise with swift action.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marsden: What is the swift action by the Conservative government? Let us consider why one might be concerned in April of 1985 about the coming federal budget and the attitudes and policies of this government toward basic research and researchers in Canada.

I have several considerations to put before you, all of which impinge significantly upon researchers in Ontario but which affect all Canadian researchers.

My first concern is the instability and uncertainty. For years, reports on research have indicated that the research community requires stability of funding once a project is approved in order to carry out efficiently organized and scientifically excellent research. The previous government had promised supplementary grants to the federal granting councils, which the new government, on taking power, indicated it wished to review. That is quite understandable. But the government came to power in September, and by February, 1985, those grants were still under review; that is, six months later.

What is the consequence? On February 5, 1985, the Ottawa Citizen reported that about 200 young scientists whose projects had been approved by the MRC and then deferred were still waiting to get their work going. Furthermore, about 1,400 other scientists were still awaiting new laboratory equipment through grants which had been promised from NSERC.

All of these scientists were left to cool their highly and expensively trained brains for month after month, while in the real world of science other scientists in other countries scooped the ideas, published the research and scientific papers, and made the medical and scientific applications, with all of the economic and industrial ramifications thereof.

The message to those young researchers is that Canada is not a good place in which to work; that it is more like a developing country than a scientifically developed environment.

But was that temporary chaos? Is that instability to be over now that the government has settled into power?

The 1985-86 estimates show that the government is planning to continue the uncertainty and the instability shown over the past months.

As Social Sciences in Canada, volume 13, No. 1, reports in April of this year, the 1985-86 estimates are the minimum allocation to the councils, pushing the councils into appeals for supplementary funding. I quote from that publication:

NSERC will need to receive an additional $16 million in order to preserve the level of activity attained last year . . . The financial situation facing MRC is dramatic: the 1985-86 estimates represent an actual decrease of $26.4 million or 16.8 per cent compared to the 1984-85 budget . . . SSHRC also faces a real budgetary decrease ($1.9 million).

This instability, then, is government policy; it is planned to continue. Despite the promises and despite the appearance of understanding, this area of work in Canada, which all experts agree has great importance, especially in the current circumstances, is not to be recognized by stability in 1985-86.

I call on the government to recognize the intrinsic nature of basic research, whether in universities, government agencies, or the private sector, and to recognize the need for long term planning and stability in both human and financial forms.

My second concern is with the arbitrary and ignorant interference in research which is taking place. Last November, all Canadians expected the new government to make budget cuts and to realign programs and priorities. After all, that is one of the reasons why there is a new government. No one in the research community expected to be untouched by these changes—and, after all, many members of that vast community must have voted for the new government. But the science and research community was not prepared for the manner in which the November cuts were carried out.

While the Minister of Finance did not refer to those cuts in his statement, we read about them in the Expenditure and Program Review tabled by the President of the Treasury Board at the same time. His cuts, totalling $4.244 billion over all, are listed in such a way that the effect on research is difficult to recognize in most instances.

As I will document, those cuts were made without consultation and in considerable and frightening ignorance of the linkages between research and the economy, research and the national interest.

As the AUCC has said in its recent report on the impact of the cuts based on responses from universities across Canada, the announced budgetary cuts, many of which would mean cuts to support of university research, were received by the university research community with feelings which ranged from disappointment to dismay.

The report goes on to say:

A common concern, expressed by many, was that there had not been sufficient awareness of the impact on research activities of the cuts. There seemed to be no logic, in scientific or economic terms, nor an appropriate awareness of the cost-benefit consequences of the cuts.

Why do I assert that the cuts were arbitrary? The Globe and Mail reported, in March 1985, what happened in the National Research Council as a result of those November cuts. Three regional research centres and five continuing programs were forced to close, laying off 80 NRC employees—and all of this before the government got involved in the U.S. space station program, which is leading to a further diversion of $8.8 million from NRC's program budget.

Presumably programs are cut from time to time and people are laid off; but this government did not consult the scientists about which programs to close.

Dr. Locke, the former director of the Herzberg Institute, was quoted in the Globe and Mail as saying that the "cuts were dictated to the council."

This was justified on the basis that no one was to know what was in the November economic statement.

Given the secrecy which surrounds budgets in this country, what type of arbitrary consequences in important areas of research can we then expect in the May budget?

There are other examples of these arbitrary moves, which I shall list later.

Why do I assert that the government displayed unusual ignorance in the November cuts? The pièce de résistance in that regard was, of course, the elimination of the 1986 census. This was to save $100 million between 1985 and 1988. But, of course, the 1986 census was restored on November 21, as soon as we all left for the Christmas break. The government had discovered that provincial governments, business people, as well as researchers, could not do without that census. What is more, the government itself discovered that it could not arrange transfer payments or carry on with other important federal business without that census.

It is difficult to believe that the minister responsible for the census, himself a former professor of mathematics at the University of Calgary, knew so little about the census that he could allow such a cut to pass.

It is evident that he did not consult his own officials, since they, or any one of the significant communities—business, provincial governments, researchers, universities—could have outlined for him, at a moment's notice, the consequences of such an arbitrary and extraordinary move.

This suggests to me that, like the Minister of State for Science and Technology, who appears to truly understand the importance of research, the Minister of Supply and Services has little to say in government, and certainly not in terms of the importance of the work which has gone on for so many years in Statistics Canada.

My third concern is that there appears to be no understanding of the nature of scientific standards and quality. This other attitude, revealed by the government in its November cuts, is equally troublesome. The government seems to believe that the considerable reputation built up in this country for high quality research and standards which are internationally recognized, is worth little. One example will suffice.

In November, the Toronto-Guelph Toxicology Centre, a project upon which a great deal of public money had already been spent, with the support of the Ontario government, since being conceived several years ago was cancelled. This saved $5.4 million in 1985-86. Before and since we have read daily in our newspapers about toxicological disasters, and this has been reflected in the dismay heard among members of Parliament, both Progressive Conservative and opposition members.

The Toronto-Guelph Toxicology Centre, which had been developed between the University of Toronto and the University of Guelph, would have brought together a great deal of scientific strength; but above all, it would have ensured the maintenance of very high standards and inspired confidence in the public about the results of their work.

This was not to be simply a testing laboratory, although it would have done testing, but a research project important to forestalling these recurring and very worrisome environmental and health hazards.

● (1550)

Other cuts in environmental, ecological and biological research had led to a public outcry, particularly in the wildlife service. So on February 8, 1985, the Minister of the Environment announced that $1 million had been put aside "for use by private sector organizations doing wildlife and toxicology research". That money, the release stated, was available because of the administrative cuts of the minister last fall. I read that on April 22 the minister answered a question from a member of Parliament for Saskatchewan who, alarmed by what was going on, asked for support for toxicological research in Saskatchewan. The minister replied

Any proposal concerning private sector participation in our toxicology research will be carefully and gratefully considered.

Evidently this is now government policy and not simply a ministerial error.

I will put aside the question of what kind of research would be done by private interests, or how it is to be controlled and assessed; who is to give out this support; and whether or not any of the results will be made public, although these are, of course, all important issues, and I will raise only the question of public confidence. As a citizen, who will be satisfied to discover that toxicology research is to be done by chemical or pharmaceutical companies? As a medical or toxicological researcher, would you want to have to take a piece of contract research from a company with an apparent vested interest in order to carry on your work? As a university administrator, how much contract research for the private sector would you want your faculty working on in such sensitive fields? As a citizen, or as a transport driver, possibly affected by PCB spills, chemical fumes or drug testing, would you have confidence in this research? Of course, this is not the only research funding in toxicology, but the government's approach reflects an attitude and a policy which indicates that this government fails to understand the need for high quality to be real, and to be seen to be real, in order for Canadian citizens to support this kind of funding. It is that kind of openness and that kind of high quality that, of course, universities pledge themselves to maintain.

My next concern is the lack of commitment to the future. The cancellation of the Toronto-Guelph Toxicology Centre illustrates another major problem. That centre has, or had, a graduate program established to draw efficiently upon the resources of two big universities, rather than to replicate them or compete for them. Graduate students from a variety of fields were being encouraged to work together and benefit from that interaction. Both universities have spent a considerable amount of time and effort to develop and improve the program. That program is now crippled. It means that the kind of public identification which is needed to recognize the crucial nature of toxicological research, and to attract bright and promising scholars to that field, will not be present.

Who does the government think is going to carry out toxicological research in Canada? Who is going to do the work for the private sector? I presume that this government is content to have researchers recruited from outside our borders, and I do not agree with that attitude at all—nor, I believe, will most Canadians.

Privatization sounds a bell in the hearts of many from the new right. Enterprise, entrepreneurs, investors and the "discipline of the market" are all very well until you find yourself with a drug reaction, or an environmental or wildlife disaster, or some new unknown sickness or other catastrophe; also when you find that the research is all from outside Canada, that the standards are not tested or known in Canada, the research has not been done here or is not available, or, worse, the results of research are proprietary; or when you find that your daughter or son cannot follow a career in this area of national interest because there are no spaces in Canada's universities. I regard this cut as a short-term affront and a long-term catastrophe for Canada, and it is only one of many.

Finally, I should like to raise the question of the wastage of public funds. The November cuts had another feature which indicated that the government suffered not only from lack of thought or ignorance of results, not only from little understanding of research standards and from arbitrariness in its approach to research support, but also that these characteristics have resulted in a massive wastage of public funds. I offer only two examples here to be added to what you have already heard about the wastage in time and talent of young scientists and researchers.

The first is a list from the National Research Council Environmental Secretariat, which shows, by subcommittee, the impact of those cuts on a long list of projects which were under way. Some were cancelled at the design stage, some were cancelled at the early stages, and some are to be published anyway. But we find several projects in which we read that 90 per cent of the scientific analysis had been completed and the work was cancelled; or projects on "the relative importance of various routes of human exposure to dioxins and related compounds", of which the scientific analysis was complete which "may be published by another agency".

But if you go to your local university and ask the head of botany, or biology, or health sciences, or zoology, or development economics, or organizational sciences, you will find example after example of graduate students cut off in mid-thesis because the supervisor's research grant was cancelled or dreadfully curtailed, so that those students, having invested several years of their life and public moneys, have to retool, redesign and prepare again for their thesis—or drop out, or leave for a university elsewhere in which such wastage is not likely to occur.

A nearly completed report on "Laser Radiation and Human Health Effects" was cancelled, according to this list. But would you not like to see that report, for which the work had been prepared with tax dollars and which potentially is of great significance? The granting councils and the scientific panels which judge the funding of these research projects, large and small, are the proper judges of where cuts should be made, when they should be made and how they should be made. To do otherwise is to waste everything.

But there are indirect effects also. We read, on March 31, in the Toronto Sunday Star, about the death of the publicly-funded high-tech teletext service, called IRIS, Information Relayed Instantly from Source, as a result of the cuts in communications. Seven million of your dollars and mine had already been spent on this project and the field trials which had tested the results. According to the President of Norpak, Inc. of Kanata, the U.S.A. will benefit greatly from that development which Canada funded and created and which the Americans will exploit.

But the government does not have to behave in the way in which it has and in a way that has these effects on research. The research community is not a publicity-conscious lobby; it does not have the economic clout of the business community; it does not have an interested public hanging on its every move. You can disrupt, underfund, berate and ignore the research community and get away with it in the short run, but in the medium and long run it is Canada and every Canadian who feels the consequences in the quality of their life, in their opportunities in life and in the labour market, in Canada's situation nationally and internationally, and in their pocket-book.

I would like to conclude by speaking specifically about the province of Ontario. In Ontario, we have the largest university system of any province, involving over 180,000 full-time and 105,000 part-time students in 19 universities. Furthermore, the

Bovey Commission reports that in 1982 Ontario had 35 per cent of the Canadian population but accounted for 41 per cent of all sponsored university research. Ontario has some of the finest research universities in Canada and, indeed, anywhere. The quality of the research achievements is internationally recognized. The University of Toronto is the largest research university in Canada and is working hard, against considerable odds, to maintain standards and the extent of basic research in this country. In this we have the support of the private sector and alumnae to some great extent. It is tempting to read into the record all of the important projects that have been done or are under way, for which visitors arrive from all over the world. But I will not take the time to do that now.

As I said earlier, the impact of the November cuts is still being worked out as grants and projects are not renewed and programs are ended. I cannot yet produce the list of research projects cancelled, of researchers, both faculty and student, cut off in the middle of an important project, nor can I calculate the wastage of public investment. It is precisely because the impacts and results cannot be easily assessed that the government must show more sensitivity and concern for the nature of basic research.

The Bovey Commission on the future development of the universities of Ontario, which reported in December, 1984, had a great deal to say about the importance of research, excellence in research, innovation and the future of the province and the nation. They make a distinction between "resource-intensive" research and "core university research." The latter refers to the university research and scholarship which must accompany all disciplines, while the former refers to those research fields which demand a great deal of "highly qualified manpower, physical facilities, sophisticated equipment and efficient information retrieval systems."

● (1600)

Among other points in their discussion they emphasize:

...the Commission has become convinced that the research funding arrangements under which Ontario universities operate are no longer adequate. They were not designed to meet the requirements of the kind of research development which has taken place over the last decade and which shows signs of further acceleration.

They document in this report the special disadvantages which are found in Ontario in, for example, infrastructure costs where most other provinces lead Ontario. Support is being siphoned off from other areas to support research overheads.

In their recommendations the Bovey commissioners make some proposals for changes to tax measures which I strongly hope the federal government will pay attention to in the coming budget. But their overall recommendations have to do with support for the resource-intensive research areas. Here they make a number of calculations about the costs of this type of research which are found in their recommendation No. 40. The Bovey Commission is only one in a series of examinations of the province's post-secondary system, all of which regard research as important. But the capacity of universities in Ontario to support research has actually declined over the years, as the Bovey Commission illustrates in its Appendix 6, and is lower in Ontario than in Canada as a whole.

This subject of research, its importance and its financing, is taken up as well in the recent Johnson Report to which I have already referred. After a penetrating and lucid analysis of the role of the post-secondary system as viewed by the Parliament of Canada, Johnson strongly recommends two changes in the funding of research—a funding of the indirect costs of sponsored research in the universities and the development of a long-term plan for the support of research through funding to the granting councils. Furthermore, Johnson recommends the development of world-class centres of excellence to ensure the national and international competitiveness of research in areas of key scope and importance in Canada.

The areas with which the Minister of State for Science and Technology concerns himself are similar to the concerns of both Bovey and Johnson. In Ontario, although all areas of research are encouraged and important, nonetheless our scholars and researchers are well placed to carry out the research in high technology areas and high scholarship which will make the province a centre for development in Canada. This is true not only in universities but through the Canadian Institute of Advanced Research. It appears that researchers, government commissions, both federal and provincial, and the relevant ministers recognize the crucial importance of this issue. That being the case, one is left bewildered by the actions of the federal government in November last and in the Estimates for 1985-86, and depressed by the prospects for the coming budget.

For researchers in Ontario and other researchers across the country I ask the government for: first, no cuts or program changes or realignments without consultation with those involved; second, a recognition of the long-term nature of much research and the need for stability of support once a project has been approved and begun; third, the need for arm's-length, independent decision-making by the granting councils in the support of research to maintain the interest in science and not in meeting particular political objectives—for which contract research is an easily available route; fourth, the early implementation of the recommendations for increased support and pursuit of the means by which excellent research may be continued and enhanced in Canada; and, fifth, an examination of the Bovey Commission recommendations with respect to tax changes, private sector support of research and involvement in research.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 1, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Leo E. Kolber: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to greet two distinguished physicians and their wives from Montreal, Dr. and Mrs. Sheiner and Dr. and Mrs. Gelfand.

Dr. Nathan Sheiner is Chief of Surgery and Dr. Morrie Gelfand is Chief of Gynaecology and Obstetrics at the Jewish General Hospital. They are both marvellous fellows and fine physicians. In fact, Dr. Gelfand delivered one of my children.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED "EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE"

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, May 8, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future," tabled at the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LIMITED CANCELLATION OF DOOR-TO-DOOR DELIVERY SERVICE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the federal government has taken any action in connection with the Canada Post announcement that it will cancel door-to-door mail delivery in the region from Oakville to Port Hope and north to Richmond Hill, where there will be new subdivisions built.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have no positive information on the point my honourable friend raises. I can only say that, as he knows, Canada Post is now an independent corporation and, as such, has some latitude in deciding how it will operate. I recognize, however, that this is a matter of great public interest, and I shall find out what I can for my honourable friend.

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF TICKET AGENTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, today is May 1, commonly called "May Day," a day on which leaders of governments all over this country pay tribute to the workers and the trade union movement. Those very people have many tributes paid to them by the leaders of all political parties and all candidates every time there is an election.

On that note, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he can bring us up to date on what is transpiring concerning the Air Canada strike. I realize that the mediator has withdrawn, but what is happening now?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish I could give my honourable friend an optimistic report on this matter. I have to tell him that, to the best of my knowledge, the two parties have agreed to disagree and, unless there has been some development in the very recent past, I do not believe that any further arrangements have been made by the mediator to bring the parties together in order to obtain a settlement.

I am hopeful, however, that the present situation will not last for very long, that both parties will meet around the bargaining table at an early date. I shall make some inquiries for my honourable friend to see if I can be more explicit in my reply than I have been so far.

Senator Muir: I thank the Leader of the Government. As a supplementary, may I ask him whether, when he is making those inquiries, it would be possible for him to suggest to the government that the Minister of Labour become involved. This has happened, during my 28 years on the Hill, on quite a number of occasions, and has resulted, quite a number of times, in achieving a successful outcome, whether that intervention was by the Minister of Labour of a Conservative government or a Liberal government. It would be a good thing for the minister to become involved, although some people might not agree with it. It would show initiative on his part. Others have done so in other labour disputes and have worked with both parties in hotel rooms night after night until a settlement of the problem has been reached.

I do not believe that the present Minister of Labour is a Solomon, but he is a pretty good gentleman and he may be able to do something along those lines. The stated purpose of this government is to get the country moving. I believe it is starting to move, and for that reason we should not allow this strike to continue indefinitely. I am not sure if the Leader of the Government is aware of the entire situation pertaining to this matter. I am sure the public would like to know what has transpired. There are undoubtedly faults on both sides. The Leader of the Government's view of the situation may be somewhat different from that of the government.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that the government has available to it the services of a number of skillful mediators in this labour dispute. The minister himself is no slouch. I believe the government's present position is that the stage has not been reached that would justify the government's intervention. It is the government's hope that the matter will be settled between the parties, as such disputes normally are under the collective bargaining system.

I can tell my honourable friend that I will make sure that his recommendation is passed on to the minister for his attention.

Senator Muir: I again thank the Leader of the Government for his kindness. As a further supplementary, may I ask him whether the government would be interested in contacting Mr. Claude Taylor, who is a very fine gentleman and who ran the airline for many years with great success? Mr. Taylor is respected by the airline workers, and it might be possible for him to become involved.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I will pass that proposal along.

PARLIAMENT

STAFF RELATIONS—DENIAL OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in joining with Senator Muir in paying tribute to Canadian workers on May 1, the traditional workers' day throughout the world, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government why his government is denying the full collective bargaining rights given to employees under the Canada Labour Code by introducing legislation in the other place denying 3,000 messengers, drivers, cafeteria and maintenance workers on Parliament Hill the right to strike.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should report that the bill which has been referred to is the result of an all-party agreement reached in the time of the former government. The intention to introduce such legislation was announced, I believe, during the election by one of the members of that government. Its background is well known.

With respect to the question concerning the right to strike, we must remember that in dealing with this matter we have to determine the nature of the services provided by those who are affected. In industrial areas where the fiat of the federal government is in force, the Canada Labour Code applies which, of course, provides for the right to strike. In the case of the Public Service, the Public Service Staff Relations Act applies. Under that act great strides have been made towards reaching a position where industrial action in the form of a strike will not be contemplated, even though it may be allowed. Better methods of arriving at understandings are employed. I think this is a helpful development.

The employees on Parliament Hill are closer to the employees in the Public Service than they are to those in the industrial sector who are covered by the Canada Labour Code. It was decided that, as they were not specifically covered by the labour laws of the country, it would be wise to underline their position and to accord to them certain rights which it is questionable that they now have. That is the basis of this bill. I shall not get into debating the bill because it is a long one and has many interesting clauses which expand employees' rights beyond those which are provided in the Public Service Staff Relations Act. However, that is another question.

With respect to whether or not employees should have the right to strike and whether or not arbitration should be used instead, the government had to weigh the desires or feelings of employees against the necessity of ensuring that Parliament could function without fear of interruption. It was decided that arbitration was a fair balance, because it not only binds the employee but it also binds the employer. There is no reason to think that under compulsory arbitration the employer will get everything he wants, any more than there is reason to think that the employees will get everything they want. In the case of the employees covered by this bill, it could be argued that some of their activities are not essential to the functioning of Parliament. I do not intend to get into that matter. I think that, on the whole, the government felt that the people expect Parliament to be allowed to continue to function without being interrupted by labour disputes. It is for that basic reason that it was decided to proceed in the way to which my honourable friend has referred.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the right to strike is now guaranteed by the Constitution, can the Leader of the Government state here, this afternoon, that his government has obtained an opinion or advice from the Department of Justice as to whether or not this legislation that is now before the House of Commons is constitutional?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend has been reading a different Constitution from the one I have read. As I read it, the right to organize is enshrined in the Constitution, but I am not satisfied that the right to strike is. I would have to look at that document again before I could accept the premise of my honourable friend's question.

Senator Flynn: You can make your speech in due course.

Senator Haidasz: You are against the spirit of the Constitution.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REPLACEMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to refer to a question I asked yesterday with regard to the board of directors of Canadian National Railways. I see that part of my question has been answered because three new appointments to the board have apparently been made. I merely want to indicate to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, although my question has been partly answered by those appointments, I would still like answers to the other parts.

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can assure my honourable friend that I would not consider a report in a newspaper to be an adequate answer to any question he has asked me in this chamber. I will see that he gets a full answer in due course.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—HON. FLORENCE BIRD

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to go back, if I may, to a question I asked previously concerning the circumstances under which Senator Florence Bird was not re-appointed to the Refugee Advisory Council.

My question today is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. You will recall that yesterday I asked you a further question concerning this matter and your response was that you had not undertaken to look at the circumstances surrounding this matter. However, on April 24, at page 789 of Debates of the Senate, you said:

I will try to find out what the circumstances were.

That answer was given a full seven days ago, and I am wondering whether your lack of response means that you have become indifferent to the fate of our mutual friend.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think my honourable friend should charge me with that discourtesy. I am not indifferent; in fact, I am very "different". I am very interested in the question, as I am interested in all of the questions that I receive from my honourable friend, and if on a previous occasion I undertook to answer it in the way that she suggests I did, I will see that she gets such an answer.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—DECLARATION ON INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I refer to a delayed answer given yesterday by the Leader of the Government in the Senate to my question with respect to the Summit Meeting in Quebec City. I am grateful to the minister for the information, including the fact that the declaration issued following the Quebec Summit contains no new concepts or commitments. I think it is helpful to know that Canada did not undertake any new commitments or adopt new concepts at that meeting.

However, I would like to inquire further with respect to the paragraph relating to Canada's consultations with the United States on the Geneva arms control negotiations, and my question is in two parts. The first part has to do with the statement made by the minister that Canada is making known Canadian views and positions on arms control. Would the minister undertake to tell us, at some future time and in some detail, what views Canada is expressing and what positions it is taking on these particular arms control negotiations? In other words, what is our view and what are we saying to the United States on this important matter?

The second part of my question may be more difficult, but I would like to know whether the United States has made known to its allies the negotiating stance it is following at the Geneva conference. If so, is it possible for the Government of Canada to tell us in any detail what the position of the United States is on the various baskets that are under negotiation in Geneva?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): With respect to the first question, which relates to a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to what he has been doing in this matter, I will consult with him and see whether there is any statement he can authorize me to give to the house.

On the second matter, I should think that it would not be possible for me to answer in any detail, because any information that the United States may have given us concerning its negotiating stance in Geneva is naturally information which they would regard as confidential insofar as it does affect the course of what they are trying to do there. Therefore, it would not be in their best interests, I suspect, to disclose their intentions to the world before they were compelled to do so in the course of negotiations. For this reason, I rather doubt if that information could be obtained.

Senator MacEachen: I would respect that stand if, indeed, the United States had not disclosed publicly what it is doing at the Geneva arms talks and if it had told its allies that it wants its position kept in confidence. However, I would draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the fact that, from time to time, the United States itself has made public the positions it has taken at Geneva. Therefore, I really find it rather odd that this veil of silence should be cast over these all-important negotiations, the importance of which is testified to in this answer. If the United States has said that its allies should not reveal information, that is fine, but I should like to know if that is what the United States has said.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is one thing for the United States to leak its own position to the public, and when the officials there do so, they probably have a purpose in mind. However, it is quite another thing for their allies to take upon themselves the task of disclosing that information if they have been requested not to do so by the United States.

I am sure that anything that has been made public in the United States has been made public because it is their policy that that should be so. I am equally sure that they do not expect their allies to do that job for them.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government find out whether the United States has informed any of its foreign relations committees in Washington as to what it is going to do at Geneva, and if so, why can the Parliament of Canada not be told that position?

Senator Roblin: I cannot undertake to find out what the American government has done in terms of its relations with Congress. That is not within my sphere of responsibility or authority. So, I suppose I will just have to read the New York Times!

CUSTOMS ACT SPECIAL IMPORT MEASURES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the third reading of Bill C-40, to confirm certain acts or things done on behalf of the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise and to amend the Customs Act and the Special Import Measures Act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday at the conclusion of second reading debate I asked Senator Balfour if he would obtain some information and provide it at the third reading stage. I do not intend to hold the bill up until we have received that information, but, if he has the information, would he let us have it?

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I have made the inquiries I undertook to make. I have been advised by the Department of Justice that the case that was before the Federal Court of Appeal—which really precipitated this legislation—is under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Should the Supreme Court of Canada sustain the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, then, indeed, I think other deputy ministers will have problems similar to that which the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise had. I think we will have to await the outcome of the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine that.

Senator Frith: With leave, honourable senators, since I am speaking again—

An Hon. Senator: You do not need leave.

Senator Frith: That is right; I only need leave at the second reading stage.

Senator Flynn: You have said nothing up to now.

Senator Frith: That is right; I did not intend to say anything up to now. I only intended to ask questions.

Then, to put that into the context of this bill, this is one area in which it is felt, even pending the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, that an interim remedy in the form of legislation is necessary.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, because of the interference with commercial transactions involving importers, that is precisely the situation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-18, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, to amend an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to amend the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act, the Parole Act and the Weights and Measures Act, to repeal certain other Acts and to make other consequential amendments".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am going to request that the order stand until tomorrow. I simply want to explain that it is Senator Asselin's intention to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs after second reading has been given. Therefore, I just want to be sure that honourable senators know that I have no intention of slowing that process and that I will support such a suggestion tomorrow when I have made an intervention briefer than Senator Asselin's—although that is not meant to criticize the excellent speech that Senator Asselin made yesterday.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

OVERFISHING BY WEST GERMAN FLEET IN WATERS UNDER CANADIAN JURISDICTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday in the House of Commons the member for Gander-Twillingate raised the case of overfishing by the West German fleet in waters under Canadian jurisdiction. I understand that there has been serious overfishing, and I wonder whether the Government of Canada has had discussions with the German authorities or with the authorities of the European Economic Community about what appears to be a violation of the arrangements between Canada and the European Community on fisheries under Canadian jurisdiction.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is correct that the question was raised in the other place yesterday, and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans at that time replied that he had made some preliminary inquiries with respect to the matter but intended to report to the house more fully today. I expect that when he does so he will be able to deal with the question raised by my honourable friend. If his reply today does not cover the point in question, I will make some inquiries.

Senator MacEachen: Would the minister consider the possibility that the occasion of the Bonn Summit where the Federal Chancellor and Foreign Minister Genscher are meeting with the Canadian Prime Minister and other ministers might provide the opportunity to raise this matter? I know that it might not be agreeable to the Prime Minister to raise rancorous subjects, but it seems to me that Canadian interests are so directly involved that it might be appropriate for the Canadian government to make the West German ministers aware of the concern that is expressed. I can assure my honourable friend that there is deep concern in the Atlantic provinces about this particular incident.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is right again. I believe that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has acknowledged the importance of the matter and the seriousness of the concern expressed by some. I think it is necessary to be sure of our position before we take any action in this matter. In other words, we must make sure that the facts are clearly established, and if there has been a breach of the agreements we have made, it must be carefully identified before further action can be taken.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think there is any doubt, honourable senators, about the breach. I understand that the overfishing has been very substantial; that the licence given to the West German fleet is for seven to nine thousand tonnes; that the fleet has taken in excess of an additional twelve thousand tonnes, and that the fishing is continuing. I am not complaining, but I really would like to know whether the Canadian government has made any protest or representations to the authorities. I cannot believe that it has not, but I think that it ought to be strengthened by further pressure on the German authorities, perhaps at the Summit, to inject a note of realism into the deliberations.

Senator Roblin: I have to say that I have full confidence in the zeal of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to protect our interests and our rights in this matter. I am perfectly sure that, if he is convinced there has been a breach of the regulations—and prima facie, on the information received, it would appear that that is so—he will certainly take the most vigorous action in respect of it.

I rather doubt that it would be appropriate or timely, in view of what is going on in the next day or two, to refer the matter to Bonn, since there are matters of substance being discussed there. Speaking purely off the cuff and giving a private opinion, which I am really not allowed to do, one must be careful to preserve one's bargaining power for issues which require maximum support. I by no means minimize this problem, because it is very important to those whose livelihood is concerned, but I believe that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is an active and energetic man, and I am sure he will take the necessary steps.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. There are really two precedents, which I find very interesting in the light of Senator Roblin's answer. First of all, under the agreement with the EEC, it is obvious that under no circumstances can overfishing be accepted and countenanced. In fact, there are precedents where vessels of certain countries—and I am thinking of Spain in particular—have been arrested and taken to port and charged. This is an obvious, serious breach of contract, especially since the West Germans are members of the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization, and the matter should not be treated lightly.

I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows that during the Helsinki Conference in 1975 or 1976 we were having difficulty with the Soviet Union. The then Prime Minister did not think it beneath his dignity to raise the issue with Premier Kosygin and even Secretary Brezhnev, and the matter was sorted out during that meeting in Helsinki in a matter of hours. I am wondering why this government is not moving as quickly as that government did.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think my friend has correctly informed us with respect to what happened in the past. I would be unhappy if my response to this question has indicated that I am not fully convinced of the seriousness of the matter, and indeed, in spite of what I have said, it may be desirable to take the step that has been proposed to us. However, I think I must leave it to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, to advise further on this matter. When he was spoken to about this matter yesterday, he said in the house:

I will take very careful notice of the representation of the honourable member. I hope I will be able to give him a response by at least this time tomorrow.

—which is, of course, Question Period today. Therefore, I really must wait until I hear what my colleague has said before I can answer questions on the matter with any degree of accuracy.

However, if it will make the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate feel any better, and I hope it will, I will make sure that his comment is conveyed to the minister, in case it should be possible to take advantage of it.

TRADE

IMPORTS FROM THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to an item of continuing importance for Canada, and that is, of course, trade, and to a continuing problem that we have with reference to imports. This problem has been highlighted recently by the Prime Minister's volunteering to be the champion for Third World countries at the Bonn Economic Summit. He will champion their cause specifically by trying to persuade his colleagues in the rich nations to open their doors to exports from Third World countries.

• (1410)

At the same time, the Honourable Sinclair Stevens is suggesting that he will protect key domestic industries against imports. There is evidence that in implementing that policy, attempts have been made to persuade Third World countries to limit their exports to Canada.

Will the Leader of the Government try, some time between now and next week, to reconcile those two positions and let us know whether, in fact, the Prime Minister will attempt to persuade his colleagues to open their doors to more imports, and whether he will, at the same time, be supporting his minister's attempts to close the doors?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will do my best to reconcile those two positions right now.

Senator Frith: Good luck!

Senator Roblin: I should point out that products from Third World countries, particularly textiles, shoes and similar products, enter Canada under regulations that were in effect before this government came to power; in other words, the regulations are the ones that were deemed advisable by our predecessors.

Senator Frith: Are you renouncing them?

Senator Roblin: What has happened now is that the Prime Minister has said in Bonn that he is conscious of the problems Third World countries have in finding export markets for their products in view of the general protectionist trends there are around the world these days.

The report I have received is a press report, so I do not think I should be too positive about it, and it says that the Prime Minister intends to make representations on that matter.

What my colleague, the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, has said, again as I read from press reports—and I will be glad to talk with him directly about this—is that he intends to see how we should re-organize the system of protection we now have with respect to textiles and other commodities in which Third World countries might be interested. His suggestion is that, instead of quotas—and it is only a suggestion, it does not represent policy; it has not been placed in concrete form—it might be useful to look at a different method of allocating the market between domestic producers and those who wish to receive exports from Third World countries. He has suggested that it might be useful to do it on a percentage-of-the-market basis. One will see that there will be two different amounts when these two methods of control are compared.

What the minister has said so far represents, in a sense, a trial balloon as to what he thinks might be useful to consider. That is as far as he has gone. I think it would be useful to consider that proposition.

That proposition will have to be examined with those concerned in Canada and in light of the attitude of the Department of External Affairs to the question of trade with Third World countries. It may be that we can come up with an improved situation. That is the aim of the government.

Senator Frith: As a supplementary, honourable senators, perhaps when having a closer look at the suggestions, and even the trial balloons, the Leader of the Government will keep in mind that the essence of the question is, put very simply, whether we are going to be talking about opening doors and persuading others to open doors in Bonn, when, whatever we are doing ourselves—whether it be re-organization or something else—will have the effect of closing doors here.

Senator Roblin: I do not think my honourable friend would suggest for a moment that we do not have some controls in respect of imports from Third World countries that affect significant Canadian economic interests which are having a hard time competing. I do not think he would say that we should abandon all efforts to adjust that situation.

It would be highly desirable, in my opinion, if some method could be found to phase out our interest in those non-competitive industries, if such they are, to provide greater space. However, I think one has to strive for a balance between providing the maximum room we can for imports from Third World countries while avoiding doing a serious injustice to Canadian workers.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that the Leader of the Government knows that he and I share some views on that subject. I want to be sure that when looking into whatever proposals are being made and what the policy is we will not be asking our Summit colleagues to, in effect, open certain doors while we will be closing the same doors.

Senator Roblin: I can give my honourable friend the assurance that we will certainly be guided by common sense and good judgment in dealing with our values.

Senator Frith: That would be a refreshing change.

Senator Flynn: You are hoping that we will make a mistake.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST NICARAGUA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government about the situation that has been created by the announcement by the President of the United States that economic sanctions are to be applied against Nicaragua. In view of the intimate relationship that allegedly exists now between Canada and the United States and the commitment to consultation between the two countries that has emanated from successive meetings between ministers, can the Leader of the Government explain why the Canadian government received no advance notice and why no consultation was entered into by the Government of the United States with respect to the imposition of these sanctions?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, I am not able to explain why the Canadian government was not consulted. The reason for that is that the motives for the actions, or the inactions as the case may be, were American ones. They were not within our control.

Senator Frith: Can we say that you are damned mad and that you are not going to take it any more?

Senator Roblin: No, because I think that our relations with Nicaragua will remain unchanged in spite of the American action. Normal diplomatic and economic relations between Canada and Nicaragua are not changed by the American policy in this respect, nor, indeed, have they asked us to change them.

Senator MacEachen: Does the leader not think that it might have been courteous of the American government to advise the Canadian government and its allies of its intention to impose these sanctions? It looks to me like business as usual, Grenada re-enacted, which caused so much concern among allies of the United States. Apparently nothing has changed even though the Prime Minister has put a great deal of stock in "refurbishing" the relationship. The relationship seems to be the same. In other words, the Americans act and the allies are told later.

Senator Frith: He even sings in duets!

Senator Steuart: Those Irish eyes are crying.

Senator Roblin: I fully expect that from time to time the governments of other countries will take actions without consulting us, no matter how close our relationship to them may be. It is fruitless to complain, in one sense, because they are the masters of their fate in that respect. I fully expect that the Government of Canada will take actions in matters which some of our associates and allies might consider affect them, without consulting them in advance. That happens to be one of the hazards of international communication.

For myself, I must say frankly that if the Government of the United States had told us in advance, I would have considered it a reasonable thing to do. However, since they decided not to do so, we have to establish our own position and stick with it.

Senator MacEachen: I agree with Leader of the Government that we must establish our own position, and I am pleased to notice that the Canadian government has disagreed, at least insofar as its own policy is concerned, with the action of the United States government. Have any representations been made by the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States with respect to the status of Canadian subsidiaries of American firms in doing business with Nicaragua? Have we stated our opposition to any effort by the United States government to control the conduct of such subsidiary firms in making sales of parts and so on to Nicaragua?

Senator Frith: As they did with Cuba.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend places me in a difficult position in that sometimes he criticizes me because we agree with the United States and sometimes he criticizes me because we do not agree with the United States. On this occasion he praises us because we do not agree with the United States. At least we have that little plus mark to lay on our conscience.

● (1420)

I can tell my honourable friend that to the best of our knowledge there is no extraterritorial reach in the embargo that the United States has announced. It does not affect American subsidiaries in Canada, or, so far as I know, elsewhere. So it is entirely a domestic matter for the Americans and it does not affect Canadian interests in any sense in which territoriality is attempted to be exercised with respect to our economy.

Senator MacEachen: Is the minister giving us an assurance that that will be the policy of the United States government in the implementation of the embargo?

Senator Roblin: I can give no assurances whatsoever about the policy of the United States government. But I can tell my honourable friend that our interpretation is that the measures they have taken—and we believe it to be correct—exclude any extraterritorial reach in respect of this embargo.

Senator MacEachen: Have you asked the United States what its intention is?

Senator Roblin: With respect to extraterritoriality?

Senator MacEachen: Yes.

Senator Roblin: No, because it does not affect us.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What will the policy be if they attempt to extend it in that way, as we know they have done in the past?

Senator Roblin: I do not deal with hypothetical questions; but I hazard a guess the policy would be the same as that of any other government.

Senator MacEachen: A year or so ago there was a bill before the American Congress in which the President and officers of his administration clearly stated their intention to achieve foreign policy objectives through control over re-export of goods, and the movement of goods from third countries. That is embedded in their policy. I am wondering if in this case they have said "No, we will not apply that policy."

I understand that the Leader of the Government is saying "We do not think it will affect us," and I hope that is the case; but I believe, it would be prudent to ask the United States about this and to make strong representations, because we are quite familiar not only with the policy but also with the activities of the United States government in the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will not get me into any debate with him concerning the principle of extraterritoriality, because I think it is a principle which Canadian governments do not accept. I can tell my honourable friend that the terms of the President's order have been carefully studied here, and, as I have stated, there is no extraterritorial application in those terms. If the terms change at some time, then we shall look at it.

Senator Frith: Does that mean that there is no reference in the President's order to extraterritoriality, one way or the other?

Senator Roblin: I will not enlarge on my statement, because it covers all of the facts about which I am authorized to assure the house in respect of this matter. The terms have been considered and they do not have extraterritorial application to Canada.

Senator Frith: To get back to the essence of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, do I understand that the Leader of the Government will inquire further on this question of extraterritoriality?

Senator Roblin: I believe I have made all the necessary inquiries and I am able to give my honourable friend the assurance I have given him. If circumstances change, we will talk about it again.

Senator Frith: The assurance is given on the basis of the President's order. When the Leader of the Government is asked whether the order deals with extraterritoriality either way—so that we can move from there to finding out something about our concerns—he says "I am not going any further."

That is what I would like some assurance on. Given the many concerns that quite naturally arose as soon as the announcement was made, because of our experience in the past, we should be given some assurance about the situation. That is all that we are asking for. I understand and accept what the Leader of the Government has said, namely, that on the information he has so far he is unable to give us that assurance. I am simply asking: Can he tell us on what that assurance is based and will he make some further inquiries?

Senator Roblin: I must tell my honourable friend that I regard his question as superfluous and redundant. I have dealt with the question to the best of my ability. There is nothing further that I can add. If circumstances change, then I will make a further statement. But there is nothing further that I can add at the moment. Our government is of the opinion that there is no extraterritorial application of this embargo. If we are wrong, we shall soon hear about it; but we do not think we are wrong.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I consider that answer quite unacceptable. It is a question of the verb that is being used. The Leader of the Government has said that there is nothing more that he can add. If he examines the questioning and the debate in the Senate, it is quite clear that there is something more that he can add. What he is really saying is what he says so often on these occasions, namely; "There is nothing more that I will add." He is just stonewalling.

Senator Flynn: He could very well say that of you.

Senator Frith: If that is what he is saying, then we are becoming used to that.

Senator Roblin: Part of the traditions and customs of the house with respect to the Question Period is that ministers answer questions as best they can, if they feel they are able to do that job properly. But they are under no obligation to answer any question that members might consider to be appropriate ad infinitum, as my honourable friend seeks to do.

I cannot make any further statement than the one I have made. I think that will have to be accepted by my honourable friend.

Senator Frith: We might as well get this straight, because it happens always—

Senator Flynn: It is not because you don't understand? You are—

Senator Frith: Just relax, Senator Flynn, and listen for a minute, and then start your shouting.

Senator Muir: You are now taking over the role of Senator MacEachen also, are you? You will never catch up with him.

Senator Frith: Are you now taking over for Senator Roblin, Senator Muir? Or perhaps you are taking over from Senator Flynn.

Senator Muir: I am afraid I would be an awful lot tougher with you than Senator Roblin. He is a gentleman; I am not.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I might continue.

What happens on occasions of this kind is that the Leader of the Government says that he is under no obligation to give any further answer to the question. Sometimes that is what he says. And when he says that, he is correct as far as Beauchesne or any other authority is concerned.

I do not mind him saying that. I like it to be on the record, if that is his view. He could simply say, "I just don't want to give any more information." Therefore, if he says, "I will not answer any more," then he is simply saying that he is not going to answer any more questions.

Senator Flynn: Is this a point of order or a question?

Senator Frith: But instead of saying that he says that he "cannot." The fact is, he can make inquiries and he can get more information, if he wants to.

I think he should simply come clean and say, "I will not, I won't," instead of trying to say "I can't."

Senator Roblin: Of course, that is not my position at all—

Senator Frith: Well, read Hansard.

Senator Roblin: My position is that my statement is clear and that my honourable friend's question seeking further information is not one that I have to answer. First of all, I do not have the information here now—

Senator Frith: I am asking you to get it.

Senator Roblin: I do not think I have to keep on responding positively to every suggestion for further action outside this house that my honourable friend suggests I should do.

Senator Frith: Of course, you don't.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to do it.

Senator Frith: You don't have to.

Senator Roblin: What I am going to do is to give all of the information that I have at my disposal. I think I have given a perfectly satisfactory answer. If my friend is not satisfied with the answer, that is fine with me; but I believe that I have discharged my obligation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: That's better. All right. Just so that we can close this matter, it is now quite clear that the Leader of the Government believes his answer to be satisfactory, and he is entitled to that opinion. He refuses to make any more inquiries—and that is clear. He is now, in effect, saying, "I am just not going to do it."

I said that if he were to do that, it would be acceptable.

Senator Roblin: My friend is raising a number of hypothetical points which have not arisen so far—

Senator Frith: I am asking you to get information. There is nothing hypothetical about that at all.

Senator Roblin: He is asking me to get information with respect to a hypothetical event, an event which I do not believe will happen, based on the information that I have. No one in a parliamentary assembly operates on a principle like that.

The principle that my honourable friend really operates on is that of having the last word. Well, he is welcome to it.

Senator Frith: Fine; I will take it. Thank you for the offer. Let me make it clear that it is not a hypothetical question. I am not asking a hypothetical question. I am asking the Leader of the Government to give us more information on a part of his answer. His answer was, "We have examined the President's statement, and I, the Leader of the Government, am satisfied that there will be no extraterritorial application to this policy." Then the question, which is not hypothetical, was—

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: We heard it.

Senator Frith: Perhaps you did; apparently Senator Roblin did not.

The question then is—

Senator Flynn: Try to explain to yourself what you are trying to say. I'll bet you won't be able to.

Senator Frith: The question that was asked was put this way: Since the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that he has looked at the President's order and he is satisfied that there will be no extraterritorial application—and the question, which was not hypothetical, was: Will he tell us whether there was any reference, one way or another, in that document? That is not a hypothetical question.

Senator Flynn: Round and round—

Senator Frith: You are giving me the last word and I will take the last word. That was not a hypothetical question. The leader was saying that he refuses to get that additional information.

All right; he is entitled to that refusal. But do not try to con us with talk about its being hypothetical—it is not. It is just further information we are requesting that he is refusing to provide.

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that I should really respond to that because I have answered the same question three times, but I am going to do my honourable friend a great big favour, just to show him that my heart is in the right place. I am going to send him a copy of the President's statement and he can read it himself.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! That is the answer.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question.

Having observed some events from the Press Gallery quite a few years ago, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has recommended that the Department of External Affairs produce the file—the memoranda, etc.—exchanged between Washington and Ottawa at the time of Mr. Diefenbaker's decision not to follow the American lead with respect to the interruption of trade with Cuba. Similarly, with respect to an incident where extraterritoriality was more at issue—an incident concerning the sale of grain-drying equipment to Red China—I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate would recommend that that file, as well, be made available to the Department of External Affairs duty officers who might be drafting the memos for cabinet these days.

Senator Roblin: I do not think it is necessary for me to do that. I think that the ladies and gentlemen responsible for furnishing the documentation in respect of these matters are well acquainted with the documents referred to by my honourable friend. It is certainly not a question that I think should be posed to me in Question Period.

Should my honourable friend wish to read those documents, he can table an order for return and we will see what is available. Apart from that, I have no comment.

Senator LeBlanc: I should like to make a suggestion. It has been my experience, reading the memoranda that come to cabinet, that there is quite rarely an historical reference going back a good number of years, especially in the spirit of non-partisanship in which external relations should be governed. I thought that the example of Mr. Diefenbaker would be extremely useful reading to the members of the present cabinet.

Senator Frith: I think I would find it boring.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is right and I thank him for his suggestion. I am sure that those in the department are not ignorant of Mr. Diefenbaker's position.

TRANSPORT

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question concerning the new regulations on the transportation of dangerous goods across Canada which, as you know, will come into effect on July 1.

The subject is of great concern to Canadians because of recent incidents that have occurred. This week, the President of the Canadian Trucking Association said quite flatly that those he represents will be unable to comply with these regulations by the July 1 date, in terms of training the people who, in the course of their daily work, have to comply with the regulations. Indeed, he suggested three rather distressing options. The first is that the training could be "fudged," which was his word, not mine. The second is that operators might operate illegally. The third one is that they might refuse to transport things classified as dangerous goods altogether.

My question is: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate to us how the Minister of Transport and the government might assist in trying to solve this dilemma over the deadline without at the same time sacrificing the urgency of bringing these regulations into effect, which is an urgency which we are all very conscious of?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think my honourable friend would expect me to accept any responsibility for the statement made by the gentleman she quoted. That happens to be his opinion and it certainly may not be the only opinion on the subject. The government's position is that the regulations are to come into force on July 1 and we are going to do our best to see that they come into effect on that date and are adequately respected by those in the industry. We have every confidence that, despite the statement read, there is a reasonable prospect that that will, indeed, take place.

Senator Fairbairn: I have a supplementary question. Could the Leader of the Government indicate whether any consideration has been given to the question of assistance to make that happen by July 1? Is there any such prospect in terms of that particular organization and also the Canadian Manufacturers' Association who had similar comments?

Senator Roblin: I am not aware of any proposal of that sort, but I do not rule it out. I think that if experience proves some further measures are necessary, they will certainly have to be considered, but I think that we will have to wait to see what happens.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I want to assure him that I am not going to engage in partisan disputations.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: Earlier this year I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister, a copy of which I made available to the honourable gentleman, asking the Prime Minister if he would consider appointing parliamentary secretaries in the Senate so that honourable senators could get answers on a variety of subjects without expecting that the Leader of the Government in the Senate be informed on every possible issue likely to come before this chamber.

Senator Haidasz: They have only 25 senators but they have 45 cabinet ministers.

Senator Bosa: The Prime Minister replied that he had referred that letter to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am wondering whether the government leader has had an opportunity to review the contents of that letter and whether he has replied to the Prime Minister.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend really knows how to hurt a guy, doesn't he? I regret that my performance in answering questions does not meet my honourable friend's high standards. I attempt to do my best with respect to answering questions.

Senator Doody: It is more than adequate.

Senator Frith: Watch it!

Senator Roblin: However, the question that I think he really ought to examine is whether the system that we have in the Senate of asking these questions is appropriate. I recall in the two previous Parliaments—the Parliament presided over by Mr. Clark and the last Parliament presided over by Mr. Trudeau—there were in the government ranks three and sometimes four cabinet ministers in the Senate. They were in the Senate because the party in question, both the Conservatives and the Liberals, lacked satisfactory regional representation in the House of Commons. In order to meet that defect, there were ministers appointed in the Senate, which has certainly not been the custom in the general way of speaking since the very early days of Confederation when we last had a Prime Minister in the Senate.

We had a situation in the last four or five years which was abnormal, I suggest, with three or four ministers in the Senate who had portfolio responsibilities. It follows that the only way in which they could be examined on their portfolios within Parliament was by being questioned in the Senate. Questions could not be posed to them in the House of Commons because they were not there. I think it was a natural development that during those two administrations—that of Mr. Clark and of Mr. Trudeau—with the portfolio-holding ministers here in this house a very brisk Question Period developed in order to examine them on the conduct of their departments. I have no fault to find with that because it is a logical and reasonable development.

Now that we have a different situation where the government does have adequate regional representation across the country in all respects, it is no longer necessary to appoint members of the Senate as cabinet ministers in order to have some kind of regional representation in the cabinet. Consequently, there is only one minister.

I suggest that perhaps we should give some consideration to the advisability of considering the nature of our Question Period here. I do not object to it because I have a lot of fun during Question Period.

Senator Frith: Good!

Senator Roblin: It is great exercise for the wits, so to speak. The point is that when asking questions, the rule that lawyers follow—and I am not a lawyer—is that you seek the best evidence. If you seek the best evidence about portfolio ministers' activities, you do not ask me the questions. You put the questions in the House of Commons to the minister who holds the portfolio.

I do not object to the fact that the Senate seems to have carried on with the idea of a vigorous Question Period covering the whole range of government activity simply because we no longer have the pleasure of having in our midst three or four senators in the cabinet with portfolio responsibilities. I do not object to that at all, but I think it is reasonable to consider whether our Question Period is as productive as it could be. I have to confess that when Senator Frith and I get engaged in an altercation like we did today, I do not think that that is really the most productive method by which questions could be asked.

Senator Frith: It is a search for the truth.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps the answers are not any more productive than the questions. I do not attach any particular odium to him because he is doing what comes naturally and I am doing what comes naturally, so there you are. I simply say that the whole idea of Question Period in the Senate is one that is, to say the least, debatable—let's put it that way. I think the view of the government is that under those circumstances, whatever burden it may place on the Leader of the Government in the Senate, he likes to roll with the punches—and I get a few from time to time—and we do the best we can. It would not be in accordance with our view of the correct operation of Parliament that there should be a proliferation of parliamentary secretaries outside the House of Commons.

That is a debatable proposition and my honourable friend has made an interesting proposal, but I do not really think it is going to fly at the present time. I do not think that one should rule out change—there is nothing wrong with change—because an adequate case could be made for it, but at the present time I have to say that the prospects of accepting the suggestion are somewhat less than bright.

Senator Bosa: I have a supplementary question. The honourable gentleman has stated that the Senate played a vital role at a time when the government did not have representation from certain parts of the country and, therefore, it used representatives of the Senate to fill that need. That was on the side of the government, and this is the point that the honourable gentleman has made. Now the situation is reversed and Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place do not have adequate representation, particularly in two provinces out west. Therefore, that function could be filled by the opposition in the Senate if there were some parliamentary secretaries here to answer questions that relate to those regions.

Senator Roblin: I think that there are numerous ways of getting information in the Senate. One is to ask me a question. Some people say that you do not get much information that way, but I do the best I can within my limits. There are also the Senate committees which are an ideal place for seeking information on all aspects of government policy. I recommend them to my friend.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I can accept the government leader's response respecting parliamentary secretaries because that is up to the government to decide, but there is more to his reply than that. It seemed to me that he wanted to change the function of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He went on to explain that when there were ministers here who had specific portfolios, it was a right and proper thing to address questions to them, but that that changes significantly when there are not; in other words, there is only one minister—the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I know that the present leader has advocated or argued from time to time that it was the responsibility of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to receive and attempt to answer all questions regarding government policy. If he did not have the information, he was obliged to take notice of the question and to seek that information. Surely the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not suggesting that we change that now; that somehow members of the opposition or, for that matter, any member on either the opposition or the government side is to be denied the right and, in many cases, the obligation to the region from whence he comes to ask questions of the government. There is only one place where honourable senators can ask questions of him, and that is in this chamber. Therefore it is a little disturbing when the honourable leader takes the position, as has been pointed out, that he refuses to make the inquiry for whatever reason. He has done that a number of times, and I certainly would like to ask him if he does not intend to continue to perform the traditional role of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, one which he advocated so vigorously when he sat on this side as the deputy leader.

Senator Roblin: I am not complaining in any way about Question Period, honourable senators. As far as I personally am concerned, I will continue to do my best to answer any questions that members of this chamber put to me.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if you can provide us with the name of your predecessor who was in the same position as you are today? That is to say, the government leader in the Senate and the only member of the Senate in the cabinet. Further, I would like to ask whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate has done any research as to what the conduct of the chamber was at that time with respect to the obtaining of useful information?

Senator Roblin: I am not quite sure that I get the full thrust of that question.

Senator Frith: I can explain it to you. I know what he is saying.

Senator Roblin: I would simply be inclined to say that the records of the Senate will disclose who were cabinet ministers in any administration, and those records are available to my honourable friend.

As to the efficacy of Question Period at that time, it all depended on to whom you were addressing the question.

WORLD WAR II

40TH ANNIVERSARY OF SURRENDER OF GERMAN FORCES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This coming Saturday, May 4, will be the fortieth anniversary of the surrender of German forces in northwestern Europe to British, Canadian and Polish forces. Would the honourable leader inform this chamber what celebrations the federal government has organized in Canada, or agreed to participate in officially in other countries, to commemorate this historic event?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice, honourable senators.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST NICARAGUA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I have no complaints about the efforts of the Leader of the Opposition during Question Period—

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the "Opposition"?

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government—and even less, the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: The minority leader.

Senator MacEachen: I know in some cases he is unable to provide answers, and we understand that. In other cases, he can provide answers, and I think that in those cases he should give us the full information he has.

Honourable senators, I would like to return to the question of Nicaragua and see if I can probe another aspect of Canadian policy. The United States has imposed an embargo against Nicaragua, and we are told that that subject will be raised at the Bonn Summit. Even though the United States did not see fit to advise its partners before it took this action, it is now prepared, presumably, to discuss it or to hear views on it at the Summit. I would like to know whether the Government of Canada will say to the United States: "We think that is a bad policy; we think it is bad to isolate Nicaragua in this particular situation."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed Canada's policy position with respect to Nicaragua after this recent embargo statement was made, and I think I am interpreting him correctly in saying that he said that, in his opinion, the proper way in which to approach the solution to that problem is through the Contadora process, and that is the policy that the Government of Canada intends to pursue.

Senator MacEachen: I take it, therefore, that the Government of Canada would deplore the action of the United States in imposing the embargo and would consider it not to be a constructive way to approach the solution to problems in Central America.

I am serious about this question, because surely we have learned what happens when a country is isolated, as happened in the case of Cuba. At a certain point, the United States took a particular attitude and the result is known to everybody. It seems to me that in this case history is repeating itself and we are likely to see the same consequences, and I wonder whether the Government of Canada will make that point to the United States at the Summit. Or will we just say nothing?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is right, if I am interpreting him correctly, in saying that the Contadora process is the best way to approach this problem. In other words, getting a regional agreement to reduce armaments, to withdraw foreign troops and to abandon economic sanctions of any sort. That is the Contadora process in a nutshell and Canada is, certainly in an advisory capacity with respect to Contadora, trying to advance that process, and up until recently there was some indication that perhaps there was a closer meeting of minds than ever before. What will happen under present circumstances, I really cannot say.

I think the position of the Government of Canada is clear. That is that in its opinion, the Contadora process is the way to go and, by inference, the American way is not. My friend is saying to me "What are you saying about it at Bonn?" I will inquire of the minister with respect to that and report to my honourable friend later.

THE SENATE

PAUL BOURASSA—TRIBUTE ON COMPLETION OF TERM AS PAGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Orders of the Day are called, I have been advised that today is the last working day for our senior Senate page, Paul Bourassa. Mr. Bourassa is senior not only in the supervisory sense but he is also the most experienced of our pages. I thought the Senate might want to note that he has been with us a long time. We wish him well in his career, as we do all of that distinguished alumni of Senate pages.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am pleased to join in this expression of good wishes because I do not know where I have encountered a more agreeable group than the young men and women who act as pages in this chamber. We are well served in all respects in this chamber, but I think our pages certainly set an example of courtesy, good manners and cheerfulness of disposition which many of us would be well employed to observe and to follow.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1985

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-18, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, to amend an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to amend the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act, the Parole Act and the Weights and Measures Act, to repeal certain other Acts and to make other consequential amendments".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in speaking to Bill C-18, I will cover four areas. First of all, I want to tell honourable senators about the legislative context of the bill. Secondly, I want to discuss those elements in the Criminal Code amendment that have been left out, or, at any rate, are not included, although there is good reason in some cases, perhaps, for them not to be dealt with here. Then I would like to say a word or two about what is included; that is, what might be of interest to honourable senators beyond what Senator Asselin has said. Finally, I want to speak about some amendments that were offered in the other place and which will, no doubt, play a role in our consideration—perhaps not at second reading but they might very well play a role at the committee stage and also at third reading stage.

Honourable senators, to understand the context of this bill, it is, very simply, a part of a much larger bill that has been the subject of study and also the subject of legislative, legal and, to some extent, judicial activity for many years.

The original bill presented by the former government attempted a major overhaul of the Criminal Code and the criminal law of Canada. In fact, I say "and the criminal law", because, as honourable senators realize, all criminal law offences are not in the Criminal Code. The current bill amends other statutes besides the Criminal Code of Canada. So, that is the context.

Honourable senators who had an interest in the previous bill will see that some of the provisions included in that bill—which I think was originally Bill C-19—and which dealt with subjects that were of great interest to those concerned with criminal law and those concerned with other social problems, are not included in this bill. Some of those provisions related to a growing interest in the rights of victims from the social aspect and from the aspect of the administration of justice. That subject was dealt with in the previous bill, but is not dealt with in this bill. I understand that the government has taken the position that it intends to pursue an interest in that dimension to the problem and will bring forward legislation in that regard.

Prostitution is not included in this bill, although at one time it had been intended that that subject be included. There is an explanation for that policy because we now have the Fraser report and a promise that there will be legislation on that subject. The same policy applies to pornography, which is not a subject of this bill, but is, apparently, of continued interest to the government.

There is an aspect that seems narrow, and there is a group that is interested in an aspect that relates to the contempt of court provisions. Why I say the subject is narrow, while not being of narrow interest, or of narrow social importance, is that it deals with the subject of battered wives. A great deal of the pressure for different provisions relating to the contempt of court element came from those interested in that serious social problem. The reason it has any relevance to contempt of court is that occasionally—certainly too often for those interested in this subject—battered wives themselves are subject to contempt of court proceedings when they decide not to give evidence against the accused husband. Some of those wives have, in fact, been prosecuted and convicted under the present contempt of court provisions. That is the context for the contempt of court provisions, and I understand that that subject is still under investigation, and perhaps Senator Nurgitz will assure us that that is so.

There is also the large subject of sentencing reform, a very important part of the criminal process, that received a great deal of attention from the previous government, and I believe was a part of the previous bill, but I am not certain of that. Again, the Minister of Justice has said that there is a study under way on that subject and he has promised that legislation will come forward.

The other two subjects that have been featured—and honourable senators and others interested in criminal law reform who have read about the interest of those subjects over the years and would want to know whether they are included in this bill or not—relate to mandatory supervision, which is not a new subject to the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The last element is the question of doing something about seizing profits from crime. I am not sure that that provision was contained in the previous bill, although I believe it was something that played a leading role in the consideration of the previous bill. Those are the subjects that the bill does not deal with.

The bill's star provision, so to speak, is that dealing with impaired driving, and those provisions dealing with the control of vehicles. In this bill, that provision is not limited to motor vehicles, but includes aircraft and vessels. That is the main feature and Senator Asselin dealt with that subject very well and produced an interesting chart, which was appended to the proceedings of April 30. That chart explains to honourable senators some of the provisions of the bill. Of course, at this stage we are only debating the principle of the bill. I suppose it is quite clear by now that we on this side are very much in favour of the principle of the bill. I have only referred to some of its stipulations to give honourable senators a feeling for the scope, nature and variety of subjects that are dealt with in the bill.

I believe we can say that the leading role in this bill is played by the type of legislation I have just referred to. However, there are three other supporting roles. They can be classified as that because they are new and because they have received a great deal of attention, and those relate to computer crime, the new concept of tele-warrants and the question of extraterritoriality. That latter provision relates to the trying in Canada of persons in Canada for offences committed outside of Canada. All four of those subjects were dealt with in the presentation made by Senator Asselin.

While on the subject of what is included and what is not included in the bill, I should inform honourable senators that there is good reason for some confusion about some of the provisions, because the previous bill was a much larger bill, and had attracted a great deal of attention, while the bill before us is a smaller bill. Therefore, as I have tried to point out, there are some rather important elements of the previous bill that are not contained in this bill. Because of developments that took place in the other place at the report stage and during the consideration in committee, certain provisions which had originally been included in the present bill have now been dropped. Some of those subjects were referred to by Senator Asselin. As I understand it, Senator Nurgitz will close second reading debate on this subject later today, and he and I have had discussions to clear up the small area of confusion, if one can call it confusion, resulting from the absence of certain provisions. Senator Nurgitz and I have agreed on certain points that he will put on the record so that the record is clear on all phases, namely, the items which had been left out of the bill, and the items which were dropped during the course of its legislative career in the House of Commons.

Having heard the principal features, honourable senators, I do want to say that I think this is an important and far-reaching bill. To get a sampling of some of the subjects that are dealt with quite beyond the subjects that I have just referred to, honourable senators might look at the marginal notes. I have made a summary of some of them. For example, just to give you an idea of how many more items are dealt with besides the ones I have referred to, and why it will be necessary for a Senate committee to consider this bill, although it did receive study by the committee of the other place, the bill deals with the following: Presumption of innocence, offences outside Canada, offences against internationally protected persons, the offence of counselling offences, false statements in passports, appearances by accused, forcible entry, explosive substance and firearms, perjury, public mischief, compounding offences, escape, foreign lotteries, dangerous operation of motor vehicles, vessels and aircraft—Senator Asselin referred to this subject—operation of same while impaired, uttering threats, kidnapping, hostage taking and abduction, computer crime and extortion. I would say that a good half to three quarters of an inch of the thickness of this bill deals with some very far-reaching changes in procedures and jurisdictions of judicial officers including provincial court judges. That is jurisdiction in the sense of when such judges would have absolute jurisdiction, or when there is an election to take the matter to another court. A large section of the bill deals with procedure in jury trials by indictment and otherwise and also with the provisions for the enforcement of criminal law, including the questions of warrants, detention and so on. I know that I am repeating myself when I say that the bill is one of importance, but I say that because I introduced my comments by saying that it was a smaller bill than the previous one. But it is by no means a small bill.

The fourth and final subject that I wish to deal with is the question of war crimes and crimes against humanity. As I have already indicated, one section of this bill deals with offences committed outside Canada by people inside Canada. We are not dealing here with the problem of extradition. The problem of extradition occurs when a person is apprehended outside Canada for committing offences in Canada and we attempt to have them extradited and brought back to Canada for trial. Of course, the reverse is someone apprehended in Canada for an offence committed outside the country, in which case the country where the offence took place tries to obtain extradition from Canada to that country.

What we are talking about in this bill is really an extension because it raises a question that has been the subject of articles and entire sections in law texts on the subject of conflict of laws and so on, and that is the real question of extraterritoriality, where we charge someone in Canada with an offence that they committed outside the country. In my view, the pressure for such legislation came about as a result of the outbreak of hostage-taking incidents and offences against persons who are protected internationally. Often the person who commits such offences outside, for example, Canada, may try to find refuge in Canada. In many cases the extradition proceedings are unsatisfactory as a means of dealing with these people.

It is natural when a bill with such provisions comes along that another subject of great international interest, not to mention interest in that subject, is triggered and stimulated by the intention to provide for such offences in the Criminal Code, and I refer here to the continued interest in the subject of war crimes and crimes against humanity. There has been a good deal of interest in this matter because of the anniversary of the horror of the holocaust. As there has been continued interest in seeing that those persons who were engaged in what someone has called a blight on human history are brought to justice, it is understandable that this would seem to be the perfect occasion for adding those offences to the Criminal Code because they fall into that category. I warn honourable senators that this aspect will surface for consideration at some point here. A motion was introduced in the other place to add to clause 5, which is the clause that we are concerned with, a clause providing as follows, and I am quoting from the Votes and Proceedings of the other place of April 24, 1985:

(1.9) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or any other Act, where a person has committed outside Canada, at any time before or after the coming into force of this subsection,—

Honourable senators will note the words “before or after” which would indicate that there is a retroactive aspect. The motion goes on:

—an act or omission constituting

(a) a war crime, namely a violation of the laws or usages of war committed during any war, whether the Second World War or any previous or subsequent war and whether Canada has or has not participated in that war;

or

(b) a crime against humanity committed in time of peace or war before, during or since the Second World War, namely murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation or other inhumane act committed against any civilian population or persecution on political, racial or religious grounds whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated, and where the act or omission if committed in Canada would have constituted an offence under Canadian law, that person shall be deemed to have committed that act or omission in Canada if

(c) the person who has committed the act or omission or a victim of the act or omission was, at the time of the act or omission,

(i) a Canadian, or

(ii) a person employed by Canada in a military or civilian capacity; or

(d) the person who has committed the act or omission is, after the act or omission has been committed, present in Canada.

I shall not go into detail on that motion. I merely wanted to put it on record. In effect it does as I have suggested; namely, it extends this concept of extraterritoriality, and to some extent makes it retroactive to this principle. I am sure that when this bill is referred to committee, those interested in such amendments to this legislation will make representations in the hope that the committee will report the bill with such amendments.

To complete the story about this aspect of the bill, those amendments were ruled out of order in the other place as falling outside the scope of the bill. In my opinion—and I do not say this in criticism of the ruling because the jurisdiction to make the ruling was clearly in the other place and I am not arguing about that at all—having looked at the debates and at the precedents, these amendments are in order in the sense that they do not fall outside the scope of the bill. The precedents indicate that where you have a general category of subjects you can add to the list of subjects without falling outside the scope of the bill. I merely flag this matter for honourable senators because I think the committee will be asked to consider such amendments, and questions may arise as to whether the amendments are in order. In my opinion, they are in order, but whether the committee will want to make such amendments or not will be a matter for the committee.

Those are the points I wanted to make. I have indicated that the bill is part of a larger one. I have listed some of the features of previous legislation and legislative intentions which are not in this bill. I have indicated its main features, its subsidiary features, and the breadth of its scope. I have indicated a possible amendment which may very well be made or which may at least attract the attention of the committee and may even form part of its report or be the subject of debate at third reading.

With those comments I suggest that the bill be given second reading and approval in principle and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, on behalf of my colleague, Senator Asselin, I urge that you give this bill second reading and that you refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. However, I should like to make a couple of comments regarding the matters raised by Senator Frith. I could deal with those points as well as clarify a couple of points raised by the sponsor of the bill.

• (1510)

I was pleased that Senator Frith referred to various aspects of the bill in terms of stars and supporting roles, because my colleague, Senator Murray, could not resist saying "There he goes, the singing senator from Perth." We all know that Senator Frith is a star of the Perth Opera Company.

Dealing first with some of the supporting players, namely, the question of pornography and prostitution, it is hoped that the committee, once it has dealt with some of the legislation currently before it, will commence a study of the Fraser report. Therefore more will be heard on that.

Concerning a couple of items raised by Senator Frith—namely, the contempt of court provisions, sentencing, and mandatory supervision—those are all matters which, from my reading of the proceedings of the House of Commons committee, are receiving further study from the government.

I will comment briefly on the last item raised by Senator Frith concerning the question of war crimes and whether there could be an appropriate amendment to Bill C-18. The Deschênes Commission, under the chairmanship of the distinguished Quebec jurist, Mr. Justice Deschênes, is currently undertaking a review of this subject. In any event, I can report that the steering committee of the Senate committee has met and has determined that we should at least hear some formal representations very soon.

[Senator Frith.]

I should now like to deal with a couple of other matters. Senator Asselin referred to the bill as being an improvement on the administration of justice, and I am sure we would all agree that modifications such as this always have an impact on the administration. However, one should not lose sight of the fact that a major portion of the bill deals with what has become a major problem in Canada. There probably is not a community that has not been badly hurt from the loss of lives due to impaired driving. I am sure that many of us have friends or relatives who have suffered as a result of such tragedies. In the course of my comments on the Throne Speech I said that I thought there was impatience on the part of Canadians who wanted that serious problem dealt with. I am pleased that we now have in Bill C-18 provisions to deal with it.

There were a couple of other matters on which I wanted to ensure there was some clarification. While the government is committed to broadening the concept of trafficking and certain drug offences, Senator Asselin might have left the impression that the bill contains such clarification. There was reference to further expansion of the trafficking provisions under the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. Because of questions raised, principally by the opposition in the other place, the committee decided to take a further look at it. However, Bill C-18, now before us, does not contain specific provisions with respect to that.

Senator Asselin referred also to concerns expressed in the committee in the other place—and I am sure they will be expressed in our own committee—dealing with air safety regulations, and the concern on the part of the public to make certain regulations more stringent. I understand that the government is committed to further study of that matter and it is hoped that we will soon have legislation dealing with that. But, again, the current bill does not contain those provisions.

There has been much said about a provision in a bill which, if I recall correctly, was called the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. That provision dealt with the seizure of vehicles. It was felt by many that it was an effective way of cutting down on certain aspects of trafficking. If one's vehicle was used by those caught in the drug trafficking business, notwithstanding that it was lent innocently to a friend or someone else, the vehicle was automatically impounded. Under the old provisions there was the loss of the vehicle. Unlike other instances similar to this where there is an onus on the Crown to prove that one knew something, that one had some guilty intent, under the old provisions the onus was on the owner of the vehicle to prove that he had no way of knowing, suspecting or believing that that could happen. In any event, all questions concerning the impounding of vehicles, particularly with respect to impaired driving matters, are being further considered by the government and we hope there will be a clearer definition on that a little later on.

Finally, in the original draft of Bill C-18 some consideration was given to providing some protection for medical doctors. As I look around the chamber, I see there are a couple of senators who might have an interest in this. There was a view expressed that medical doctors, provided they were not acting recklessly, would be protected under the bill, when engaged in the removal of a blood sample from a person who was unable to give consent. It was finally decided in the debate in the House of Commons committee that such protection would not be available, that the law would provide for it and that the bill would be silent with regard to protection. I should mention, therefore, that there is no criminal or civil protection for medical practitioners removing blood samples from persons who are unable to give consent.

Senator Murray: Would they be obliged to take the sample?

Senator Nurgitz: I might give this to Senator Murray to take home tonight for his bedtime reading. The law now provides that consent is not required, that a sample can be drawn from such a person.

Senator Murray: But is a practitioner obliged to take the sample?

An Hon. Senator: It is in the book.

Senator Frith: It may be that the Canadian Medical Association will wish to make some representations on that.

• (1520)

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, they may well want to do so, and I certainly invite them to appear before the committee.

With that, honourable senators, I ask for your support for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 7, 1985 at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-15
"AN ACT RESPECTING INVESTMENT CANADA"

THURSDAY, May 2, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-15, intituled: "An Act respecting investment in Canada", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of March 13, 1985, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

On March 20, 1985 the Committee heard from the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, accompanied by Mr. Paul Labbé, Commissioner; Ms. Ruth Hubbard, Deputy Commissioner; Mr. G. H. Dewhirst, Director General, Policy, Research and Communications Branch; and Mr. T. S. Barton, Senior Legal Advisor, all from the Foreign Investment Review Agency. On April 17, 1985 the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made representation at a public hearing before the Committee. On May 1, 1985, Mr. Clancy Delbarre, from the Scarborough Business Association, appeared in support of a brief from the City of Scarborough.

Written briefs were submitted to the Committee by the Aluminium Company of Canada Limited and The Canadian Advanced Technology Association.

The proposed Act will replace the Foreign Investment Review Act. It will create a new agency called Investment Canada to which it gives a legislative mandate to encourage and facilitate investment.

The new agency replaces the present Foreign Investment Review Agency.

Investment by non-Canadians in new businesses will be subject to notification, but in most cases is exempt from review. Direct acquisitions by non-Canadians of businesses in Canada with assets of $5 million or more, will be reviewed by the agency. Indirect acquisitions, resulting from the acquisition of parent companies outside the country, will be reviewed if the Canadian subsidiary so acquired has assets of $50 million or more.

Below these thresholds, the new agency will have authority to review acquisitions or investments to establish new businesses in areas that are "related to Canada's cultural heritage or national identity", if the Governor-in-Council considers a review to be in the public interest.

Clauses 15 and 35

Concern was expressed to the Committee that business activities intended to be covered by the phrase "Canada's cultural heritage or national identity" will be defined by Regulation. Some witnesses suggested that Parliament should attempt to define these activities in the Act. The Committee would not go so far, but agreed that Parliament should have some opportunity to consider these regulations.

The Committee considered recommending that the regulations should be subject to a negative resolution provision similar to that found in sections 6 and 7 of The Canada-Germany Tax Agreement Act, 1982, c. 156, Statutes of Canada 1980-81-82-83. Meanwhile the government had agreed, during consideration of the Bill by a House of Commons Committee, to amend sub-clause 35(3) to require that such regulations be referred to a Commons Committee. The Minister has also tabled a list of those culturally sensitive industries that he intends to specify in the regulations.

The Committee believes that this action, and the proposed amendment to sub-clause 35(3) should prove to be an adequate response to the concerns mentioned above.

Clause 14

Concern was also expressed to the Committee that the $5 million threshold in respect of direct acquisitions is too low. It was represented to the Committee that the threshold should be increased to $10 or $15 million.

Some support for these views was expressed by members of the Committee.

It was noted, however, that the government was being urged with at least equal vigor to reduce the threshold. While it was represented to the Committee that $5 million acquisitions are not significant in practical business terms, this perception is more valid in some regions of the country than in others. Finally, the Committee noted that the $5 million threshold would have exempted some 80 per cent of the direct acquisitions reviewed by FIRA in 1983. The Committee concluded that the $5 million is appropriate at least for the present.

Clause 26

Certain provisions of this clause were criticized in briefs to the Committee. Concern was also expressed by some Senators, and various remedies were suggested.

If less than a majority of shares in a company are owned by Canadians, and the company is not controlled through ownership of its voting interests, the company would be considered Canadian-controlled if two-thirds of its directors are Canadians.

It was pointed out that other legislation (Ontario Business Corporations Act and the Canadian Business Corporations Act) have as a criterion a majority Canadian board. It was represented to the Committee that this criterion should be sufficient for the purposes of Bill C-15.

It was also represented to the Committee that the provisions of Bill C-15 in this respect are more restrictive than those under the existing (FIRA) law. Under the existing law such a corporation passes the test if the number of non-Canadian directors does not exceed 20% of the total number of directors. Even if it does exceed 20%, but is less than 50%, the company can still "obtain" an opinion from the Minister that it is not a non-Canadian person, if it can be shown that certain non-Canadian directors do not act in concert.

Although some members of the Committee favoured an amendment which would define as Canadian a company a majority of whose directors were Canadian, this proposal was not acceptable to most members of the Committee. The Committee also noted that the government had responded to concerns expressed by various companies on this matter, by proposing amendments to clauses 26 and 45 which would have the effect of broadening the criteria to make the "special status" attainable by more corporations; and of conferring transitional "grandfather" rights on companies enjoying "Canadian" status by virtue of a minister's opinion under the FIRA Act.

The Committee has reviewed Bill C-15 in accordance with its terms of reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make on the Bill.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY,
Chairman.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

POLICIES AND PERSONALITY OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER TRUDEAU—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Based on the early reports of the Bonn Summit, is it now the policy of the Mulroney government to deliberately undermine and belittle the policies and personality of former Prime Minister Trudeau in front of the world press as a major plank in this government's foreign policy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if my honourable friend looks at Hansard of the other place he will find that the Prime Minister dealt with that question by pointing out his appreciation of the leadership given by the former Prime Minister in the field of foreign affairs and his intention to do what he could to carry on that good work.

Senator Grafstein: I have a supplementary question. Were the officials in the Prime Minister's Office or officials in the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs instructed to criticize the personality and policies of former Prime Minister Trudeau?

Senator Roblin: I have no means of knowing the answer to that question as it is certainly internal to the activities of the government with respect to what it says to those who are its advisers, but I should be very surprised if there were any concerted campaign to belittle the achievements of the former Prime Minister of this country.

Senator Grafstein: If instructions were not given to so criticize former Prime Minister Trudeau, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us that those officials who made those comments to members of the press will be reprimanded?

Senator Roblin: I find it exceedingly difficult to comply with that request. I do not know who the people are or what they said, and I have no knowledge whatsoever of the circumstances. I think it is wiser to check the assurances of the Prime Minister that he respects the achievements of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau in the field of foreign affairs.

Senator Grafstein: Turning to the Prime Minister, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate reprimand the Prime Minister for deliberately undermining the Secretary of State for External Affairs in front of the world press, thereby destroying Canada's credibility in international forums?

Senator Walker: Isn't it about time the new boy sat down and was quiet?

Senator Roblin: I do not think it incumbent upon me to direct the Prime Minister as to what he should do. He dealt with that matter himself in the other place yesterday and I think his reply is sufficient.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT

BONN, WEST GERMANY—WORLD DRUG TRADE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On the agenda at the Bonn Summit was an item related to the world drug trade and the attendant problems. Could the leader tell us what emerged with respect to that item on the agenda and what position the government took on that issue?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PASSPORTS—ISSUANCE AT HULL

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The other day I applied for a passport. Upon receiving it from the passport office I noted that it was a very nice, shiny passport issued by the Government of Canada, but in the little box where it says, "Issued at" it stated, "Hull." It did not state "Hull, Que." or Hull anything.

I am somewhat disturbed as I have great respect and a liking for Hull because I think it is a fine city. But in one's travels around the world, if, when filling out the form which asks for one's passport number and where it was issued, one simply writes "Hull," I expect one is going to run into comments or questions because there is more than one city of Hull. Apart from that, it is the first time I have heard of its being the issuing centre for passports applied for in Ottawa.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend wants me to explain the significance of this, but I am not well equipped to do so. I have noticed that same designation of Hull on my own passport. I suppose one could argue that there is only one Hull in Canada, but I am not even sure of that.

Senator Robichaud: There is Bobby from Winnipeg.

Senator Roblin: I have to admit that is the case.

I will make some inquiries as to whether I can provide some further comment on this matter. That is undoubtedly the place where the passport office is situated which issued the document. Perhaps, by international rules, it is necessary to say that the point of issue is at Hull. If I can throw any further light on this subject, I will do so.

Senator Lafond: As the only native and continuing resident of Hull in this chamber, I may say that I am delighted to see it on the international map!

ECONOMIC SUMMIT

BONN, WEST GERMANY—SECURING OF THIRD WINDOW—PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the Bonn Summit.

May I begin by asking him whether he can enlighten me as to what the Prime Minister meant yesterday when he said in the House of Commons that Canada was helpful in securing the "third window"? What is that?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to say that, as far as I understand the term "third window," it has to do with the rates of interest that are charged or levied against the sovereign debts of certain Third World countries that are presently not being accommodated in respect of any debt rescheduling or interest revalorization that is going on.

One can think of, for example, certain countries in the Caribbean, and one with which I am familiar, Jamaica, has received, as far as I am aware, no help in this respect so far. I think the Prime Minister's intention was to draw to the attention of the Summit the plight of those countries in the hope that he may start some consideration of the particular hardships they face in paying current interest rates.

Senator MacEachen: Has the Summit resulted in a new program for the developing countries? I just do not know what the "third window" is. I would like to know because the Prime Minister referred to it as an achievement for the developing world.

Is it future consideration? Is it a financial commitment? Is it a restructuring of the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank? Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether any of these are involved, or is this an entirely new concept?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will realize from his own experience that it is not always that concrete decisions are made at the Summit. Indeed, it is the opinion of some that that goal is not one that should be sought. It is much wiser to obtain a general exchange of views and, perhaps, personal contacts at the Summit that might otherwise not be available. That may constitute, indeed, some of the main values of such a meeting.

I do not believe that any concrete decisions were made on the subject of the so-called "Third World window" or on any other subjects which were, no doubt, discussed at this meeting, but I fully expect it will be the intention of the Government of Canada to pursue this initiative of trying to ameliorate the excess burden carried by some Third World countries in other fora. This has launched the idea, and I am certain that the government will take steps to pursue it where it can.

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the Summit agreed to consider at some future date the possibility of helping a certain category of developing countries with interest payments; that there is no program, but that it is a matter for consideration for the future? If he is, I am correct in concluding that this does not involve any current or potential financial commitment either for the seven Summit countries or for Canada itself. It involves consideration of the problem to be deferred to a future meeting.

Senator Roblin: I do not think I can make any announcement about what was decided at the Summit, apart from those items that were included in the press release. My honourable friend will understand, however, that at these meetings other matters are discussed with a view to further activity in that field at a later date, when it is advantageous to do so.

The idea under the present circumstance is to raise the issue. As I have said previously, I am sure the government will take advantage of further opportunities to develop this policy with those concerned.

Senator MacEachen: I take it from what the Leader of the Government has said that a matter was raised—namely, interest payments—and also how in the future a certain category of developing countries might be helped in respect of interest payments. If that is the case, fine. I thought, from reading the remarks of the Prime Minister, that there was something more concrete, because he said:

—I think we were helpful in securing the third window.

That led me to ask: What is the third window? And what, indeed, are the first and second windows? These terms are rather unusual, and I thought that perhaps the Leader of the Government could throw some light on it. The Prime Minister held it out as an important achievement. I do not think it is. If we follow the line taken by the Leader of the Government, the answer is it is the raising of a question which was then shelved to some future time.

Senator Roblin: I think it is recognition of the problem, and one knows that that is the way to start to deal with any important international question.

Senator MacEachen: But, surely, the problem has been recognized in many international fora. Some new solutions are now sought. Obviously, this is not a new one—or, at least, not yet. But I shall let that rest for the moment.

Would it be possible to receive the declarations coming out of the Summit? If we had those, we would have a better basis upon which to examine the actual results.

UNITED STATES EMBARGO ON NICARAGUA—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I am interested in another aspect of the Summit, namely, the repudiation, or the apparent repudiation, by the Prime Minister of his Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark had stated very strongly that Canada disagreed with the embargo imposed by the United States on trade with Nicaragua. I certainly thought that to be a forthright statement. The next day, when the Prime Minister was asked, he said: "Well, why should we expect the United States to talk to us about this? I am not surprised." In making those comments, he dismissed as unimportant or trivial the strong statement that had been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I am wondering whether the Prime Minister understands the damage he is doing, not only to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but also to Canada, when he takes that kind of approach—that is, not to treat seriously a policy statement made by his own minister.

The Prime Minister has said that all of these matters were discussed at the Quebec Summit. I should like to know today whether he, the Prime Minister of Canada, discussed a possible embargo with the President of the United States at the Quebec meeting. Was it raised, and did he give his views then to the President? I want to know that. If that happened, it is a bit of a help.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): First, I should like to deal with my honourable friend's question with respect to the "third window." I can tell him that it was raised for the first time at this conference, and that has to be a considerable advance over dealing with it in other fora. We shall have to see what initiative the Government of Canada is able to produce as our representatives work on this question over time.

With respect to the communiqué issued following the Summit, I should be glad to obtain a copy to provide to my honourable friend. Although it is in the public press already, I shall be glad to provide my honourable friend with a copy, if he so wishes.

With respect to whether or not the embargo against Nicaragua was raised at the Quebec Conference, I shall have to take the question as notice.

Senator MacEachen: Does the Leader of the Government attach any significance to the fact that the Prime Minister refused to deal with the question of Nicaragua at his press conference in Bonn and refused to mention it to President Reagan? While in Bonn, he carefully avoided saying anything either to the President or to the press about Canada's position on Nicaragua. Why would he refrain from doing it in a place where the Americans would hear the Prime Minister of Canada?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend must take into account the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with this subject in extenso with the U.S. Secretary of State. The Canadian government's position is well known to the officials of the American government.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government tell me why the Prime Minister did not raise it with the President? They were together a good deal in Bonn and it would have been a natural point to raise.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that the Prime Minister said that he had previously discussed the issue of Nicaragua with the President of the United States, and my honourable friend will have to be satisfied with that statement by the Prime Minister.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to know whether they discussed the specific question of the embargo against Nicaragua at Quebec. The Leader of the Government cannot tell me. Therefore, I am not satisfied either with his answer or the attitude of the Prime Minister, because the Prime Minister has clearly refrained from stating Canadian policy in the presence of the President. Obviously, he is reluctant to stand up in the presence of the President and state Canadian policy. He will do it when he comes back to Canada, in the House of Commons, but not before the President. That is clearly understood, because the President of France described, I believe with some irony, the Prime Minister's mediation efforts. He said, "Yes, the Prime Minister of Canada tried, but we knew where his sympathies were. They were with the Americans from the beginning." Does the leader think that is a good position for Canada to be in, to be in the pocket of the United States and to be regarded as such by other countries, including France?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has quite a knack of misinterpreting facts and putting his own gloss on them to suit his own view of events. The fact he is frequently mistaken does not seem to deter him from the practice. Let me tell him that when the President of France was talking about the intervention of the Prime Minister of Canada, he was talking about the intervention of the Canadian Prime Minister in the field of economic affairs, in which the Prime Minister took the view, espoused by the President of the United States, that it would be a good thing to get to work once again on free trade and on the question of trade barriers. The Prime Minister of Canada was a member of the group of delegates at that conference that agreed with that policy—all except the President of France. When the French President was referring to the efforts of the Canadian Prime Minister to get a common understanding on the matter, that is what he was talking about. He was not talking about Nicaragua, and the Canadian government left no doubt at that conference as to its position. At that conference it was clearly stated what the Canadian government's position was, and to suggest otherwise is, of course, completely untrue.

Senator MacEachen: It is not untrue to suggest that the Prime Minister of Canada was reluctant to face the President of the United States and to criticize his Nicaraguan policy. That is quite true; he did not do it. I have never at any point said that the President of France was commenting on Canada's attitude or Nicaraguan policy. It was the policy that Canada had taken with respect to the multilateral trade negotiations. The President of France found Canada's efforts lacking in plausibility, because he understood that it was not a true mediation, that Canada was carrying the can for the United States. That is what he meant; and I am asking the Leader of the Government whether he thinks that is a good position for the Canadian Prime Minister to be in, in the view of a major power with whom we want close and constructive relations, namely, France. That is what I am asking him.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am glad that my honourable friend has taken advantage of the opportunity to correct himself; and it is well that he should have done so, otherwise he would have left a completely erroneous impression with the members of this house. He has correctly stated that the Canadian government sees eye to eye with the United States government with respect to the economic matter that was discussed at the summit. But the Leader of the Opposition should note that the Canadian Prime Minister took the occasion offered him to say that he endeavoured to do his best to recognize the views and the interests of the two nations from which this country has been derived, namely, the United Kingdom and France. His effort in that connection was not to be a spokesman for the United States. They do not need anyone to speak for them. They speak louder for themselves than anyone else can. However, the Prime Minister made the effort to find some middle way between what the United States was asking and the position adopted by the French government as outlined by the President of France.

● (1420)

To criticize the Prime Minister of Canada for trying to find some middle way between those two great powers as they were dealing with economic questions seems to me, to say the least of it, to be a little ungracious.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not propose to attempt to correct the Leader of the Government as he has attempted to correct me. We shall let the reader judge the exchange.

The substance of the question is not the difficulty here. The difficulty here is that before the Prime Minister went to Bonn he had damaged his plausibility and credibility as a true mediator because he aligned himself so closely with the United States. That is what the President of France had in mind.

Senator Walker: How do you know?

Senator Frith: Because he said so.

Senator MacEachen: I agree with the position the Prime Minister took at Bonn on multilateral trade negotiations—it is a sound position—but why did the French authorities take it upon themselves to point out that, while the Prime Minister of Canada made an effort, they knew where his sympathies were because he was in the pocket of the President of the United States? Is it a good thing for Canada to be regarded by France as being in the pocket of the United States and, therefore, not capable of acting as a true mediator in a situation of this kind?

Senator Roblin: I am interested that my honourable friend takes it upon himself to interpret the feelings of the President of France in this matter.

Senator Frith: That is what he said.

Senator Roblin: I feel that he is by no means entitled to do so, regardless of what he has read in the newspapers. It would have been just as logical for the President of France to complain about the attitude of the other five countries present at the conference who also supported the United States in its effort to secure free trade. It seems to me to be quite unreasonable for my honourable friend to complain when the Prime Minister of this country, along with five other nations present, wanted to do something constructive about international trade, something which is very important and in our best interests, and over the fact that he went to the President of France in an attempt to secure some agreement on the matter. If the President of France does not agree, it is quite natural that he would find a good reason for not agreeing. If he thinks that it supports his cause to say that the Prime Minister of Canada is in the pocket of the United States, there is nothing I can do about that and he is welcome to do so.

The real question one should ask is: Is the Prime Minister representing adequately the interests of this nation in the discussions at Bonn with respect to a widening of free trade? I say that he has represented the interests of this nation; that it is in the interests of Canada to be closely aligned with the United States in connection with world free trade; and that it is in the interests of Canada to try to mediate or to explain to the people of France why that should be a good thing for all the people represented at that conference. The fact that there was only one holdout is additional evidence, from my point of view, that the Prime Minister of Canada was well advised in taking a stand, and he should not be subjected to this penny ante criticism that he is getting here today.

Senator MacEachen: I gather that the old truism applies—the weaker the case, the stronger the rhetoric. That applies very vividly in this particular case. The Prime Minister set himself out. As he said himself—and it was not said by his Liberal critics, as the Leader of the Government attempts to imply—his ambition was to prevent France from becoming isolated.

Senator LeBlanc: Some conciliator!

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has told us today that France was totally isolated at the Bonn Summit. The Prime Minister failed miserably in attaining his objective because he was not regarded by the President of France as an authentic mediator. That is the point, and the Leader of the Government has not understood it yet. I hope it will get across to the Leader of the Government and to the Prime Minister that his bona fides at international meetings will not be helped if before every meeting he indicates to the world that he is blindly following the United States and that when he meets with the President of the United States he will not tell him Canadian policy. That is what happened at Bonn, in addition to its probably being the worst Summit that was ever held, because not only is the Summit split on international economic policy, it is split on international security policy. That is something that has never happened before and I wonder what Canada did to stop that.

Senator Roblin: I am discovering that I have no monopoly on rhetoric. My honourable friend is able to hold his own in that respect, and when his argument is a little weak he does not mind reinforcing it with arguments that perhaps do not exactly hold water.

I say to my honourable friend that, of course, he is quite wrong in saying that these summit meetings always produce agreement. I do not want to be deflected into that channel by my honourable friend's saying that this is the worst Summit yet because the parties to it did not approve an agreement. In the past, there have been substantial differences between France and other members of the group, particularly in the days of General de Gaulle. However, that is not relevant to the question.

The point is that the Prime Minister of Canada was the only one who attempted, in this particular instance, to find a meeting ground between the Government of France and the Government of the United States. I think the Prime Minister of Canada would have been able to secure that meeting ground if there had been a little more flexibility on the part of the French government, and God knows we need it.

With respect to the issue that the French government balked at, what was that issue, pray? It was the price of agricultural products, and if there is one country in the world that is suffering today because of the EEC policy on agricultural products, it is this country. We have a problem today with the imports of meat from the European Economic Community. Also, the EEC is now the third or fourth largest exporter of wheat in the world, a circumstance which has never existed before. It was on that issue of agricultural policy that the French government found itself unable to move in the direction of accommodating the others, and for the Prime Minister of Canada to try to mediate that difference in outlook is, I think, something that was entirely worthy.

As far as I know, the Government of France did not complain about other matters, such as the lowering of tariffs or the freeing up of trade. It was on the question of agricultural prices that France found itself unable to move, and it is entirely natural, as I see things, that the Prime Minister of Canada should try to find some way of softening the attitude of the Government of France in respect of these agricultural products. It was not only in the interests of the generality, it was certainly in our most direct and immediate interest that some movement should be made possible in these respects. Therefore, I feel that the Prime Minister has nothing for which he must apologize to my honourable friend.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government not reconsider the statement he has just made to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada was the only leader at the Summit who attempted to mediate the differences? Perhaps he could reconsider that statement, because it is quite inaccurate.

Senator Roblin: I will say that, as far as I am aware, the person who was engaged in this mediation effort between the two parties on the spot was the Prime Minister of Canada. That is by no means to say that other nations did not have substantial arguments which, from time to time, they presented in an effort to bridge the gap. I do not think the Prime Minister of Canada has any monopoly on that. I would not claim that. However, I do say that his effort was commendable.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government said that the Prime Minister of Canada was the only leader at the Summit who attempted to mediate these differences. That is false; the Leader of the Government should admit it, and not belittle Chancellor Kohl and others who played a more prominent role than the Prime Minister of Canada.

Senator Roblin: I cannot judge the question of who played the most prominent role. That is not within my sphere of knowledge, nor is it indeed within my sphere of interest. All I can say is that I think the Prime Minister of this country represented us well and faithfully at that conference.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES AGAINST NICARAGUA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question with respect to Nicaragua. Last week the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertook to obtain for us a copy of the declaration that was made by the President of the United States on the subject of the economic embargo against Nicaragua, and perhaps that will be forthcoming today under the heading of "Delayed Answers."

● (1430)

There were reports on the weekend that the Government of Canada intended to be sure that U.S. subsidiaries did not use their position in Canada to get around the embargo. Those reports may have been inaccurate, so I am asking the Leader of the Government to tell us whether or not it is the policy of this government to monitor the U.S. subsidiaries with a view to ensuring that they do not get around the embargo.

The exchange that the Leader of the Government and I had last week—and I thought we were coming to some agreement—was to the effect that there would be no attempt by the United States to exert extraterritorial pressure in order to maintain the embargo. That seemed to be quite contrary to the understanding my honourable friend had about Canadian government policy, which was that there would be no element of extraterritoriality. I had assumed that the government would not be playing any role in trying to suppress or encourage extraterritorial efforts.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend's assumption was correct; the Government of Canada is of the view, confirmed by the explicit statements of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, that there is no extraterritorial aspect to this legislation in the United States. That position was also supported by a statement made by the United States Ambassador to Canada. What more one can get, I do not know. It seems to me that the position is clear.

Senator Frith: From their point of view; I want to know our point of view.

Senator Roblin: It is clear from our point of view, too. There is one point, however, that should be recognized, and that relates to the question of re-exports. An agreement has been in effect since 1941 that prohibitions on the export of certain goods should not be circumvented by sales through Canada or through the United States in respect of material supplied by the United States and incorporated into some piece of military equipment. There is what is called the Export Control List, and my honourable friend probably knows as much about that list as I do. I suspect that that is how the United States might supervise goods being shipped to Nicaragua. I suppose that supervision might be extended by way of that item. That states that strategic goods supplied by the United States should not thereafter be sent to another country thereby circumventing their own rules.

That is an understanding that has been in force for many, many years, one which presents no difficulties, and one which we all know about. That is the way in which the United States may be watching what we do here.

As for anything other than that, we have their explicit undertaking that extraterritoriality does not apply.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we do not understand each other, although it seems as though we do with respect to two-thirds of the issue. The first part of the issue is what the United States has said about enforcing extraterritoriality. My friend undertook to give us a copy of the statements, and he has referred to three explicit statements made by United States officials that they do not intend to apply the concept of extraterritoriality.

The second part of the issue is the convention or agreement which, of course, involves extraterritoriality. As my friend has said, it is an agreement as to extraterritoriality.

The third part of the issue, the part I was raising, is the suggestion that our government—not the U.S. government—either on the basis of the declaration or on the basis of convention, is going to be assisting the United States government by monitoring the activity of subsidiaries. That is the one I wanted to give my friend an opportunity to say yes or no to, and tell us whether those reports were correct or not, because they may have been statements being made by inference from the convention, rather than being a separate policy.

Senator Roblin: The answer is no.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the point raised by the Leader of the Government with respect to re-exports, is it a fact that the Canadian government will acknowledge the right of the United States to direct the destination of a product even though it is landed in Canada and has become part of the Canadian industrial process? Would the Canadian government acknowledge the right of the United States to govern or to say something about where that product originating in the United States should be destined? Is that what the Leader of the Government has said?

Senator Roblin: If anyone ought to know, it is my honourable friend, because this policy has been in effect in Canada since 1941. It was in effect in Canada all during the time he and his friends were members of the government. It states that Canada and the United States co-operate with respect to items on the Export Control List. There is a limited series of items that have to do with the products that might be of military advantage, as the idea was originally conceived, to the Eastern bloc. Items on that Export Control List, which, if further processed and manufactured in Canada, though obtained from the United States, will not be sent to Nicaragua under the provisions of the agreement.

So, I am talking now about an export control agreement, Item 9001 of the Export Control List, and my honourable friend is probably familiar with that. That is the item that seems to govern this particular aspect.

This agreement, which has been in force between our two countries for over 40 years, will not allow one or the other to be used as a trans-shipment point for the re-export of goods originally imported from the other country.

Senator MacEachen: I believe the Leader of the Government did not follow my question, which had quite a different emphasis from his reference to the agreement to co-operate. I think it is one thing for Canada to decide these matters and another to permit the United States, in specific instances, to instruct us. That is really the question I had in mind: Do we acknowledge the right of the United States, even for re-exports, to tell Canada what to do? That is one thing and is quite different from relying on the agreement. We all know the Hyde Park Agreement. If that is the case, it certainly does open up a rather large area in which the United States could influence Canadian foreign policy.

Senator Roblin: Our policy will be governed by the terms of the agreement, and we shall carry that out in just the same way as my honourable friend carried it out when he was responsible for these affairs.

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF TICKET AGENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

To get back to our domestic problems, it seems that airline deregulation is causing serious problems for air carriers.

About 3,000 Air Canada ticket agents have been on strike for nearly two weeks.

The dispute concerns management's decision to raise the proportion of part-time employees. This is expected to have an impact on the job security of present employees.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask the Minister of Transport whether we can expect an early settlement and whether he can give us the assurance that in settling the strike, Air Canada will protect the job security of its present employees?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I can give no assurance at the present time that the Government of Canada thinks it advisable to interfere in this industrial dispute. It is an unfortunate industrial dispute and we all regret it very much, but we regret even more that the parties so far have not yet returned to the bargaining table.

The Air Canada officials have written to those concerned offering to meet again in the spirit of flexibility and accommodation in the hopes of finding some solution to the problem. I am not aware whether or not they have, as yet, had a response from the other side or whether they think that that initiative on the part of Air Canada is worth further investigation. I hope it is and that the strike comes to a speedy conclusion.

[Senator Roblin.]

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEETING OF EXPERTS—SUGGESTED PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

● (1440)

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Today the official opening of the Meeting of Experts on Human Rights, as mandated by the Madrid Review Meeting, which followed from the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, is being held in Ottawa, but that opening has been postponed from this morning to this afternoon. Following my inquiry on February 6 in this chamber, have any steps been taken to allow representation or participation by Canadian parliamentarians in this important meeting?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, several problems have arisen in connection with this meeting, one of which has been referred to by my honourable friend. The other has to do with the accreditation of journalists which is roughly, if you allow me to say so, in the same general category. The fact is that this conference is the master of its own affairs. Canada can propose but the conference will dispose of the issues. I have ensured that my colleague, the Secretary of State, is aware of my honourable friend's request and, accordingly, I anticipate that it has been placed before the governing body for consideration. The custom in the past has been not only to exclude observers of the sort that one might wish were there but also to hold the meetings on a secret or confidential basis, which is a situation which Canada does not really support. We would like to see the conference open and we would like to see those parties represented who can establish some right to be witnesses of the event. However, the unfortunate fact is that we can only suggest, and I have no reason to think at the present time that the rules are being changed in the way that my honourable friend would like them to be changed.

Senator Haidasz: In thanking the honourable leader for this explanation, could I ask him whether he would, later this week, table in this chamber the agenda of the conference, Canada's position as to the items on the agenda and the opening remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at this meeting which is supposed to take place later this afternoon?

Senator Roblin: I will find out for my honourable friend which of those documents are available and if I can provide them, I shall.

SUMMIT MEETINGS

SUGGESTED RETURN TO FORMER FORMAT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to return briefly to the question of the Bonn Summit which has been played before us in the last few days as something of a fiasco, with overblown rhetoric and public bickering which cannot possibly benefit any of the participants or, indeed, ensure that international stability for which the Summit was originally intended. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate make a serious suggestion to the Prime Minister, as one of the equal participants in the Summit exercise, to take the lead in suggesting to his fellow leaders that future summits revert to the form which was originally intended, namely, a quiet, private, informal, useful discussion among the seven nations and not the publicity zoo that we have watched for the past week?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I cannot accept the description that my honourable friend offers of the proceedings of the Summit. If one were to check the press every time one of these summits is held, one would find criticisms of a similar nature to be quite common. I do not think my honourable friend is watching something that is unusual or unique.

Senator MacEachen: This one is unique.

Senator Roblin: That is what some people say.

Senator Frith: Zoologists found it interesting.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that the Prime Minister needs the kind of advice that the honourable senator is prepared to offer.

PIONEER TRUST PAYMENT CONTINUATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-50, to provide for the continuation of payments under certain guaranteed income averaging certificates issued by the Pioneer Trust Company.

He said: As honourable senators know, Pioneer Trust Company encountered severe financial difficulties as a result of the large proportion of their mortgages that were in arrears. Given that this company was unable to obtain the necessary capital to restore its capital base to a more satisfactory situation, it closed its doors voluntarily and a winding-up order was issued on February 15, 1985. Shortly thereafter, CDIC, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, took quick action to pay off the depositors within the limits of its authority under the act. Approximately $203 million was paid by CDIC to depositors. Unfortunately, Pioneer Trust had approximately $36 million in deposits that were not protected under the terms of this insurance. Approximately $25 million of that $36 million consists of savings accounts, chequing accounts, RRSPs, Guaranteed Investment Receipts and so on. These accounts or deposits were in excess of the $60,000 limit that is permitted under this insurance.

The remainder of the uninsured deposits consists of $600,000 in U.S. fund deposits, $10 million of Guaranteed Income Averaging Annuity Certificates, and these, unfortunately, were not insured under the CDIC because they exceeded the five-year period which is permitted under that act.

Soon after this winding up of Pioneer Trust, the Honourable Barbara McDougall, Minister of State for Finance, became concerned about the position of approximately 650 holders of these IAACs that were for a period in excess of five years. Many of the holders, as honourable senators know, are elderly Canadians who had sold their farms or their businesses or their homes and had been encouraged by the provisions of the Income Tax Act, as it existed at that time, to invest their money in IAACs in order to have it returned to them as annuity payments for various periods of time up to 15 years. Many of these unfortunate people were dependent upon these payments, as promised under the IAACs, for their daily living expenses.

What bothered the minister more than anything else were the numerous representations made to her, to others and to many of us in this house about the plight of these unprotected depositors. In fact, they claim that some of the markings and the wording on the certificates which they had led them to believe that they were, indeed, insured under this deposit insurance. The minister's investigation confirmed this. Certainly, it is unacceptable that the documentation provided to many of these depositors should be the cause of a misunderstanding on their part as to whether or not they were insured. Depositors must be in a position to know, when they make that kind of a deposit, whether or not they will be protected by the deposit insurance.

As many of you know, honourable senators, the Minister of State has appointed a private sector committee to look into all aspects of the CDIC, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, and its act. In particular, in the future, this committee will be advising the minister as to what legislative action, if any, should be taken to try to ensure that depositors are better informed.

However, this does little to alleviate the plight of these 650 citizens, most of them elderly, who appear to have had pretty good reason to believe that they were insured under this act. It just is not acceptable to me and to others to give these people some kind of assurance that their deposits are safe and then to tell them, when the crisis and the winding-up or the liquidation of this company occurred, that in fact they were not.

It was the minister's concern about the circumstances surrounding these IAAC holders that led her to enter into the recently announced arrangement with the Government of Saskatchewan to compensate these uninsured depositors and to propose the legislation that is the subject of Bill C-50 today.

Honourable senators, the object of this legislation is to authorize the minister to enter into arrangements to continue the existing payments to holders of these uninsured IAACs up to the $60,000 limit that would have been applied had the certificates been insured. In other words, the objective is to provide a federal contribution to a plan to compensate Pioneer Trust uninsured depositors in an amount necessary to put those certificate holders in the position that they thought they were in, namely, that they were protected up to $60,000.

The Government of Saskatchewan, on the other hand, has undertaken to assume the liability, to make the payments required to those Income Averaging Annuity Certificate holders who hold amounts in excess of $60,000. For your information—and I am sure someone will ask the question—there are 19 people who hold IAACs in excess of $60,000. That is not a substantial number when you consider that originally there were 650 holders. Only 19 of them have deposits in IAACs beyond $60,000; and the total at risk, I am informed, is around $400,000.

Senator Frith: For the 19 people?

Senator Barootes: Yes, for those 19. The $400,000 is the amount in excess of the $60,000 that CDIC or, if you will, in this instance, the Superintendent of Insurance, will handle and cover. I think this is generous on the part of the Government of Saskatchewan.

Senator Steuart: To say the least.

Senator Barootes: In addition to this, the Government of Saskatchewan has undertaken to compensate for the accrued interest up to the liquidation date of February 15 this year all depositors who have U.S. dollar accounts, chequing accounts, Guaranteed Investment Certificates and RRSPs. In other words, the remainder of the depositors who were at risk and who were uninsured under the terms of the CDIC.

The bill asks the federal government for an appropriation of $5 million. The Department of Insurance officials are satisfied that this amount, together with the amounts to be contributed by the Government of Saskatchewan and the amounts expected to be recovered by the liquidator, should be sufficient to enable the payments promised in these Guaranteed Income Averaging Certificates to be continued to their expiration. In fact, depending upon the distribution that the court appointed liquidator of Pioneer Trust is able to make, the cost to the federal government may, in fact, be less than $5 million.

If this legislation is passed, honourable senators, it is the intention to make arrangements, as quickly as possible, with another financial institution to start making payments due and outstanding under the IAACs to these unfortunate people—"formerly unfortunate people" would be more correct.

The Government of Saskatchewan will be making arrangements to have a lump sum payment made to the U.S. dollar depositors and to depositors who had more than $60,000 on deposit in the form of chequing accounts, savings accounts, Guaranteed Investment Certificates and uninsured RRSPs.

Honourable senators, given the circumstances which I have described to you, I think it is reasonable that the Government of Canada take action to see that the holders of the IAACs are put in the position that they had every reason to believe they were actually in, namely, that they were protected to the extent of the $60,000 limit. As I have mentioned, this is part of a plan that will involve the Government of Saskatchewan compensating all the other depositors who were uninsured, including those with deposits in excess of $60,000.

May I add a statement of personal opinion? I think, honourable senators, that this is an excellent example of the co-operation and the compassionate co-ordination that can occur between the federal and a provincial government in circumstances such as these. It will bring relief to those concerned people in this critical situation.

Therefore, honourable senators, I recommend the passage of this bill.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask Senator Barootes a question.

Do I take it from his statement that no depositor or no person will have lost money because of the collapse of Pioneer Trust? Will the City of Regina receive its money? Will everyone receive his or her money, or will there still be some losses?

Will everyone who had money deposited or invested in Pioneer Trust by way of a customer deposit be paid accumulated interest or will some forgo the accumulated interest and, if so, who are they and what are the amounts?

From radio reports, the impression is left that everyone will be covered and there will be no losses. That is in accordance with the senator's statement this afternoon, but I just want to have that corroborated.

Senator Barootes: Senator Argue has asked a couple of piercing and important questions. Indeed, it is my understanding that everyone will be covered with the exception of those people who were not dealing with Pioneer Trust at arm's length. In other words, some of the officers and officials of Pioneer Trust are, at the present time, being excluded by the Government of Saskatchewan. When the winding-up and liquidation is complete, they may have some portion of their deposits returned to them.

Senator Argue's second question, if I understand it, was with respect to interest payments to those who had deposits. I am not certain that my answer will be total and accurate, but, in this regard, you may have noticed that they are paying interest on the deposits up to the date of liquidation which was February 15. Whether there are other interest payments over and above that, I am not certain, but I would think that unlikely.

• (1500)

In respect of the insured IAACs that will be transferred, to be paid by another financial institution, if I may use that general term, they will, of course, continue in the normal way, with the holders receiving their payments over the term, along with accrued interest.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of the sponsor of the bill.

Has there been any discussion about the actions of the directors of Pioneer Trust? Has there been any criticism or any suggestion of malfeasance, or of something having been wrong with their conduct of the affairs of the company?

Senator Barootes: Questions have been raised by others in that respect. To my knowledge, there is no evidence of anything that one would call malfeasance, or anything of that nature. However, I must point out to you that wrongdoings in this respect are now the responsibility of the liquidator to investigate, and the liquidator, as many of you are aware, is the chartered accounting firm of Touche Ross. It is the responsibility of the liquidator to report to the court of competent jurisdiction any suspicion of wrongdoing on the part of insiders or anyone else.

I have some knowledge of those concerned in the firm, and I am not aware of anything of that nature.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Have we been provided with copies of the bill?

Senator Barootes: I have a copy of Bill C-50, as passed by the House of Commons on May 6, 1985. I can pass that along to the honourable senator if he is without a copy of the bill.

Senator Everett: You stated that there was language attached to the instrument granted by Pioneer Trust to the holders of IAACs that indicated to the holder that his or her deposit was insured by the CDIC.

Could you give me that specific language?

Senator Barootes: Indeed. The IAAC certificates carried at the bottom the notation: "A member of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation." The certificate does not say that that particular contract is insured; it merely points out that Pioneer Trust—and one can interpret it as one wishes—is a member of the CDIC, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. On some of them there would be a plaque or stamp containing the letters "CDIC."

Many of the annuitants believed that that meant that they had the $60,000 coverage. That is the point that many of them have made in making representations.

Senator Everett: Would the honourable senator not agree, though, that the language is not specific in terms of the giving of an undertaking to the depositor that the IAAC is insured by the CDIC? And would he not agree, further, that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation did not give any undertaking in that regard?

I would be interested in knowing whether the holders of these instruments, who are now going to be paid off at the rate of 100 cents on the dollar, realized a greater return on their investment than they would have realized had they invested in another institution at less risk?

Senator Barootes: I am not sure that I understand Senator Everett's question.

Senator Everett: Let me be specific, then. What I am suggesting to you is that those investing in a company such as Pioneer Trust earn higher interest by virtue of the risk in investing in a smaller institution. In taking that risk, they have an instrument that indicates that the company itself is a member of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, but there is no specific undertaking of coverage.

I am wondering whether you have carried out any investigation to determine whether or not the holders of these certificates enjoyed a greater return on their investment by virtue of the risk that they were taking.

By passing this legislation, we are saying to them that they can take this greater risk, with the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan keeping them whole in the event that something goes wrong.

Senator Barootes: I do not know that I can answer that hypothetical question as it would involve my looking into the backgrounds and the minds of those who invested in these annuities—

Senator Everett: I am not asking a hypothetical question. I am asking whether at the time these individuals invested in Pioneer Trust, they stood to earn a higher return than they could have expected had they invested in, for example, the Royal Trust Company?

Senator Barootes: I am unable to answer that question. As you know, Senator Everett, the IAACs were discontinued in 1982, if my memory serves me correctly. During the years that IAACs were available, many people used them, and of course the interest rates varied. I am unable to tell you whether, at the time that each of these separate contracts or instruments was taken out, the rate of return to the annuitant under a Pioneer Trust certificate was higher than that which was available from better established trust companies.

I do recall that we had a similar situation in Winnipeg with Fort Garry Trust and Fidelity Trust.

Senator Everett: I can understand the difficulty with an income averaging annuity. Since, in effect, the two levels of government are insuring certificates of deposit of certain lengths—and as I understand the sponsor's speech, it would appear that everyone is covered one way or the other—perhaps he could tell us what the situation is in respect of certificates of deposit.

Taking a 90-day certificate of deposit as an example, it surely would be fairly easy to compare the rates paid by the various trust companies and banks at a given time.

Would those investing in 180-day certificates of deposit have enjoyed a higher rate from Pioneer Trust Company than from Royal Trust?

Senator Barootes: As you know, there are weekly and monthly pronouncements from Ottawa and elsewhere as to the rates to be paid on various term deposits. It would seem to me that the minor trust companies, in order to attract deposits, would on occasion have to pay a slightly higher rate of return. In the case of Pioneer Trust, with whom we are dealing in this bill—and there are many small trust companies that have paid a premium to attract deposits—in the latter days the Superintendent of Insurance recommended that there be offered rates of return on deposits below the extant rates. Pioneer Trust followed that recommendation in the six or eight months prior to its liquidation.

At one time they were probably paying a slightly higher than average return, but from the latter part of 1984 to the time of their liquidation, they were paying rates somewhat lower so as to dampen the number of deposits coming in.

● (1510)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have two questions for Senator Barootes, whom I congratulate on what I believe is his maiden speech in this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: His second "maiden" speech!

Senator Buckwold: My first question is: The honourable senator stated that the total commitment possible for the federal government is $5 million. He did not give us the commitment of the Saskatchewan government. I should like to know that amount. I should also like to hear the background story concerning the Saskatchewan government. That government previously committed itself to guaranteeing a preferred issue. I have forgotten whether the amount was $30 million or $35 million. But the Minister of Finance for Saskatchewan suddenly withdrew that guarantee. As a Saskatchewan senator, I wish to express the appreciation of many elderly citizens of Saskatchewan who will not be losers in terms of their savings, income averaging annuities, and so on. I can tell honourable senators that Pioneer generally had a very good reputation and was highly regarded in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not know whether the sponsor of the bill intends to propose, following second reading debate, that the bill should go to committee. However, if the bill is not to go to committee, he may want to obtain answers to some of these questions before the second reading debate is completed.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I point out that the bill did not go to committee in the other place, but passed through all three stages in one day. While that course is not binding on this house, it is a good indication of the urgency of the bill.

I disagree with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that Senator Barootes should obtain information. In my view he has done an excellent job in answering our questions and I see no reason for delaying the bill in order to provide further answers. I am sure the Deputy Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that he has done an excellent job, far better than that done by some ministers on some occasions in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I certainly agree that the sponsor has done an excellent job in introducing the bill. However, he has said quite candidly that he does not have answers to some of the questions. I am merely suggesting that one way of providing those answers, short of sending the bill to committee, would be to obtain answers in the meantime. However, I will leave it at that, because I am trespassing on the time set aside for debate on second reading. There may be a number of other questions to be asked by honourable senators, and they may want those questions dealt with in committee. In view of Senator Phillips' comment, and not wishing to suggest that Senator Barootes' performance was anything but excellent, I will withdraw my suggestion and see what happens.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, on the point of whether or not the bill should go to committee, I believe the Senate has a job to do. Our job is separate and apart from that of the House of Commons. This bill involves an important question. No one is in favour of any undue delay, but we should be prepared to send the bill to committee if the answers are not satisfactory.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I believe the discussion at this point is premature. Senator Steuart wants to enter into the debate on this question. The whole question of whether the bill should go to committee is usually dealt with at the end of second reading. With respect, I believe the debate should continue without these interventions. If Senator Steuart wants to take part in the debate, he should be allowed to do so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is precisely for the reasons mentioned by Senator Everett that I withdrew my suggestion. The debate should continue and we will see what happens.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, like many other senators here—

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I wonder whether Senator Barootes is prepared to answer my questions.

Senator Steuart: I am sorry. I thought the honourable senator had finished.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, may I proceed with my answer to Senator Buckwold, following which we shall hear from Senator Steuart, or would the house prefer that Senator Steuart ask his questions, which I will include in the goulash of questions already put and answer them all at once, rather like a stew?

An Hon. Senator: It's a goulash now.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Buckwold, the cost to the federal government involves about $5 million or probably less. However, let us say $5 million. The total amount uninsured is $36 million. The Government of Saskatchewan is assuming responsibility for approximately $26 million. I believe I pointed out that $600,000 of that figure involves U.S. dollar deposits; $400,000 is the excess of IAACs over the $60,000; and approximately $25 million involves the collection of chequing and savings accounts, RRSPs and GICs. I hope it is not improper for me to use those short terms.

It is expected that the liquidator will be able to obtain, on liquidation of the assets—I understand that the sale of a package of mortgages is now under way—more than 50 per cent of that $36 million. That would lower the Saskatchewan government's responsibility to somewhere in the $10 million to $15 million bracket. I hope that is a satisfactory answer.

The honourable senator asked about the preferred share issue, which, indeed, had been proposed in November, 1984. It was a ten-year preferred issue, guaranteed by the Government of Saskatchewan, for $30 million. The government not only guaranteed the principal amount, but it also guaranteed the interest thereon. So over a period of ten years the amount probably at risk was approximately $50 million. As honourable senators know, in the light of information and disclosures made subsequently by the Pioneer group to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues, the provincial government withdrew that proposal. Originally it had given a letter of understanding that it would support such a proposal.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, may I put a short question to Senator Barootes? In light of the collapse of Pioneer Trust and similar institutions in other parts of Canada, is he aware that the government is contemplating any changes in the rules governing such lending institutions?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I am not sure that I can answer that question. We would have to have someone from the executive side of government, that is the cabinet, to explain government policy on this matter. However, I did point out that the Minister of State for Finance, the Honourable Barbara McDougall, has set up an independent outside committee—not within the government but outside—to look into the CDIC Act, to see whether there are some shortcomings. Honourable senators will recall that the guaranteed amount, up until the time of the Greymac, Seaway, Multi-Corp Limited and Crown Trust disasters, was $20,000. About that time it was raised to $60,000. With the appearance of these anomalies between annuitants and so on, I believe the minister is anxious to get an outside opinion on whether or not restructuring the act would be more beneficial to the people of Canada. That is all the information I have to pass on.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, Senator Barootes has done an excellent job in answering the many questions and in presenting the case for the Government of Saskatchewan, the Government of Canada and Pioneer Trust in a very favourable light. However, I do not think we should skip over this matter so lightly. There are many questions that have not been answered and they should be raised.

As a resident of Saskatchewan and a senator from Saskatchewan, I am extremely sorry and upset, as I am sure most people in Saskatchewan are, over the fact that Pioneer Trust has gone under. Pioneer Trust began when I was a member of the Government of Saskatchewan. It started off as a little insurance company with a bit of a gimmick and it did very well. As it began to gather more investors and momentum, it became a trust company and it became a very big business in Saskatchewan. About the time they were moving into the big league in Saskatchewan, the Conservative government was elected.

It should be noted here that the principal people in Pioneer Trust and the principal people in the Conservative government were one and the same and almost interchangeable. I think this has a great bearing on what has happened and why the people of Canada, particularly the people of Saskatchewan, and the ordinary taxpayers are now faced with paying out some $27 million plus to pick up the pieces of this failure. I think we have to go back and find out what happened. I think what happened is that after this company got too big it was operated in a very irresponsible manner. We are starting to hear about investments made in the United States, investments in land, and about the company sending people who were excellent football players but not necessarily excellent financiers down to places such as Denver to pick up investments that had failed, and that failed again at the cost of millions of dollars. We are beginning to hear about some very irresponsible actions. The most irresponsible action of all occurred at about the time most people in Saskatchewan were talking about whether this company would fail or succeed. The Minister of Finance of Saskatchewan published a letter which said without equivocation that the Government of Saskatchewan would back this company to the tune of something like $25 million or $30 million. As a result many people who were about to withdraw their money from the trust company left it in.

I do not agree with Senator Barootes when he says that the Government of Saskatchewan could have obtained more information or learned more than they knew at the time. I think, because of the outcry of public opinion against the government for putting up $30 million of taxpayers' money, the Government of Saskatchewan, in spite of the letter—which caused many people to leave funds in the company when they might have withdrawn them—backed out and the institution folded. Then the Government of Saskatchewan found itself in a very difficult position. Many hundreds and perhaps thousands of people of that province were left high and dry. As a result, they started to negotiate back and forth with Ottawa. This is what has brought about the bill which is before us today and the action that has been taken by both the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan. Granted, this bill will save the taxpayers and citizens of Saskatchewan many thousands of dollars, but I think that there are a great many questions to be answered.

The first question is: Why did they get themselves into that position? I think we should review the operations of this company. I do not think that either the Government of Canada or the Government of Saskatchewan should casually put up $25 million or $30 million of taxpayers' money without having a hard look at the operations of this company. Perhaps one could go back and say that former governments of Canada have done the same thing in other circumstances. If they did so with no more investigation than is taking place in this case, then I think they were wrong. If we pass this bill without looking further into it, we, too, are wrong. I do not think that one, two, three or four wrongs make a right. I cannot blame this whole matter on the present Government of Saskatchewan or the present Government of Canada, because we have allowed these trust companies to operate in far too loose a manner. We have seen very famous people in, for instance, western Canada, buying hockey teams and investing in all kinds of ridiculous schemes which have caused the loss of millions of dollars to ordinary people. Most people in Canada regard trust companies in the same way as they regard Canadian banks, where you can put your money and it is as safe as being in the Bank of England, the Church of England or wherever. It turns out that that is not the case.

I think that the Senate should look into this matter a little more deeply than the introduction of this bill would indicate to have been done up to now. I also think that the Government of Saskatchewan has operated, up until this point, in a most irresponsible manner and that what they are doing with their money and what they are asking the federal government to do is in some ways irresponsible. They are not simply seeking to save certain investors in Saskatchewan. If that were what they were doing, I could not say anything against it, because some of those people are my friends, and they invested with goodwill. They made their investments after a great deal of propaganda on the part of Pioneer Trust, backed up by the Government of Saskatchewan which was saying, "Saskatchewan is open for business. Saskatchewan is a free enterprise economy. We are now on the road to victory and on the road to success and if you invest your money you will win." At the time you could not tell the difference between the members of Pioneer Trust and the Conservative government. Now, all of a sudden, you can tell the difference. I think it is a little too easy to let everybody get away without asking any questions. I would like to see this bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce so that we may have a hard look at it and so that we may ask people, if they so wish, to come here and make their case and, if possible, to find out what had happened.

Senator Everett raised some good questions about the kind of money the company was paying out in interest. My wife had an RRSP with Pioneer Trust and I had one with the Imperial Bank. About one year ago we received the little slip of paper with information that comes once a year and that says "this is not for income tax purposes." I was getting 11.5 per cent from the Imperial Bank and my wife, with her little investment of about $6,000 in Pioneer Trust, was getting 17 per cent. Upon looking at them, I said, "Either you are a genius and I am an idiot or these people are in trouble." It turned out that she might have been a bigger genius than I, but that company and all the people who invested in it were in big trouble. The whole matter is a little deeper and a little more serious than this bill and the excellent speech given by the honourable senator from Saskatchewan would indicate. I think we should take a hard look at it.

The honourable senator has made the sign of the cross. Bless him. I think this is a case of the Tories trying to save their friends, but not really having the guts to go all the way by putting up the $20 million or $30 million. In that way they would really save their friends. They are now asking the taxpayers of Canada and the taxpayers of Saskatchewan to bail out the Devine government. I cannot understand how the Mulroney Government is involved, but I think they are coming to the rescue. I just do not think it is good enough. I also do not think it is good enough to come back and say, "When you were in power, you Liberals did just as badly or worse." You people were elected because there was to be a new day, and a new leaf and there was to be real free enterprise out there. I do not think this is an example of free enterprise; I think it is a bail out of some friends of this government and of the Saskatchewan government, and I do not think that is good enough. I, therefore, move that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further study.

• (1530)

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I will not go over the ground that was just covered so ably by Senator Steuart. I would also like to congratulate Senator Barootes on an excellent maiden speech that had the hallmark of clarity. My feeling on this matter is that I would go along with Senator Steuart, and I hope that Senator Barootes will recommend that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

It seems to me that what we are doing here is running the risk of setting a precedent. Let me say to honourable senators that it is the federal government that is involved here, admittedly along with the Government of Saskatchewan. Nevertheless, the federal government is involved and if they bail out, for whatever reason, the depositors in a trust company and see that they are protected beyond what is provided for by law through CDIC, then I think that we are setting a precedent. In fact, what it means is that almost any trust company, no matter how badly it is run, will be protected. A depositor can put his or her money into the company; they can be paid, as they often are, rates that are egregiously greater than the rates that are available to those who deposit their money in safe institutions. The more improperly a trust company is run, the higher the interest rate that is paid. As long as people know that the federal government has set a precedent for bailing out such companies, we are encouraging a situation where depositors, and they have the right to do so, take risks that they should not be taking.

If it is the decision of the government that the deposit insurance should be $100,000 or $1 million, we can debate that. However, the amount at which it is now set is $60,000; it is not unlimited, but that is what we are making it; we are giving a signal that that insurance will be unlimited.

The tragic part of these matters is, of course, that someone like Senator Barootes can stand up and say, "This is a case where there are people who sold their farms. This is all of the money that they have to live on into their retirement, and we must step in and do something about it." I agree that we just cannot be cavalier about people who are in such a situation as that. But surely what is required is an intensive investigation into the implications of what we are doing now. Because some people are in jeopardy of losing money, let us not just jump in and say that we will guarantee all deposits of all trust companies, no matter how badly they are run and no matter how risky the deposits are.

Therefore I would support Senator Steuart in his motion and recommend to the senator who has sponsored this bill that he ask that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Argue: In my opinion, this is a very important bill for Saskatchewan, and no matter whether we do or do not send it to a committee—and I hope we shall—I am certain that the bill itself will receive general support because the people who are involved out there in Saskatchewan have an important claim. After all, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. In the last number of years, there have been a number of bail outs, and this is not the biggest one we have had to deal with.

I think a great many major errors have been made in this case, and a very early major error was that, when Pioneer Trust felt that they were in some difficulty, they should have approached the authorities in Ottawa; they should have had an early, comprehensive discussion amongst themselves as to what steps might, in fact, be taken to keep this company viable and to keep it in operation. That, of course, is what the Minister of Finance in Saskatchewan thought he was doing, or intended to do, I believe, when he sent the letter which would provide a guarantee on certain preferred shares.

Then, of course, the skirmish started and Mr. Bob Andrews felt that Pioneer Trust had not come clean; had not disclosed all of the facts and, at a later date, he felt that he should withdraw that guarantee.

All of that, to me, adds up to bad management and ineptness by a group of people who were not able to get their act together. In my opinion, had a plan been made earlier, perhaps there would have been a real possibility that this company might have been kept viable and in operation.

There are things that have been done to keep other companies in operation. Not long ago, in this chamber we supported a measure to provide some $250 million by way of guarantees, et cetera, to the Canadian Commercial Bank in order to keep its operation going. There are many examples of actions of this kind having been taken. However, as I understand it, the cost to Canada of this company's going down the drain is not $30 million or $20 million or $15 million. Part of the enormous cost is what CDIC has already paid out, namely $203 million. Therefore the cost to the country of letting this company go bankrupt is certainly very high indeed. In fact, good business people would ask whether the net cost to the country is more because we let it go bankrupt than it might have been if we had come in at an earlier date with reasonable guarantees on an agreed basis from all authorities involved. I think that is a question that the committee could very well consider.

Earlier, I said something about what is sauce for the goose being sauce for the gander. The people who dealt with Pioneer Trust in Saskatchewan believed that they were dealing with something just about as sound as the Rock of Gibraltar because it had a good name; it had 20,000 Saskatchewan residents who were shareholders of Pioneer Trust, I believe, so they thought it was a good company. However, as it turned out, it was not a good company in the sense that it was not able to survive.

There are a great many individual farmers out in western Canada who are having a tough time trying to survive and the authorities, who are usually the Farm Credit Corporation and the banks, say to such individuals: "If you are not able to survive, it is your tough luck. It is a question of your having used bad judgment." I do not think it is as simple as that. Most of the farmers who are in financial trouble are in that predicament because they took the advice of the experts, namely the banks, the research people at the Farm Credit Corporation, and obviously they took the loans that were available from those financial institutions who thought that the people receiving the loan would have an opportunity to succeed.

● (1540)

So, for all the reasons that have been put forward by Senator Steuart and others, I, too, think that it would be useful to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I think we have a job to do. I do not think it is good enough to say that the members of the House of Commons have looked at it and, therefore, we do not have to look at it, or we should not have a look at it. That is a dead-end approach; there is nothing to be gained by that approach.

So, I think we should have discussions with honourable senators opposite to get agreement that the bill be referred to committee.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have moved the adjournment of the debate.

An Hon. Senator: That is the end of it.

Senator Argue: It is the adjournment of the debate. That does not mean the end of anything.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, on a point of order. The motion has not been put—

Senator Argue: I do not know how one puts it, but I have moved the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Phillips: Senator Argue, I was referring to Senator Steuart's motion. I do not believe that the Speaker has put Senator Steuart's motion.

Senator Argue: The motion was not put, so it was not before the Senate. The motion I have made, I trust the Speaker will now put to the Senate, namely, that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, the other day I moved a motion, another senator then spoke immediately afterwards, and my motion was not put. Today Senator Steuart has moved a motion and somebody rose to speak, and his motion was not put.

I should like a ruling from the Speaker on this matter. It seems to me that it is only common sense if someone moves a motion that it be put, notwithstanding the fact that someone else rises to speak. The motion by the second speaker should be put after the first motion has been put. I think this should be straightened out. A motion should not be ignored just because someone else rises to speak.

Senator Argue: On the point of order, when a senator moves that a bill be referred to committee, my understanding of parliamentary procedure is that such motion is put before the Senate by way of an honourable senator saying "I move . . ." Then the Speaker should rise and put the motion, and if that does not happen, then the senator who moved the motion should insist that it be put.

Having put it before the Senate does not mean that the debate has stopped; there is just another subject on which to debate, and things go on from there. Certainly, the motion could have been put at that time, but it was not.

Senator Steuart: About one-and-a-half seconds passed between the time I sat down and the time you rose. I would have thought you would have given the Speaker an opportunity to put my motion. The Speaker might not have been paying close attention; that has happened in the Senate in the past.

So, the next time I think it would be only courteous of you to ask whether the motion is going to be put. However, I will go along with this because I have no choice.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the point of order, the debate we had on a previous occasion on a point of order was whether or not a motion or the subject matter of a motion could be referred to a committee. We had a ruling on that and found that it was in order to refer a motion to a committee, and that it was also in order to refer the subject matter of a motion to a committee.

In this case we are dealing with a bill, so I think it would be worth while having a ruling from the Speaker. I do not know whether there is anything against referring a bill to a committee during second reading debate; however, it is true that normally a bill is not referred to a committee during second reading debate.

Senator Steuart: Is there something against that?

Senator Frith: May I finish my point?

Senator Steuart: Certainly. I am sure you will, anyway.

Senator Murray: Why don't you settle this in caucus?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the point of order that has been raised includes in it the question of whether or not a bill can be referred to a committee before it receives second reading. The normal practice is that a bill is referred to a committee after receiving second reading but before receiving third reading.

Now, is there anything prohibiting a bill from being referred to committee during second reading debate? I think we should find that out. I can remember that that happened with Bill S-31. That was referred to committee during second reading debate.

So, had you allowed me to finish, Senator Steuart, I was going to say that there is nothing against that.

Although the motion to refer the bill to committee was not put, it can be put again during debate, which has been adjourned anyway. It is true that normally we do not refer bills to committee until after second reading, but that does not mean that that cannot be done.

Hon. Charles McElman: On the point of order, honourable senators, there was, in fact, a motion before the house that the bill be now read the second time. It is quite inappropriate to have another motion before the house unless that motion states: "That this bill be not now read the second time but that it be referred to committee."

That motion was not made. Therefore, there is only one motion before the house, and that is the motion for second reading, and the debate was quite properly carried on and adjourned.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, may I call your attention to rule 36 (1), which states:

When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question, to refer the question to a committee, to adjourn the debate, to postpone the debate to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate.

So, the motion to refer the matter to committee was in order; the motion to adjourn the debate was in order; and I think the point made that the motions should have been put in their proper order is a valid one.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

WORLD WAR II

FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware that this chamber needs no reminder that some forty Mays ago, in 1945, one of the most climactic events in the history of our times took place when it was established that the war in Europe was over and that victory against the Axis powers on that continent had been achieved.

While it is an event all honourable senators will wish to recall, I am sure it has particular significance for those in this chamber who served in that war. I would like to give their names, because I believe it is important for us to know the record. They are:

Senators Buckwold, Croll, Denis, Doyle, Gigantès, Godfrey, Guay, Hicks, Lafond, Lang, Langlois, Marshall, McElman, Molgat, Molson, Neiman, Stanbury, David Steuart, Thompson, Kelly, Finlay MacDonald, Bélisle, Charbonneau, Everett, John M. Macdonald, Phillips, Yuzyk and Barootes. I add also my own name to that list.

The events that we recall on this occasion represent a climactic period in the history of our country, where, by a supreme effort in which the whole nation joined, we took part in that conflict. By no means do I neglect to recall that, of course, we were one of several allies; and, indeed, one of the nations that was allied with us at that time unfortunately no longer enjoys such a friendly relationship with us.

It was a climactic event in the life of the nation; but it was also a climactic event in the lives of the men and women who took part in it—and, indeed, in the lives of all Canadians. There was grief for the fallen; there was joy, I believe, among the survivors; and there was fierce satisfaction in the nation that those western values on which we had set our hearts had triumphed—at least in our part of the world.

At that time it was climactic not only for those general reasons, but it was the high point in the lives of many of those who took part. And there is a reason for that. It was a time when there was a feeling of comradeship, which is not ordinarily to be found in our relationships one with another; there was personal commitment to a cause we esteemed; and there was a clear purpose which united us one with another. Alas, after 40 years, those great emotions have eroded. The clear dedication, which we found so much to our inclination in those days, is by no means as strong as it used to be in times of war. In a sense, we can thank God that it is so, because it means that we are not challenged in this day and generation with the horrors that were apparent to those who served and to those who waited in those six years of struggle over 40 years ago.

But I hope that the spirit that quickened in our nation in war-time is a spirit that can still be found among our people in these days of peace—relative peace though it may be. I hope that spirit will inspire us to dedicate ourselves, not so much to the past, because that is part of the record of our history, but to the future so that we may summon up, once again, those qualities that made this nation great in war-time and that can make it great in peace-time and a leader in the quest for harmony among nations.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has called our attention to a most significant and emotion-filled event which took place forty years ago today. My involvement in World War II is one which has left me with many memories. I was in Whitehall when Mr. Chamberlain came back from his conference with Hitler in Munich and made his speech at the Cenotaph. Indeed, I was at the foot of the Cenotaph when he made that speech, waving his umbrella and proclaiming, "I have brought you peace in our time!" I may say that my colleagues, who were members of the Oxford University ice hockey team and playing a game in London that day, did not believe for one minute that Mr. Chamberlain had his finger on the pulse of the situation.

A little later, when the Germans occupied Austria, an American friend and I made our way directly to Munich and from there to Linz and to Innsbruck, Austria. I heard Hitler speak twice in Innsbruck. In those days my German was much better than it is now. However, he spoke so rapidly and idiomatically that it was difficult to follow him. Nevertheless, the power and ferocity of his personality came through. I remember going back to my college at Oxford and engaging in a discussion with some of my English friends who were then inclined to regard Hitler as a BBC songster, Ronald Francau, put it:

Heil Hitler, ja, ja, ja;

Oh what a funny little man you are;

With your little moustache and your hair all blah;

Heil Hitler, ja, ja, ja.

I remember telling my English friends very seriously, "If you think this man is someone to be laughed at, then you will have another think coming." In due course the war commenced. I remained in England. I was in a little town in the Thames Valley when Mr. Churchill made his great speech. Honourable senators will recall the immortal words:

—we shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets, we shall fight in the hills; we shall never surrender.

Up until that time that little community had been very depressed. After we all listened to Mr. Churchill's speech on the wireless we went down to the pub and had a drink, and there was such a determined resolution on the part of the people of England at that time that if Hitler had commenced his cross-channel invasion I think we would have seen one of the most terrific slaughters that mankind had ever witnessed, because I believe that the English people would have fought with everything—guns, pitchforks and anything else that came to hand. My own feeling at that time, while I was not an Englishman, was that I would have participated in the same way.

Subsequently, I spent my five and a half years in the army—not as a very brave soldier; I was a technical staff officer in radar. I had a very interesting time and experienced one or two episodes that may have had some bearing on the outcome of the war.

I was in Holland and nearby Germany when the war ended. By great personal good fortune, I was flown back to England on the 7th day of May, the day before VE Day, because we knew the war was over and I was to have taken a special mortar-locating radar device to do liaison work with the U.S. Army Signal Corps and then, perhaps, take it out to the Pacific. So I spent VE night in London. It was a wonderful occasion, and testified to the strength of that great people. There was no damage; there was no violence; there was no disruption. People went out—we all went out to the pubs which, of course, were incapable of holding the numbers of people who were there, so you went in, got your drink, came out and sat on the curb and talked with the joyous people who, after nearly six years, had finally achieved the victory which their courage and resolution deserved.

Let it never be forgotten that Great Britain and its Commonwealth allies carried the battle for the first two years of the war. When our American friends refer to World War II, they tend to think that it started in December of 1941, when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbour. But the brunt of the seemingly impossible contest was borne for more than two years by Britain and her Commonwealth allies, including Canada.

There is a great deal more that I could say, but this was certainly a wonderful day and a day of which we can be very proud. Our memories are filled with the recollections of those who were lost. Unfortunately, I was a student at Oxford University at the time the Oxford Union carried their resolution: "Resolved that this house will not fight for King and country." Herr von Ribbentrop, who was the German Ambassador to the Court of St. James at the time, reported to Hitler that the British youth were demoralized and would not put up any resistance. Of course, the British have a kind of sense of humour which the Germans cannot understand, and it was those same people who carried that resolution who fought and won the Battle of Britain.

Unfortunately, I had about six very close English friends with whom I would have remained intimate all my life were it not for the fact that every one of them was killed during that time. I have the most poignant recollections of the sacrifices that we made in order to attain the victory which was achieved on May 8, 1945.

I salute my fallen comrades.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Senator Hicks. I agree with Senator Roblin that, forty years ago, on VE Day, there was a great deal of joy and satisfaction for those who had fought and for those who had aided our fighters. However, for one hundred million people in nine countries behind the iron curtain there was less than joy and very little satisfaction. Having overthrown the Nazi totalitarianism, they were left to deal with and live under another type of totalitarianism—namely, Marxism.

On a day such as this, I think we should remind ourselves of the iron curtain and the Berlin wall which are the very costly results of the bloodiest war in human history; a war in which over 50 million people died, including civilians, soldiers, airmen and sailors.

I agree with Senator Roblin that we should rededicate ourselves to the democratic principles for which our armed forces fought, but we should also rededicate ourselves to the continuing struggle for true peace and justice in the world for all peoples.

STEVE FONYO

"JOURNEY FOR LIVES" ACROSS CANADA

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in praise of Steve Fonyo, a young man from Vernon, British Columbia—my home town—who has recently been capturing the hearts and minds of Canadians as he battles on with his "Journey for Lives."

This courageous young man, who at the age of 12 lost his left leg to cancer, started a run across Canada in St. John's, Newfoundland on March 31, 1984 and will reach his destination of Victoria, B.C., in a few weeks' time. On Sunday last, he was welcomed home to Vernon by thousands of people from the local area and another several thousand who watched that great event on live CBC television.

As of yesterday, May 7, Steve had raised $3,701,382 for cancer research. Of this, a total of $296,168 was raised in British Columbia, and that does not include the pledge of $1,000 per kilometer from the Government of British Columbia.

There are many more events being planned in British Columbia. Today there is a large reception to be held in Kamloops, and when he reaches Vancouver it is expected that thousands of people will turn out for a massive reception in B.C. Place.

I am certain that all honourable senators will join me in congratulating Steve Fonyo on the tremendous success that he has already achieved and wish him all Godspeed on the rest of his journey.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, May 14, 1985, I shall move:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On Wednesday, April 24 last, I complained about the dismissal of women from various government boards and agencies by this government. The Leader of the Government offered to send me a list of appointments because, as he stated on that day:

I doubt that any other government could point to such a record in the first nine months of its administration as that of the present government in respect of its treatment of women.

I have asked officials in the leader's office for that list, and they have been unable to provide it. So, I have taken up a list prepared by my colleague, Mr. Boudria, concerning government appointments.

Honourable senators, in leaving out that week, I find that of the 940 appointments listed, 85, or 9 per cent, were female, and of the dismissals, 9 out of 56, or 16 per cent, involved women.

My question is: How does the government now justify its first nine months in office?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have undertaken to try to provide my honourable friend with the information. That undertaking still stands.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS RESOLUTION BY THE SENATE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to a notice of motion that was to be tabled yesterday afternoon in the House of Commons involving curtailment of the powers of the Senate. As honourable senators know, if that resolution becomes law, it will emasculate this institution effectively and forever, and we will become a redundant, ceremonial Royal Assent chamber.

If my recollection of the Constitution Act is correct, this resolution, if carried in the House of Commons, could become law without ever being introduced into this chamber for debate. Under those circumstances, could I have an assurance from the Leader of the Government that that resolution or such other form as it may eventually take will come before this chamber so that we may have a full discussion of its contents and so that the seriousness of the long-range implications of this resolution on the parliamentary life of Canada can be fully debated?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I welcome the question on this very important matter because I want to assure my honourable friend that should this resolution that he refers to, and which was tabled in the House of Commons yesterday, be adopted by that chamber, it would be my intention to introduce it, or any amended version of it that the House of Commons might deal with, into this chamber for full debate. I fully agree with him that it is a matter which needs to be looked at from every angle, and the Senate has a duty to undertake that examination.

NATIVE PEOPLES

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS—RUMOURED GOVERNMENT CUTS

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This morning's newspaper reports indicate that the federal government is considering cuts to native programs in the amount of $311 million. Are those cuts to be outlined in the May budget?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure that I got the full import of the question. I have to tell my honourable friend that he has to wait until he sees the budget before he comes to any conclusions as to what the budget will provide. It will be presented in the other place on May 23, and full details with respect to all financial matters that can be included in that statement will appear then. I am not sure that I am giving him a very satisfactory answer, but that is the best that I can do with the question as I received it.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS RESOLUTION BY JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to the one put by Senator Lang concerning the resolution that was presented yesterday in the House of Commons with respect to an amendment to the Constitution. When the proposition was put for the patriation of the Constitution early in the previous Parliament, a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was established to study that proposition. Does the leader know if a similar course is going to be followed as a result of the presentation of yesterday's resolution?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is not the present intention of the government. Its intention is that it will be considered by each house separately, and in view of the changes in the powers of the houses brought in by the new Constitution, that seems to be the appropriate way to deal with it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEETING OF EXPERTS—PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the conflicting reports from officials and government representatives as to whether there will definitely be Canadian parliamentary representation, at least as observers, at the special Meeting of Experts on Human Rights which opened in Ottawa yesterday afternoon. At the last moment some honourable senators and members of the other place were invited to attend the opening session at which the Secretary of State for External Affairs delivered the opening address.

● (1420)

I raise this question this afternoon because the official delegation of the United States of America at this conference will consist of senators and members of the House of Representatives; and also because of the Canadian precedent of allowing Canadian parliamentarians to attend the review meetings of the Helsinki Final Act. I also raise it especially because there are many senators in this chamber who are very interested in this meeting and in the whole subject of human rights.

My question is: Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate any up-to-date information about the Canadian parliamentary representation at this meeting?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give my honourable friend some information on that score. There are eight parliamentary observers designated to attend any aspect of the proceedings at this meeting. The number is divided among the political parties and it is up to each party to decide who represents it.

My information is—and I hope it is correct—that my honourable friend Senator Haidasz has been selected by his party to be one of those representatives. If so, I congratulate him.

TORONTO HARBOURFRONT

PUBLIC ACCESS

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which is prompted by the recent appointment of John Tory, a prominent Toronto Tory, as a director of the Harbourfront Corporation in Toronto.

Has the leader actually visited the site of Harbourfront? If he could find time to do so on one of his trips to Toronto, perhaps he would be interested in having me show him around.

The fact is that an ugly, industrial wasteland on the Toronto harbourfront has been turned into a dynamic, accessible waterfront, as well as an innovative community and cultural centre.

An average of two million people attend Harbourfront every year, and the admission is absolutely free. Can the leader offer me some assurance that admission to Harbourfront will continue to be free?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information on that point, but if there is a change in the policy, my honourable friend may rely on being told about it.

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Recently, a Harbourfront Quay Club has been formed which anyone can join, that is, if they have $1,000. A Quay Club letter says, "the best things in life are not free."

I find this very frightening on two counts: first, the clear implication is that the Government of Canada is prepared to cut back on its commitment to Harbourfront and its kaleidoscope of programs for people; and, second, I am concerned about the formation of an elite, inner circle in a place which, heretofore, has been noted for its democratic mass appeal.

Would the Leader of the Government inquire if the fundamental purpose of Harbourfront is not being jettisoned by this kind of appeal, because the letter refers to "prominent community members who form a special group and who will be thanked in a very special way by Harbourfront."?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend obviously knows a great deal more about Harbourfront than I do. I am not aware of the federal government's participation in that particular venture, although I expect it may have a part to play.

The best I can do is to try to find the answer without in any way committing myself to the alarmist contentions contained in my honourable friend's introduction.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEETING OF EXPERTS—PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, Senator Haidasz earlier put a question concerning the parliamentary delegation to the CSCE which is taking place in Ottawa at the present time.

The Leader of the Government replied that the Canadian delegation is composed of eight members of Parliament. Does that mean that there are six from the House of Commons and two from the Senate, one from each side of the Speaker?

If so, would the leader consider making representations on the other side as to whether they can apply the same formula that was applied during the Madrid and the Belgrade Conferences on the same subject by which there was a rotation system for parliamentarians who participated as observers to those conferences?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The arrangements are that each political party can do what it wishes in nominating people to fill those tasks—choosing people from the Senate or from the House of Commons. If they wish to rotate the membership, I am sure that can be arranged. It is up to senators to deal with their party officials in the matter.

Senator Bosa: There will only be one representative of the opposition in the Senate, and that will not reflect, in percentage terms, the number of seats that the opposition occupies in this chamber.

Senator Roblin: That is a problem for your supporters in both houses to solve.

MULTICULTURALISM

STATUS OF MINORITY GROUPS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In today's Toronto Star there is an article headlined: "Minorities should be Canadians first, Tory minister says." The first paragraph of that story reads as follows:

The Progressive Conservative government's approach to multiculturalism will be a bid to persuade minorities to consider themselves Canadians first and foremost, Multiculturalism Minister Jack Murta says.

My question for the Leader of the Government is: Is it now the Mulroney government's policy and practice to insult the minorities of Canada, and we are all minorities, by suggesting that Canadians who happen to originate from minority ethnic groups do not today consider, and have not always considered, themselves to be, first and foremost, Canadians?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think the question is somewhat superfluous. I come from a province where there are many minority groups—there are no majorities in the province of Manitoba—and I have yet to find members of a minority group who do not wish to be regarded as Canadian first, no matter how proud they may be of their ethnic origin and the cultural—I almost said "baggage"—the cultural endowment that they bring with them. For the minister to state that obvious fact, I think, is hardly a criticism of any ethnic group.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—GRAIN CAR ACCESS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is in reference to a meeting he attended last Wednesday between the cabinet and the representatives of the Manitoba legislature—a meeting which, I understand, lasted for five hours.

I am rather pleased with what came out of that meeting, inasmuch as we now have assurance of the expansion of the rail line to the Port of Churchill, and the possibility of the manufacture of lighter hopper cars—hopper cars which will, I presume, be built in Manitoba. Perhaps the Leader of the Government can reassure me in that regard.

The Russians like to use the Port of Churchill, the main reason being that they save eight days by going to the Port of Churchill as opposed to Thunder Bay. On a round trip, that would be a saving of 16 days, and at an operating cost of $15,000 a day, using the Port of Churchill results in a considerable saving, all of which is beneficial to Manitoba.

My question is this: In making all of these arrangements, has any consideration been given to having an interchange of rail cars between CP and CN to allow grain originating on CPR lines access to the Port of Churchill at the normal rate?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Dealing first with the question of the grain cars used on the Churchill route, I think I am correct in saying that for many years regular box cars, as we old-timers, Senator Guay, know the term, were used on that route, though in latter years the use of box cars became quite unsatisfactory because of the instability of the line. Many difficulties arose, and the cars could not be filled to capacity.

The best suggestion that I have heard so far is that a special light hopper-type car should be developed for that route. I am happy to be able to tell my honourable friend that the Canadian National Railways has developed a hopper car designed for this particular circumstance, although it would not be restricted to that particular route. The governments of Manitoba and Canada are now holding discussions in relation to the supply of those cars so that the use of the Port of Churchill can be expanded.

As to whether or not they will be manufactured in Manitoba, I am not sure that the Manitoba rolling mills would be able to cope with such a project. I rather think it would be more than they could handle. I am not an expert, however, on the manufacture of hopper cars.

OTTAWA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—PROPOSED CHANGE OF NAME

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. My question is based upon frequently noted news reports in reference to the naming of the Ottawa International Airport, an airport which has been through a lengthy period of muck-up and disorientation. I am wondering if we can hope that among all this travail we can rejoice in the fact that this important airport will be called after one of our greatest Canadians, namely, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker.

• (1430)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh no.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I have regard to the precedents that have been established in naming airports after Canadian Prime Ministers, I think it is a very valuable suggestion.

Hon. George van Roggen: Is the Leader of the Government quite sure that the former Prime Minister would not be better honoured by the naming of an airport in Saskatoon?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe the former Prime Minister would be appreciative of anything that we can do to record the appreciation which I believe this nation holds for a man who has made a substantial contribution to Canadian progress.

Senator Argue: And he would not have castrated the Senate!

INDIAN ACT

STATUS OF WOMEN—REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, at lunchtime today the Quebec Native Women's Association held a demonstration on Parliament Hill. They are here because of their serious concerns over Bill C-31 which amends the Indian Act and which is now passing through the various stages in the other place. During the National Action Committee debate among the leaders of the three parties concerning women's issues on August 15 last, the Prime Minister committed himself to equality for Indian women. The members of the Quebec Native Women's Association, having analyzed Bill C-31, have reached the conclusion that it does not get rid of discrimination on the basis of sex. In fact, they say that discrimination against Indian women is not ended. It is simply transposed to their children.

I agree with their analysis of the bill as it now stands, and I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he will attend the press conference of the Native Women's Association at 3.30 this afternoon and give them a direct answer; and, in addition, whether he will use his influence, and that of his colleagues, to persuade the minister to change those clauses of the bill which remain objectionable, so that we can pass an amendment which will eliminate the discrimination which has been going on for far too long and which, I am sure, all of us would like to see ended.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an even better suggestion for my honourable friend concerning this difficult problem. The bill is now being pre-studied by a committee of this chamber, and I suggest that she use her influence in that committee to have whatever changes made that she considers appropriate.

NATIVE PEOPLES

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS—TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on a question asked earlier by Senator Adams concerning a "secret" report from the Deputy Prime Minister's Cabinet Task Force on Cost Cutting. I understand that the report is entitled "The Buffalo Jump of the 1980s", and I believe that anyone from western Canada will know what happened in consequence of the buffalo kills in the west. They practically caused that magnificent breed of animal to become extinct.

The report suggests a cut of $311 million from services to native people. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he can indicate the status of that document. I understand that it has not been embraced as government policy, but can he tell us whether the cabinet has seen and considered this document? Exactly what status does this document have?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if my honourable friend extends her research to examining the questions and answers given in the House of Commons, she will have more information than I am able to give her, because the matter was dealt with there rather extensively. I believe the significant fact is that the minister in charge made a statement about any changes in funding for aboriginal people. Indeed, he repeated what the Prime Minister said when he dealt with the subject in the house on April 18, namely, that there would be no policy affecting aboriginal peoples that would not be the result of open and public consultation. I believe that indicates the status of the matter.

FISHERIES

OVERFISHING BY WEST GERMAN FLEET IN WATERS UNDER CANADIAN JURISDICTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to return to an item that we dealt with on May 2, having to do with overfishing by the German fleet. At that time the Leader of the Government said it was important to establish the facts and to determine whether there had been a breach of the agreement which, as I understood it, bound West Germany to take only a certain quota.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the facts have now been established, and if there is and has been substantial overfishing by the German fleet?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the status of the matter is that all aspects of the situation have not yet been fully elucidated. But I can tell my honourable friend that the Prime Minister took the occasion, at the meeting in Bonn, to raise the matter with the German authorities, so that they are aware of the importance that we attach to it.

I believe I am correct in saying that the actual overfishing did not take place within our 200-mile economic zone. I am not sure whether that is the correct term. It took place outside that 200-mile limit and was therefore subject to the general agreement that exists between nations that fish in that international part of the ocean. So one can understand that there is some difficulty in obtaining the precise facts in the matter. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is pursuing this matter as energetically as he can.

Senator MacEachen: From what the Leader of the Government has said, there is no doubt in the mind of the government that overfishing has taken place. Presumably the fact which requires further elucidation, as the Leader of the Government has pointed out, is the question of how much overfishing has occurred. So perhaps the Leader of the Government can tell us, when the facts have come forward, exactly the extent of the overfishing. In view of the Prime Minister's representation, I would like to know whether the Chancellor of West Germany undertook to request the German fleet to cease further overfishing in that area.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we cannot jump to conclusions about the overfishing. I myself am morally certain that the charge could be sustained with respect to overfishing; but I understand that when vessels move from place to place on the high seas, it is sometimes a little difficult to establish with complete precision what took place and what the situation is. So we have to be reasonably cautious in getting our facts straight before going any further than raising the matter in a general sense with the German Chancellor. But I can tell my honourable friend that when I am able to ascertain the action that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Canadian government ultimately intend to take in this important matter, I will report to the house.

NATIVE PEOPLES

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS—RUMOURED GOVERNMENT CUTS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to those asked by Senators Adams and Fairbairn regarding reports which state that there will be severe cuts by the Canadian government in money spent on native programs. In the past, I have had an exchange with the Leader of the Government regarding this matter, particularly concerning native housing. I would like to re-emphasize the importance of native programs, and of maintaining a high level of spending to meet the many needs of native communities. We have been making progress on many fronts regarding natives in the last few years, particularly in education, housing and economic development. Those programs have cost money. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he will say to his cabinet colleagues: "Please, for gosh sakes, do not cut the level of spending on native programs." We are now making progress. It will cost more money in the future. Let us not cut off the progress that is now being made.

Senator Flynn: Very well said.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to remind my honourable friend of the attitude taken by the Government of Canada at the recent conference with provincial premiers and representatives of the aboriginal people concerning their place in our society. I believe that one can say with complete conviction that the policy of the government towards our aboriginal fellow citizens is an open one. It is a policy that seeks solutions to problems. It is not a policy that is looking to cripple progress that has been made. It is a policy which intends to bring the full weight of the federal government, insofar as that weight can be brought, to bear on the solution of the constitutional questions and all that flows from them. Of course, one of the things that flows from the Constitution is financial support of the aboriginal community and financial arrangements that will be made to enable that community to take the place it would like to take in Canadian society. I have no hesitation in saying to my honourable friend that, no matter what he reads in the newspaper, the policy of the government has not changed. We intend to do the best we can for our aboriginal fellow citizens and I will see that his particular request, because I respect the source from whence it comes, is brought to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a short supplementary question. A great deal of concern and apprehension arises in the Indian community when there are reports about statements, based upon documents which were supposedly sent to cabinet, suggesting massive cuts in spending on native programs. I ask the Leader of the Government to obtain from the Prime Minister or from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development an unequivocal statement that massive spending cuts in native programming will not take place.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid my honourable friend is asking me to do something which I decline to do. The Prime Minister and the minister responsible have made their statements. We have had the constitutional conference. I think I would be entitled to say that matters must be kept in a fluid condition and that unequivocal statements on this or any other topic are not to be expected from the government at this time.

BANKING

ALLEGED RESTRICTION ON LOANS TO AID-RECEIVING COUNTRIES

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I, too, am concerned about possible cuts in native programming. I am also concerned about another measure which, I am informed, has been taken recently by the government and which will greatly affect other disadvantaged people in the world. I refer to an instruction that, I am told, was given by the Inspector General of Banks to the banking community, that the banks must not make loans to a list of 32 countries without having full reserves for those loans. Such a restriction has the effect of making it impossible to make the loans.

Many of these 32 countries receive aid from Canada. The government has already cut back on ordinary aid and now it is saying that the banks may not lend money in those countries. This instruction has several side effects. That is why I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to confirm whether or not this instruction was given. If it is true, it is another slap at aid-receiving countries. It is discrimination against credit-worthy institutions and corporations. We know that many of the institutions and companies in some of these countries are not credit-worthy, but this action amounts to unfair discrimination against companies and institutions which are credit-worthy and there are many in those 32 countries. It is also a blow to our own export potential because the established credit-worthy customers in these countries should be entitled to buy Canadian goods and to use bank credit to buy them. Now, they are being cut off.

I ask the Leader of the Government to confirm for me whether or not that instruction has been given and, if so, to make representations to his government to modify the program so that it is, at least, selective in its application so that the restriction is directed only against those institutions and corporations which are not credit-worthy and will reserve the possibility of the banks making normal loans to credit-worthy customers.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when one reflects upon the experience of the Canadian banking community with foreign loans over the past several years, one has to be concerned about the loan-making procedures that are followed, because some of those loans have caused difficulties. However, my honourable friend has raised an entirely reasonable point in asking whether there is such a list. I do not know. I shall find out and determine whether or not the names on it have been selected with sufficient care so that only those to whom such restrictions ought to apply are indeed listed. Of course, that becomes a matter of judgment, as any banker knows. I cannot guarantee that the judgment of the Inspector General of Banks will correspond with the judgment of my honourable friend. However, he has raised a point to which I do not know the answer. I shall try to find out.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I would like to clarify one point. I appreciate that the history of a number of customers of banks in a number of these countries has been bad. The thing that I am concerned about is that this instruction whitewashes, or "blackwashes" everybody with the same brush. It is not necessary to go at it by country. It should be based on the kind of person who is borrowing. By wiping out borrowing in 32 countries, we are being so discriminatory that it will have a very bad effect on the people of those countries and perhaps on ourselves. That is why I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to obtain clarification on this matter. If, indeed, this is policy, let us try to make it selective toward bad customers, and not cover people who are entirely credit-worthy and have a history of credit-worthiness but face this discrimination because they happen to reside in a particular country.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend have with him the list that he refers to?

Senator Stanbury: I do not.

Senator Roblin: Has my honourable friend seen the list?

Senator Stanbury: No, but I am told that it will be sent to me.

Senator Roblin: So at the present time you are not working with first-hand evidence?

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Stanbury: I am working with first-hand information.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES AGAINST NICARAGUA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government with respect to the American embargo on the shipment of goods to Nicaragua, has the Government of Canada taken the view that any market in Nicaragua vacated by the United States as a result of that embargo could not or would not be filled by Canadian exports?

Senator Roblin: If a Nicaraguan customer wishes to buy from Canada we have no objection to meeting his requirements.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government clarified the situation with respect to the extent of the impact this embargo might have on Canadian re-exports by asserting that Canada would be bound by its agreement with the United States and by the Export Control List. He cited Item 9001 as the only item that would be affected by this embargo in the fulfillment of our agreement. Do I take it from that—and here I seek confirmation—that that would be the only way in which Canadian exports or re-exports destined for Nicaragua would be affected—through the Export Control List on this particular item?

Senator Roblin: I would need to examine my honourable friend's question to be perfectly sure, but the principle that I am trying to enunciate is that we intend to abide by our obligations under that Export Control List as we have done for 20 years. As to whether or not I have the right number, I will have to check.

Senator MacEachen: Presumably, however, the obligation under that agreement would exist even in the absence of an embargo placed on Nicaragua by the United States, or does Nicaragua come under the operation of the list simply because of the embargo? I think it is important to know the answer to that question if we are to examine the situation objectively. I have been attempting to obtain a copy of that export list in order to look at that item. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate has a copy of that list, perhaps he would table it in order that we can all be better informed on this matter.

Senator Roblin: My impression is that the Export Control List is a list of general application and that the imposition of the United States embargo upon Nicaragua did not trigger it. However, I cannot be sure that I am right on that, and I shall inquire.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the preceding exchange relates to a question that I asked yesterday of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to which I thought I received a clear answer. It is my understanding from my honourable friend's answer at that time that, beyond the embargo there would be no enforcement of extraterritorial effect; that is, that it would not go beyond our obligation under that agreement.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend and I see eye to eye on the matter.

MULTICULTURALISM

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR OBSERVER STATUS FOR INTERESTED PARTIES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism has organized a federal-provincial conference on multiculturalism which is to take place in Winnipeg on May 14, 1985. I understand that this conference will be held in camera. There are a number of people who would like to participate in this conference as observers, and I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate could prevail upon his colleague in the other place to grant observer status to those people who are interested in following this very important subject, on the premise that there could not be anything secret about a federal-provincial conference on multiculturalism. I could understand it if the conference were on the economy, or financial matters or on anything that might affect the stock market which could give advantages to certain people who might not otherwise have such advantages. However, to have observer status at a conference on multiculturalism surely not lead to any negative repercussions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not know whether it would affect the outcome of the conference or not, but the meeting to which you refer is an inter-governmental meeting at which ministers will represent their multicultural interests.

Senator Bosa: Will the honourable gentleman, then, not even discuss the matter with his colleague in the other place?

Senator Roblin: I do not think so, because the pattern with respect to ministerial meetings has been set for many years. These are meetings which observers are not usually expected to attend; they are held to give the opportunity for executive discussion between the ministers responsible.

PIONEER TRUST PAYMENT CONTINUATION BILL

SPEAKER'S RULING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-50, intitled: "An Act to provide for the continuation of payments under certain guaranteed income averaging certificates issued by the Pioneer Trust Company".—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we proceed with debate on second reading of this bill, I would like to read to the Senate a ruling on this matter which has been prepared by the officials of the Senate:

[Translation]

Yesterday the Speaker was asked to rule on the following question:

Can a bill that is being debated at the second reading stage be referred to a committee?

If I had to answer simply yes or no to the question as it stands, I would have to answer no. However, I believe the question warrants further clarification. The entire bill cannot be referred to a committee before it has been given second reading. However, the same cannot be said on the principle of the bill or of the discussion that I would term philosophical regarding the subject matter of the bill.

I refer you to paragraph 740 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition which reads as follows:

"There are three types of amendments that may be proposed at the second reading stage of a bill. These are:

1. the six months' hoist;
2. the reasoned amendment;
3. the referral of the subject matter to a committee.

Paragraph 746 of the same edition is even more explicit:

746(1) An amendment, urging a committee to consider the subject matter of a bill, might be moved and carried if the House were adverse to giving the bill itself a second reading and so conceding its principle. But where further information is desired in direct relation to the terms of the bill before the House, the advantage of referring the bill to a committee could be explained in the second reading stage.

Be that as it may, according to Beauchesne and the precedents of this House that I will call to mind, referral to a committee is provided for in the rules.

As for our precedents, we note in the Journals of the Senate, 1982, pages 2545 and 2546, that during the debate on second reading of Bill S-31, the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., moved that the said bill not be adopted in second reading and that its subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The amendment passed and the subject matter of the bill was duly referred to the committee.

A similar precedent arose from the debate at the second reading stage of Bill C-201. I refer you to page 2477 of the Journals of the Senate, 1982.

In conclusion, I submit to you that from a purely procedural standpoint, at this particular stage, an amendment to the initial motion to refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee may be proposed.

[English]

SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday, a great many questions were left unanswered, and I now ask leave of the Senate to take this opportunity to answer some of the questions raised by honourable senators on the other side, following which I would be prepared to cede the floor to Honourable Senator Argue.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Barootes, you will have the opportunity of rebuttal after Senator Argue and other senators have spoken on second reading of this bill. If at that time you wish to rebut any statements that have been made, that will then be your privilege.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I listened with a great deal of attention to the ruling of the Speaker. As I understand it, a motion at second reading would be in words such as these: "That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce." I understand that in parliamentary procedure that is considered to be a negative motion. However, I do not wish to engender debate on that. In any event, I think it would be a type of delaying tactic, perhaps, and no one around here really wants to see such a tactic used. Of course, the question of referring the bill itself to committee after it has passed second reading means that its principle has the stamp of approval of the Senate, and that is another matter.

As I said yesterday, I am certainly pleased to have this bill before us and to have the information that Senator Barootes was able to bring to the Senate at that time. In response to a question of mine, I was most pleased to learn from him—and I know he will correct me if my interpretation is in error—that everyone, with the exception of a few who may be considered not to have been dealing at arm's length—will receive what was owing to them as of February 5, 1985 without any payment of interest since that date.

Certainly, when we learned that Pioneer Trust was in a state of collapse, my own position here was that action should be taken to protect the depositors. Having taken that position, then it is only reasonable that this bill should receive my support. I am pleased that the bill is now before us for second reading.

I do think, however, that errors were made in that if provincial authorities, federal authorities and authorities from Pioneer Trust had been able to get together months earlier, Parliament, the government and Pioneer Trust would have been successful in saving this company so that it could continue its operations, just as timely action was successful in enabling the Canadian Commercial Bank to remain viable and in operation.

So, from the standpoint of a citizen of the province of Saskatchewan, I think this is second best, but it is certainly better than having all of those people suffer losses.

I do think, however, that there is a large discrepancy in the policy applied to and in the action taken in relation to Canadian citizens by the Government of Canada, and by provincial governments. It seems that if a large corporation is in trouble, there is a disposition on the part of governments to take action to save such a corporation. If an individual farmer is in trouble, or a filling station operator, or a corner store operator, or an independent businessman—and I place farmers in that last category—there is not the same kind of disposition to ensure total recovery or to keep them in business. So, I think there is a major gap in policy on that question.

I believe that what is required for farmers is also required for independent business people; that is, the opportunity to appear before some kind of tribunal that is vested with substantial legal powers to deal with the circumstances of a particular debtor so an attempt may be made to arrange a settlement of the debtor's obligations in order that the debtor may continue in business.

It seems to me that many bankruptcies are futile in that the person who is placed in bankruptcy is out of business and no longer functioning and creditors often have to take a small return on their investment. Creditors usually lose a major portion of their investments. I think we should give more consideration to this aspect so that arrangements can be made to allow an individual to, at least, meet a major portion of his obligations. I believe that that would help the small business community of Canada as well as the agricultural producers of Canada.

Whether or not this bill is referred to committee will be decided by the Senate. However, I feel that there is room for serious consideration of the question as to how a policy can be developed for individuals which will really reflect the truth of the saying that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I say that because the little guy out there thinks that there is one law for banks and trust companies in trouble and another set of laws—and a lack of consideration—for independent operators in trouble.

This may or may not be the right time to conduct a major inquiry into that subject, but I think the time has come for us to look at a broader range of policies. I am pleased that the bill is before the Senate; I hope it will be passed, and that those people who have had investments deposited with Pioneer Trust will receive a payout without loss.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, some of the questions posed to me yesterday remain in doubt. I think the questions raised by Senator Argue could be better answered now.

I have done some additional research. The first question posed yesterday by Senator Everett was: "Did Pioneer Trust pay higher interest rates than other companies?" As far as my research is concerned, and as far as the Department of Insurance is aware, Pioneer Trust did not pay interest rates that were significantly higher than rates other trust companies of similar size paid. In general, smaller and medium-sized trust companies must pay slightly higher rates than the large trust companies in order to attract business. During the last six months of Pioneer Trust's operations, there was a limitation on its licence that required it to offer rates somewhat lower than the average rate of the three largest trust companies in Canada.

The second question which was raised, and which was quite pertinent, was: "What was the cause of Pioneer Trust's problems?" That question was raised by several honourable senators who spoke yesterday.

I want to put it on record that Pioneer Trust encountered financial difficulties mainly because of the significant downturn in the value of western real estate and because of the economic recession which began in 1980. I underline the year 1980, and you will see why later.

As a result of a combination of those circumstances, a high proportion of Pioneer Trust's mortgage portfolio was in arrears. That had two major impacts on the company's financial position: First of all, the fact that a significant portion of Pioneer's assets were not producing any income resulted in an operating loss; secondly, the decline in value of the properties securing the mortgages necessitated the establishment of significant reserves to write down their value to the value of the properties securing the mortgages.

In addition, within the limits authorized in the legislation, Pioneer Trust had become involved in the real estate development business. With the downturn of the real estate market, a number of real estate developments also had to be written down in value. The operating losses, combined with the necessity to establish reserves in respect of mortgages in arrears and properties under development, had a very negative impact on the company's capital and surplus position, and it was no longer in a position to comply with its authorized borrowing ratio.

In the circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of the Trust Companies Act, the Superintendent of Insurance filed a formal report with the previous Minister of Finance on May 10, 1984. The company's representations on that report were made to the minister at a hearing on June 4, 1984. After full consideration of this matter, the minister directed that on August 1, 1984, the company's licence under the Trust Companies Act be renewed until December 31, 1984, with three limitations: The first limitation required reduction in the company's leverage ratio—that is, the amount of capital against which it could borrow—from 20 times its capital to 17 times its capital base by December 31, 1984. I am told that that had risen to a ratio of approximately 25; the second limitation restricted the company's investments to high-quality liquid assets; the third limitation restricted the interest rates offered by the company on its deposit instruments.

By November 1, 1984, it became clear that Pioneer Trust would not be able to comply with the borrowing ratio restriction imposed upon it unless a substantial amount of new equity capital was placed in the company. Officials of the Department of Insurance pressed the president of Pioneer Trust on this matter in mid November and again at the end of November. By November 21, the officials had been informed that the parent company, Canadian Pioneer Management Limited, planned to arrange for an issue to the public of some $25 million of preferred shares that would be guaranteed by the Government of Saskatchewan.

Prior to December 31 the company's licence was therefore renewed for one further month until January 31, pending further developments in this new underwriting. They awaited confirmation from the government authorities in Saskatchewan intending to proceed with this guarantee. The company's licence was again renewed under similar circumstances, therefore, for one month ending January 31, 1985.

On February 7 of this year, as we have heard, following an in-depth financial analysis of the Pioneer Trust situation, the Government of Saskatchewan decided that it would not proceed with that guarantee on the underwriting, and thereby came the Anschluss.

Honourable senators, permit me also to deal with a few of the whirlwind statements made by my dear friend and fellow provincial senator, the Honourable Davie Steuart. Davie and I have been friends for many, many years and we do have a little fun with each other, so I hope you will bear with me as I try to get even for the very lovely remarks he made yesterday.

Senator Steuart: Be careful you don't get even worse.

Senator Barootes: Senator Steuart has a very convenient memory and one that has specific facts that it can store away for his own convenience. He has suggested cynically, this "senior senator from Arizona," that Pioneer Trust entered the big leagues in 1982. He implies that thereby came its downfall marking 1982 as the period when the government changed in Saskatchewan. In fact, I must point out that Pioneer made its major assets gains and its investment decisions, which may have led to its troubles, much prior to 1982 and long before the Tories took office. In fact, I must tell you that Pioneer was encouraged and founded in the time of the Liberal administration of which Senator Steuart was not only deputy premier but also financial minister at the time.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame! Shame!

Senator Barootes: Secondly, the founder and chief executive officer was, and remains, a very strong Liberal who allowed his name to stand for nomination as a Liberal in the provincial seat of Regina South.

Senator Steuart: Who was that?

Senator Barootes: Mr. Sneath.

Senator Steuart: Born again Tory later on.

Senator Barootes: He saw the light, David. Unfortunately, he lost the nomination but he would have made a good MLA, in my opinion, because he always believed in a free enterprise environment. The president and present CEO worked in a high position in the provincial administration of the Liberal Party under Ross Thatcher and Senator Steuart.

Senator Steuart: We let him go. We let him join the Tories.

Senator Barootes: The founding vice-president of that organization—would you like to take notes?

Senator Steuart: I don't need notes. I know it by heart.

Senator Barootes: The founding vice-president was a life-long Liberal whose father had been the former Liberal premier of Saskatchewan. Honourable senators, in fact, I must tell you that the entire board of directors of Pioneer was composed of good, solid, sound and successful Liberal businessmen whom I admired.

Senator Steuart: That is the only kind there are!

Senator Frith: "Good" and "sound" always goes with "Liberal."

Senator Barootes: You are taking notes.

Success and failure in business is not a reflection nor a function of the political beliefs of a man or a woman.

Senator Steuart: Do you believe that?

Senator Barootes: We have all seen business people in every party who have been highly successful and others who have been dismal failures. In fact, we have some of those highly successful businessmen of several parties dwelling with us in this hallowed chamber.

Senator Steuart: Don't apologize for that.

Senator Barootes: To suggest, as did my honourable friend from Prince Albert, that the failure of Pioneer Trust was in any way related to the past or present political convictions of its managerial group, is not only irrelevant but it is also unfounded and misleading, as I have pointed out to you. In fact, I think that hindsight will show that all the bad investment decisions, or many of them, that led to the downfall of this company were made in those dizzy champagne days before the Progressive Conservatives took office; in other words, in the late 1970s and very early 1980s.

To plagiarize and coin a phrase which I have heard before, I also find it more than passing strange that the honourable senator thinks that athletes, jocks and football players in any business organization are frequently responsible for its failures. He attributes this in his speech yesterday to the Pioneer management group. I do not know what the honourable senator has against athletes in business, because it seems to me that a couple of his own partners who have helped make him very successful in business happen to be great athletes. He is knocking himself. I point out to you that Mr. Jack Kemp, the great Congressman in the United States, was a quarterback, and a good one. We have nothing to say against that great all-American quarterback Whizzer White who now sits in the Supreme Court of the United States. So, I do not think that politics or athletics have anything do with success or failure in these businesses.

Senator Steuart: You should have told that to Devine.

Senator Barootes: Surely, you do not wish to denigrate business people who want to enter politics or politicians who want to enter into business.

I also found some other things more than passing strange. I know that Senator Steuart has always found it slightly offensive, if not troublesome to his political psyche, whenever he hears of a Grit who has changed to some other party and it never seems to leave the poor senator's head. It just keeps eating and gnawing in there.

I have some other questions that I should like to bring to your attention, questions which I would like to answer. I think Senator Argue was absolutely correct in the interpretation that he made that there will be restitution made at 100 per cent to all except those who had a non-arm's length relationship to the company.

There were some other questions raised. One was: "Does the action on the part of the federal government to compensate the IAAC holders not imply that in the future all depositors in trust companies that fail will be compensated for any losses that they incur beyond the limits provided by the deposit insurance which is presently at $60,000?" I think it was Senator Everett who raised that point. Indeed, this is not true—not at all. As was indicated, the federal government participation in the compensation scheme is limited in two ways. First of all, it applies only to a select group, the IAAC holders whose contracts extend beyond five years. Secondly, it is limited, as far as the federal government is concerned, to the $60,000 current limit under the deposit insurance scheme.

As I indicated yesterday, it is going to require documentation that the IAAC holders received which gave them reason to believe that they had been previously insured through the stamp and the line that appeared on their contracts "member of the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation."

• (1520)

In recognition of this fact, a compassionate minister and a compassionate administration, realizing many of the people affected are older people who have invested perhaps all or a good portion of the moneys received from the sale of their home, or their farm, or their business into these certificates—decided to put these IAAC holders in the position that they originally believed themselves to be in, giving them a continuation of their compensation.

If the contract is for an amount in excess of $60,000, the provincial government will pick up the balance of the compensation payable to certificate holders.

There is one other point, honourable senators, that I should like to make. Senator Everett pointed out that he did not wish to see a precedent established whereby we would assist all failures and all people. Indeed, we are not establishing such a precedent. But if a precedent has ever been established in this regard, it was a precedent established by former administrations and former governments. I bring to the attention of honourable senators that this has occurred not three, but four, five or six times in Ontario, where depositors in trust companies have been assisted beyond the $20,000 or $60,000 of coverage that then existed. Indeed, it has occurred in Manitoba with Fidelity Trust and is occurring in Alberta, not only with the bank mentioned by Senator Argue, but with the Fidelity Trust.

So, we are not establishing a precedent through Bill C-50; we are limiting what is being done. It is the Government of Saskatchewan that is undertaking the total payment beyond the limit of $60,000 and this is perhaps what led to the misunderstanding on the part of the contract-holders of the IAACs.

Finally, may I bring to your attention the fact that there is some urgency in respect of the passage of this legislation. As Senator Argue has said, we are trying to protect the small and individual operator. Indeed, we are. We are doing so through Bill C-50 in this instance specifically. If you will bear with me for a moment, I should like to point out to you that the Minister of State (Finance) is making provision for protection well beyond that which is set out in this bill.

Senator Argue asked what the government is going to do to ensure that trust companies do not fail in the future; to ensure that, when they are wound up, there is no damage to the small depositor.

As was indicated yesterday, the minister has appointed a private sector committee to look into all aspects of the CDIC legislation and its operation. The minister expects to be in a position to table the report thereon in Parliament within a month.

Three weeks ago the minister released a discussion paper entitled: "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion."

One of the most important principles upon which the proposals in that discussion paper is based is improved protection for the consumer. The minister, who was engaged in financial institutions prior to her election to Parliament, has spoken eloquently on this. One of the objectives of her ministry is to ensure that this is achieved.

The government is committed to the principle of protection of the consumer. The discussion paper puts forward a number of proposals intended to improve protection of the consumer, including increased supervisory powers for the legislators and for the regulators.

The minister has asked for comments and suggestions on her proposals and has indicated that she is anxious to proceed with a complete revision of the legislation relating to financial institutions as quickly as possible. In fact, she has invited the four pillars of the financial community—the banks, the trust companies, the insurance companies, and the investment companies—to make representations.

That, honourable senators, will give us the opportunity in the future to examine all aspects of financial institutions in this country—protection, deposit insurance, and so on. We will have a good "go" at it then.

I repeat that this is a matter of some considerable urgency to those depositors who are at risk, some of whom have been waiting for annuity payments for three months. I pray that honourable senators will today decide to proceed expeditiously with the passage of Bill C-50.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by—

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, before Senator Barootes resumes his seat—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Are you asking a question? The debate is closed. Are you asking a question?

Senator Argue: If I have permission.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Argue be permitted to ask a question?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Argue: As we used to say in the other place, "Before the honourable member resumes his seat..." That was a way to slip in a question, at the discretion of the Speaker.

I appreciate what Senator Barootes has said about the minister's concern for individuals and the fact that the action that is taken in this case protects the small depositor. I also appreciate what he has said about the government's concern about the consumer and the inquiry in that regard.

I do not really think he answered my proposition that there should be a particular action or a particular investigation of how laws might be applied for the protection and assistance of farmers who are in trouble and independent business people who are in trouble.

That seems to be an area that has not had the same degree of attention as have other areas. It is my view that there is a gap and that that gap ought to be given attention. There should be improved rules to deal with the financial problems of farmers and other independent business people.

Senator Godfrey: That was a statement, not a question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill.

I take it that the sponsor of the bill does not propose, following second reading, to recommend that the bill be referred to committee before receiving third reading.

I appreciate that there is no requirement on the part of the sponsor of a bill to indicate in advance whether or not it is proposed that the bill be referred to committee, but normally there is some indication in that regard before the motion for second reading is put.

Do I take it that Senator Barootes does not propose to move that the bill be referred to committee?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If I may speak to the point, my understanding is that we take the vote on the motion for second reading, and once that is done the Speaker then puts the question: "When shall the bill be read the third time?" It is at that stage that we normally indicate what we think the fate of the bill should be in terms of whether or not it should go to committee or be dealt with in another way.

Senator Frith: But we do normally signal beforehand whether or not it is the intention to move that there be referral to a committee.

Senator Roblin: I have no hesitation in dealing with the point now, because I think it should be clarified.

My personal opinion is that the sponsor of the bill has dealt thoroughly with the various questions raised yesterday, questions which prompted the feeling on the part of some at that time that the bill should go to committee. Apart from the interesting exposé on the political history of Saskatchewan—which is a matter I leave to be settled between the two gentlemen who are interested in that topic—it seems to me that the rest of the material in the bill has been fairly adequately dealt with.

The government does hope that the bill can receive third reading tomorrow; however, if the decided view is that it should go to committee, then I think we would have to respect the desires of the Senate in that regard. I merely say that, in my opinion—and I hope I have some support on the other side—this bill could be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow, with the committee stage being skipped.

The reason for taking that route is quite clear, that being that we want to get this matter wound up so that those concerned can have the certainty they are looking for and start getting their money. It is a very simple human problem.

We in the Senate, through our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, are now seized with the whole issue of trust company management and regulation, with the result that there is ample opportunity to pursue those important matters in another forum.

It seems to me that we could agree to have those discussions in the committee that is now seized with this question, thereby allowing us to forgo committee consideration of this bill, with third reading being given to the bill tomorrow.

I would like my honourable friend to tell me how he reacts to that proposition.

• (1530)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my question was one of seeking information and had no rhetorical element in it. Our intention would be to follow the recommendation of those on our side who have spoken to the bill. In effect, Senator Roblin has said that it is not their intention to follow that procedure, and he gave me an answer as to why, which has clarified the question. As far as I know, the recommendation from our spokesman will be that the bill not go to committee. If that is so, then we shall proceed as Senator Roblin has suggested.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I wonder whether I might have Senator Barootes' comment on the question I raised; namely, whether further inquiries will be made with reference to the agricultural community and the small business community. Senator Barootes has impressed the Senate with his knowledge on a number of questions. I imagine that he carries a good deal of weight in his caucus and that he would be helpful on this question. I think it would be most useful to hear his views.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I am not an expert on legislation or government policy.

Senator Roblin: You will be.

Senator Frith: Stick around.

Senator Barootes: My newness in this honoured chamber has not permitted me to master all these things. However, I shall make a few personal remarks that I think will be of comfort to all of us who come from the Prairie provinces and to those who are engaged in small business.

Indeed, farmers in Canada at this time are in a singularly difficult position, as my honourable friend knows, perhaps better than most of us. Small business is one of the engines that drives employment in this country. I understand that about 80 per cent of new employment is engendered by small business. Former administrations, the present administration and many provincial administrations across the length and breadth of this country have undertaken to enact certain provisions to help. I do not think that it lies with one administration or one group to provide all the answers. I believe it requires the co-ordination of private institutions, governments at all three levels and a very deep understanding of the problems that small businesses and farmers are encountering at the present time. I feel that that is the kind of approach that should be taken, is being taken now and, by and large, has been taken in this country in the past, although we have not always been successful.

With respect to our agricultural industry in particular, about which I know Senator Argue is most concerned, there are numerous measures presently being undertaken. Some of them originate in the other place and some of them originate in the provinces. They all attempt to ameliorate the difficulties the agricultural community is experiencing in the cost-price squeeze of their produce and products. That is about as far as I can go on this matter without getting myself into a situation where, indeed, I would be answering specifics on which I have no knowledge.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I wonder if the honourable senator would mind answering a question or two. I almost hesitate to ask him, but his sanctimonious deliberations of the past few minutes have stirred me beyond belief.

Senator Barootes: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order.

Senator Steuart: Will the honourable senator answer a question?

Senator Barootes: By all means.

Senator Steuart: You should have said "By any means."

Senator Frith: If this is the way friends behave in Saskatchewan, what is it like for enemies?

Senator Steuart: The honourable senator has described me as the "senior senator from Arizona" and described how I have forgotten all the members of Pioneer Trust who were Liberals in their day and how the company began under a Liberal regime. Yes, we did start that company. However, I wonder if he has forgotten his own record or his own career when he was a great supporter of the Thatcher Liberal government for two elections. Then, he decided that they were too left-wing for him. Can honourable senators imagine the Thatcher Government being too left-wing for anybody? We made Barry Goldwater look like a Socialist.

I wonder if the honourable senator remembers that while Pioneer Trust began under us and blossomed under us, when it got into trouble and into serious financial difficulty and went overboard, it was at the behest and encouragement of the Conservative government under Premier Devine, of whom the honourable senator is a strong supporter. That is when the company really got into trouble.

I would ask the honourable senator if what I have just said is true. If he says it is not true, I shall not be able to vouch for his veracity or how honest he is in this matter. It was only in the last two years that the company got into trouble, that the cover-up began, that the company ended in bankruptcy and that all these people whom we are now trying to bail out were faced with difficulty. I agree that these people should be bailed out and that the bill should be passed quickly. However, I wonder whether the honourable senator is not trying to fudge the whole thing with his excellent speech.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the debate on the motion for second reading has been closed now for some time. Senator Steuart has had his revenge and, if I may, I shall put the question.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED "EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, pursuant to notice of May 1, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", tabled at the First Ministers'

Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985 and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, on bringing forth this motion that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, I felt we could take up the invitation of the Minister of Employment and Immigration to consider the actions and approaches to training needed to prepare workers for a change in the labour market. At this time of high unemployment I think the question of retraining and full employment deserves the interest of all Canadians.

• (1540)

It is a time when the unemployment rate is over 10 per cent of our workforce.

It is a time when those receiving welfare or social assistance is over 10 per cent of the population.

It is a time when many of our students are leaving high schools, colleges and universities with no jobs to go to.

It is a time when many of our young women have no employment and no means of support.

It is a time when many of our women who are the head of one-parent families have no security in our society.

It is a time when many of our native people are unemployed.

It is a time when many of our disabled are unemployed.

It is a time when technology is changing rapidly in the workplace.

It is a time when Canada needs to be more competitive in world trade.

All this is happening when the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration are considering changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations with respect to the unemployed.

I believe that Canadians want to work. However, many Canadians have not been provided with the skills needed to compete successfully in the labour market of 1985. Canadians must be given every opportunity to participate fully in the labour market in order to have a strong and competitive economy.

It is my belief that we should take a serious look at vocational schools, training schools and universities, and put more emphasis on training for the workplace.

I believe that the university engineering programs should put more emphasis on manufacturing engineering. The schools and colleges should put more emphasis on training people in trades so that they can walk into jobs when they leave training schools.

I further believe that in 1985 we should be teaching computer science in training schools, colleges and universities as we taught reading, writing and arithmetic in the early part of the century.

I further believe that education and training are important factors in achieving job security and international competitiveness.

Canadians are deeply concerned about the effect of unemployment on young people. There is much concern about how well young people are prepared for the challenges of the changing labour market.

We in the Senate have shown leadership in this field by setting up the Special Senate Committee on Youth, which is looking into the many problems of youth, training, employment, skills and education. More effort must be made to find ways to help our young people make a successful transition from the schools, colleges and universities into the workforce.

There also needs to be a special program designed to help women to enter the workforce, especially when one realizes the number of one-parent families, many of which have women as the head of the household and who, today, are living in poverty with no opportunity to find employment to support themselves and their families.

I believe that the committee can do some good work looking into options and can make recommendations to the Government of Canada as to how best our young people can be better trained for full employment, as well as our women, handicapped, natives and others who are just unable to find employment.

We might look at such things as what kinds of arrangements can be made under the Canada Assistance Plan to best support a co-ordinated nation-wide skill—development strategy.

We might be able to make recommendations on how the unemployment insurance system can best be used to promote training and prepare the unemployed to find jobs.

We might be able to make recommendations on how the government might work with private enterprise to support on-the-job training and practical job experience so that young people can get their first jobs and gain some experience for the future.

We might be able to recommend that military training could provide practical experience as well as a more formal skill development that will be of value to many unemployed people, especially young people.

I believe it is worthwhile that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology take up the challenge with the minister and look into the training program and employment opportunities made available by the Government of Canada to prepare Canadians for the future. I would ask your support for the motion that these documents, papers and other related matters be brought before the committee for study and recommendation.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST NICARAGUA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government and I have had exchanges about the Nicaraguan embargo and extraterritoriality. I should like to add some additional certainty to the record in respect of that matter.

I see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, when asked about the U.S. Treasury Department's statement to the effect that it would monitor Canadian subsidiaries and affiliates of U.S. companies to ensure that they are not being used by their parent companies to re-route goods to circumvent the U.S. trade embargo against Nicaragua—which indicates that the United States does intend to attempt to have some extraterritorial effect to its embargo—has stated:

—if that is the case, the Canadian Government will be monitoring the U.S. companies to ensure they do not interfere with Canadian exports.

I just want to put on the record that I do not think the Leader of the Government in the Senate need pursue any outstanding replies for me on that subject because I think that that is a satisfactory position for the government to take.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for providing me with a list of women who have been appointed to government positions by Order in Council. I very much appreciate receiving it. I also note that today two more appointments have been made to the Economic Council of Canada. Both are good appointments.

The list provided by the leader has 23 women on it; the list provided by Mr. Boudria, of which I spoke yesterday, has 85 women on it. That puzzles me, so I wonder if the leader could clarify that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend has received a document I have not had an opportunity to see myself. As a rule, I scrutinize replies before they are released, to make sure that they are appropriate to the questions asked. I must admit that I have not seen that reply, but I will make a special point of seeing it and perhaps I can deal with it later.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES

NON-COMPLIANCE BY MINISTER WITH ACT

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On April 24 last reports were tabled in the Senate on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the months of September, October and November 1984 pursuant to section 16 of the act, chapter R-3, R.S.C. 1970, sessional paper No. 331-352.

Section 16 of the act requires, first, that a report be laid before Parliament at least once a month when the houses are sitting; and, second, that when the houses are not sitting a report be made within the first five days that Parliament is sitting.

Before April 24, reports were tabled in the Senate under section 16 of the act on November 27, 1984, when reports for the months of April, May, June, July and August were tabled by the Leader of the Government. The government has not respected the requirements of the Regional Development Incentives Act in that the minister has not submitted a report for the months of December 1984 and January, February and March of 1985.

My question to the government leader is: Would he please ask the minister why he is not obeying the law?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That is a fair question. I will ascertain what the law is and then I will investigate the complaint.

Those who prepare these reports have not been replaced, so they ought to know what they are doing, and if there was an oversight, I will bring it to the minister's notice.

PIONEER TRUST PAYMENT CONTINUATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the third reading of Bill C-50, to provide for the continuation of payments under certain guaranteed income averaging certificates issued by the Pioneer Trust Company.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I had not contemplated entering this debate on third reading because I was convinced that Senator Barootes had covered most of the bases, including the political ones, in an excellent manner. However, last evening I watched the CBC program called The Fifth Estate and it dealt with the collapse of Pioneer Trust. The program was a devastating indictment of the management of Pioneer Trust. As well, it indicated that the actions of the Saskatchewan government in the final days of Pioneer Trust were of a very questionable nature. The host of the CBC program was Eric Malling, a former newsman from Saskatchewan. I mention this because he has an excellent background in that province, and I am convinced that his reporting was fair and accurate.

[Senator Roblin.]

In developing this exposé on Pioneer Trust, Mr. Malling interviewed, among others: Rod Sykes, a former member of the board of directors of Pioneer Trust and an acknowledged expert in the real estate business; the Honourable Robert Andrews, the Saskatchewan Minister of Finance; the Honourable Allan Blakeney, Leader of the Opposition in the Saskatchewan legislature; the manager of the Pioneer Trust branch in Estevan and one of the members of the board of directors.

The story that these people told was one of unbelievably bad management, reckless investments, insider dealings, unsecured loans to management at low interest rates and extravagant spending by management. In fact, the manner in which Pioneer Trust handled the funds entrusted to them by the ordinary people of Saskatchewan could be called criminally negligent. For example, according to this report Mr. Will Klein, the president of Pioneer Trust, borrowed money from the company at low interest rates to make personal investments and to buy an expensive home in Scottsdale, Arizona. Other members of management were also given special deals and special loans by the company. The company's jet aircraft was used to fly management and directors all over western Canada and into the United States, sometimes for business and sometimes for pleasure. Their investment policies in land, real estate and the oil business were so bad and so careless that they drove Rod Sykes and, before him, Dr. Martin to resign from the board of directors in protest. This was common knowledge around Regina before the collapse of Pioneer Trust, and yet the Government of Saskatchewan was either ignorant of the true situation or chose to ignore it when the Minister of Finance gave Pioneer Trust a letter of guarantee. It is true that he later withdrew the guarantee, but a great deal of damage had already been done. Last night on the television program he admitted that he should not have given them the letter, and he said that he was surprised when they made it public and used it to prop up their sagging reputation.

Another serious question that was raised but not answered in a satisfactory manner concerned the firing of Mr. Ken Stephenson, the chairman of the Saskatchewan Securities Commission, in November 1983. This man came to Saskatchewan from British Columbia where he was the assistant to the chairman of the Securities Commission in that province. I am told that he is highly respected and totally uncommitted politically.

• (1410)

Sometime in the fall of 1983 he carried out an audit of Pioneer Trust and, as a result, scheduled a hearing to look into the operations of that company. Nine days later he was dismissed by the Government of Saskatchewan. The word around Regina was that the management of Pioneer Trust used their political clout—and make no mistake, it was powerful—and had him fired. The government denies this, but the suspicion lingers on.

Senator Roblin: Which government?

Senator Frith: The Government of Saskatchewan.

Senator Roblin: He should say that.

Senator Steuart: The matter should be looked into and it should be cleared up one way or another.

Honourable senators, the politics of this unfortunate affair is the least important aspect, and I am sure, will be dealt with by the people of Saskatchewan.

The serious question that should and must concern both the federal and the provincial governments, is what to do about this mess so that such a situation will not arise again and to ensure that if there has been any wrongdoing, it will not go unpunished.

I am pleased to hear that the honourable Barbara McDougall has set up an independent, outside committee to look into the CDIC Act and into the operations of trust companies in general across this country. As well, the Leader of the Government in this house, the honourable Duff Roblin, has assured the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will study the whole issue of trust company management. Both these actions are long overdue and are most welcome.

In the meantime, people in the top management of Pioneer Trust, who have been accused of the most outrageous mismanagement of funds entrusted to their care by the people of Saskatchewan and others, have dumped the whole mess on the Saskatchewan and Canadian taxpayers and are, apparently, still holding on to some of the money that they made through this whole operation. I feel that not only should they be brought to account but so should the directors, who have been alerted to the situation by the resignation of Rod Sykes and others.

I am told—and I am sure it is correct—that officials of Pioneer Trust still own the profitable insurance company. I am told that they still hold shares in it and that they still have their jobs. I understand Mr. Klein still owns his home in Arizona yet, at the same time, the taxpayers are stuck with millions of dollars of debt.

Senator Frith: And the trust company was a wholly owned subsidiary.

Senator Steuart: It was a wholly owned subsidiary of the insurance company. They have dumped the debt on to the taxpayers who are picking up the load.

I do not think it is good enough. This government and the Saskatchewan government should immediately launch a public inquiry into every aspect of the handling of Pioneer Trust. If the management is only guilty of bad judgment, then they have probably suffered enough and paid enough by way of public embarrassment and financial loss. If they are guilty of more than bad management, then I think they must be brought to account.

Honourable senators, I support this bill. I hope it passes so that the innocent victims of the Pioneer Trust collapse will not suffer. However, I also hope, and feel very strongly, that we must and should have learned a lesson out of this and that we will take steps to see that if people are guilty they are brought to justice. We must do all we can to ensure that something like this, which has happened too often in Canada's history, does not happen again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE SENATE

OFFICE OF SPEAKER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Riel, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to his tenure as Speaker of the Senate, his experiences and his recommendations to the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Riel, P.C.).

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I rise to deliver another instalment of my report to the Senate on my term as Speaker of the Senate. In speaking on this subject on April 23 last, I mentioned the three main points which I am drawing to your attention in these remarks, those being the usefulness, the credibility and the integrity of the Senate. These are attributes which, to my mind, require the immediate and serious attention of the Senate.

With or without powers clipped or reduced, or changed, or even enlarged, the Senate has to demonstrate its usefulness, protect its integrity, and improve its credibility in the country.

In speaking of usefulness, I put before honourable senators a series of tasks that have to be performed by honourable senators. The questions always in the minds of the public are: A Senate, for what? And senators to do what?

I asked honourable senators to help me, in a non-partisan way, to compile a list of the duties and a comprehensive outline of the contributions of senators. Now, two weeks later, I can tell you that my invitation has been greeted with unanimous silence. I have not received one response—which, I believe, is at least good for my humility.

As far as the integrity of the Senate is concerned, I have given honourable senators my reaction vis-à-vis some encroachments that are committed in the joint administration of certain services of Parliament and in the exercising of the joint authority of the two Speakers in relation to certain parts of the parliament buildings, in particular the Rotunda, the Library, the Memorial Chamber, the Peace Tower, and the Parliamentary Restaurant.

The Senate cannot command respect if it does not exercise its authority and privileges. It is as simple as that. It is the immediate duty of the Senate and all honourable senators to do so. We have to care about the powers and privileges of the Senate. Otherwise, we will not succeed in keeping our status, prestige and moral authority.

The first thing to do is to put our own house in order. When I was appointed Speaker of the Senate, I asked my predecessor to provide me with the chain of command in the administration of the Senate, and the reply was that there was none. I thought it was a bon mot, but I came to realize that it was almost true.

I asked the Clerk the same question and I was provided with organigrams, or organization charts, depicting the place of everyone in the chain of command, with the Clerk of the Senate being the central point in the administration of the Senate. According to those organization charts, the Clerk of the Senate had to answer to two entities, the Speaker of the Senate and the Internal Economy Committee.

The Clerk was complaining bitterly that he was being by-passed and was unable to play his role as the chief of staff, under the Speaker and the Internal Economy Committee.

It was a pity that the then Speaker of the Senate had been refused the chairmanship of the Internal Economy Committee. Had that appointment been made, there would have been created a chain of command in a straight line from the Speaker and the committee down the line through the Clerk. As can be seen from the organization charts, the bottom line is the barber. While it was all on paper, nothing was done in practice.

On making inquiries of the Law Clerk as to the authority of the Speaker in the area of administration, I discovered that it was considered to be a most difficult question. However, I believe it was not so much a difficult question as a dreaded one. I realized over the months that followed that time did not allow the Law Clerk to study this question.

I was provided with an article on the role of the Speaker of the Senate of Canada by Professor Dawson, Associate Professor of Social Science at the University of Western Ontario. Apparently, it is the only article written on the Speaker of the Senate by anyone who could be considered as an authority. I read the article and was a little surprised, if not shocked, to find, about the middle of the first paragraph, the following sentences:

● (1420)

Beyond implying further that the Speaker is expected to be a partisan while in the Chair, the British North America Act is silent.

I could not find that in the Constitution. I have read article 34 and it does not say that. The same author says:

The Speaker (of the Senate) is not given any specific powers or responsibilities, not even the simple one of presiding over the Senate.

According to the Interpretation Act, and the principle of interpretation—and I will quote Mr. Justice Pigeon in a few moments—one does not define words in an act. One accepts the dictionary version and the common usage of such words as being the meaning of the act. However, I shall come to that.

Evidently section 8 had not been read by the author, and apparently section 14 had not been understood. The author says:

Canadian statutes and the rules of the Senate add little to this.

Provision is made in the Speaker of the Senate Act for the appointment of a temporary Speaker, and the rules give only a vague limited power to the Speaker to preserve order and decorum.

After this sweeping statement, which quotes no texts of law, no rules of interpretation, no reference to the order in council appointing the Speaker and in which powers are conferred on the Speaker, I read the article in toto and came to this final sentence, which reads:

Whatever the reason, it seems certain that the Senate has gradually moved from the idea of a partisan Speaker to a position where he presides as do his counterparts in other parliamentary legislatures with firmness, dignity and obvious impartiality over the proceedings of the House.

That is the last paragraph of his article and, in my humble opinion, it seems to be in contradiction with the first paragraph. I say it is an article and not a legal opinion. From reading it I was doubtful about the legal background of the author. Upon inquiring of our Law Clerk, Mr. du Plessis, I was informed that Mr. Dawson is not a lawyer, but is a political science teacher. Yet his article, or his chronicle, was treated as the bible of the powers of the Speaker of the Senate.

We find in The Modern Senate of Canada by Kuntz, whom I quoted two weeks ago, a short reference of a few lines to the powers of the Speaker of the Senate. He conveys the same ideas as Dawson. According to the notes on the dust jacket of the book this author does not appear to be a lawyer either. The last sentence of the notes says "At present he is an Assistant Professor in the Department of Economics and Political Science, McGill University (1967)".

May I say that relying on such obiter dicta of non-lawyers, there are some senators who are denying the Speaker of the Senate any powers in the administration of the Senate and consider the administration of the Senate as an exclusive mandate of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. They are claiming that the complete, exclusive and detailed authority for the administration of the Senate, down to the hiring of the barber, is vested in the Internal Economy Committee. So I was left with the question I had asked myself when I was appointed: If it is so, why in the various organization charts that were given to me did the Speaker and the Internal Economy Committee seem to share authority and on what was this based? Solicited and unsolicited opinions came my way. One day I was told very seriously by a senior officer in the Senate that the administrative powers in the Senate rested with the Leader of the Government. This individual's rationale at the time was, "if the Leader of the Government appoints members to the Internal Economy Committee and chooses the chairman of the committee", and then he said to me, "you can see who runs the show in this house." I wonder in looking at Senator Roblin if he agrees with that rationale.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must ask my honourable friend the date of that opinion. Was it before the change of government or after the change of government? If it was after the change of government, I am afraid the description does not really fit my perception of the situation.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Senator Riel: It was last year before the change of government.

I must say that as Speaker I never had any clashes or any differences with the Internal Economy Committee or with its chairman. Senator Graham, who was the then chairman of that committee, has always been a friend and a fine gentleman. We are neighbours in the East Block. Furthermore, my tenure was very brief as the result of the calling of the election, which had the effect of directing people's minds to other problems. Senator Graham and I have enjoyed a good working relationship.

I adopted a mode of conduct which, by applying my professional experience and my own intuition to the function, seemed to me at the time to be appropriate to the Speaker's administrative authority. I did not exercise authority as completely as I would today, having had the opportunity to give more thought to the subject. However, I tried to exercise such authority as I thought was vested in the Speaker and which permitted me, I hope, to protect the integrity of the Senate, to command respect and to provide leadership. Furthermore, my tenure in the office of Speaker has permitted me to form a high opinion of the function of the Speaker of the Senate of Canada, an opinion which I confirmed while visiting the House of Lords in October, 1984 during my last week as Speaker.

When we prorogued Parliament at the end of June, 1984 for what some called an untimely election—I suppose it was as untimely as an untimely death—I asked the Law Clerk to do some research on the administrative powers of the Speaker. He said that if he had time during the recess he would do it. Unfortunately, he and his assistant and I, as Speaker, were very busy during July and August with the Canada Labour Relations Board concerning some employees of the Senate. In the end, I never did have the benefit of such opinions or ideas as resulted from the researches of the Law Clerk of the Senate, or those who helped him in that research.

[Translation]

—In line with the philosophy that if you want it done well, do it yourself, I decided to do it myself first of all, I looked at the Constitution of Canada, section 34, which mentions the Speaker of the Senate. This is an important document in our country. Section 34 says:

[English]

The Governor General may from time to time, by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, appoint a Senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his Stead.

I then referred to section 18 of the Constitution under the title "IV. Legislative Power". It reads:

The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

It should be noted that there is no relationship to the House of Lords mentioned in this section 18.

To give effect to section 18 of the Constitution, the Parliament of Canada did pass Chapter S-8 entitled: "Senate and House of Commons Act" and I read to you sections 4 and 5 of that act:

4. The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise,

(a) such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the British North America Act 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and by the members thereof, so far as the same are consistent with and not repugnant to the said Act; and

(b) such privileges, immunities and powers as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, not exceeding those at the time of the passing of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and by the members thereof respectively.

So we have a general law, which is the Constitution, and we now have this special law; we know that there is no reference to the powers or to the privileges of the House of Lords, or to the members of the House of Lords. Therefore the legislative powers of the Senate and of senators are defined, and they are in no way related to the powers and privileges of the House of Lords but only to those of the House of Commons of the British Parliament.

I then read Chapter S-14 of the Statutes of Canada which is entitled: "An Act respecting the Speaker of the Senate" which says:

2. Whenever the Speaker of the Senate, from illness or other cause, finds it necessary to leave the chair . . .

That indicates to me that the Speaker was presiding, and then left the Chair.

. . . during any part of the sittings of the Senate on any day, he may call upon any senator to take the chair and preside as Speaker during the remainder of such day, unless he himself resumes the chair before the close of the sittings for that day.

3. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the Senate may choose any senator to preside as the Speaker during such absence, and such senator shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of Speaker, until the Speaker himself resumes the chair, or another Speaker is appointed by the Governor General.

4. Every act done by any senator, acting as aforesaid, has the same effect and validity as if the act had been done by the Speaker himself.

I then referred to the Instrument of my own appointment, which is an Order in Council. After the preamble and greeting, this Order in Council says:

We do hereby constitute and appoint you

Maurice Riel
Speaker of the Senate

To have, hold, exercise and enjoy the said office of Speaker of the Senate, unto you, Maurice Riel, with all the powers, rights, authority, privileges, profits, emoluments and advantages unto the said office of right and by law appertaining during Our Pleasure.

This is the law, and these are very wide powers which cannot be limited except by another law. It is a basic rule of interpretation that you cannot restrict a law by a bylaw. Here, I am looking at Senator Godfrey because he knows that better than anyone else.

I then referred back to some old principles of law. First, section 10 of the Interpretation Act, Chapter I-23:

The law shall be considered as always speaking . . .

[Translation]

In French we say that the legislator never speaks for nothing.

The Civil Code of the province of Quebec, in section 11—

Senator Flynn: This does not apply to everyone here!

Senator Riel: I shall conclude by quoting Descartes, and Senator Tremblay will approve.

[English]

As I was saying, the legislator never speaks to say nothing, or, to use the terms of section 10 of the Interpretation Act, Chapter I-23 of the Statutes of Canada:

The law shall be considered as always speaking, and whenever a matter or thing is expressed in the present tense, it shall be applied to the circumstances as they arise, so that effect may be given to the enactment and every part thereof according to its true spirit, intent and meaning.

[Translation]

As I was telling Senator Flynn, section 11 of our Civil Code states that the judge cannot refuse to render justice by invoking the silence, the lack of clarity or the inadequacy of the law.

We also know when we look at—

[English]

Section 11 of the Interpretation Act, Chapter I-23 says:

Every enactment shall be deemed remedial, and shall be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects.

As honourable senators are aware, a bylaw cannot prevail over a law, but is passed to make the application of the law possible, or to assist in the achieving of the purpose of the law.

Section 26(2) of the Interpretation Act is also worth reading:

Where power is given to a person, officer or functionary, to do or enforce the doing of any act or thing, all such powers shall be deemed to be also given as are necessary to enable the person, officer or functionary to do or enforce the doing of the act or thing.

Then I went to a booklet entitled Rédaction et Interprétation des Lois by a prestigious and revered legal authority in this country, Mr. Justice Louis-Philippe Pigeon, now a retired Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

• (1440)

At page 25 of the booklet, Mr. Justice Pigeon says under:

[Translation]

The title—

[English]

—The title of the law—

[Translation]

Of course, in legislation, titles are important.

They are part of the law.

[English]

Mr. Justice Pigeon, at page 26, goes on to state:

[Translation]

Concerning the definition—

[English]

—I believe that one of the authors I have mentioned said that there is no definition of the word “speaker”; I find that a little surprising—Mr. Justice Pigeon says, and I am translating: “The first rule that I propose concerning definition is to use it only when really necessary, for example, when the dictionary is insufficient. It is not the role of the legislator to copy the dictionary. It follows, then, that we must systematically abstain from giving a definition to words that we use in their ordinary meaning.”

I went to Webster’s dictionary and found that the second definition for the word “speaker” was “the presiding officer of a deliberating body”.

At that point my attention was drawn to a case which we were involved in with the Canada Labour Relations Board. That was a case before the Federal Court of Canada (Trial Division) under file number T-751-84, and there was a judgment rendered. The parties to that case were described as follows: “The Speaker of the House of Commons, Applicant; the Canada Labour Relations Board and the Public Service Alliance of Canada, Respondents; the Speaker of the Senate and the Attorney General of Canada, Interveners.

We must realize that it is the Speaker of the Senate who is legally mentioned in the judgment and not the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, nor the chairman of that committee. The Speaker is mentioned, as is the Attorney General of Canada, and not the Department of Justice. The Speaker of the House of Commons is mentioned also, not the services committee or the administration committee of the House of Commons.

Not only is the Speaker of the Senate recognized in the Constitution and subsequent statutes to give effect to our Constitution, not only is he given by the Order in Council appointing him all the powers to fulfill the office of Speaker, but he is recognized in the law courts as the one person representing the institution of the Senate. Certainly, that is within the meaning of the order in council where it is said "all the rights and powers . . . of right and by law appertaining." The courts are taking judicial knowledge of public law.

Now, in view of the fact that I was told by some honourable senators that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration was the exclusive ruling body of the Senate administration—to the exclusion of the Speaker—I read the text of the rule of the Senate giving the terms of reference of that committee. Those terms of reference are found under rule 67(1)(f), which states:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of fifteen members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

It says "to consider" and "to report". No other powers are given to that committee or to its chairman. There is no other power of action or execution given to that committee.

I have on one side texts of law making it abundantly clear that the Speaker is the paramount officer of the Senate and, on the other hand, a rule limiting the powers of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to consider and report.

If the law were not clear, then there would be a vacuum, but there is no vacuum, because the laws of Canada have created the office of the Speaker. The Speaker, by special reference in the laws, is not only given powers to make him a very special officer in the Senate and in Parliament, but also by the general law has been vested with all powers that were then existing in the House of Commons of Great Britain.

It has become clear to my mind that the powers of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, being strictly limited to the text of rule 67(1)(f), do not deprive the Speaker at all of the powers given him by the law of the land, by the Constitution, by the general and special legislation of the statutes in accordance with the Interpretation Act and principles, and by virtue of the Order in Council issued to him by the Governor General.

The Speaker of the Senate is the supreme and only executive officer in the Senate who deals with administration.

I have satisfied myself—and that was the purpose of my exercise—that I have established a prima facie case for the authority of the Speaker in the Senate with respect to the administration of the Senate. I believe that the powers of the Speaker cannot be encroached upon by any rule. The powers of the Speaker can be revised or reduced only by a law adopted by the Parliament of Canada according to our Constitution.

Having reached the conclusion that, in law, the Speaker is the Chief Executive Officer of the Senate, I thought I should make my findings available to my colleagues. Conversations that I had with some of my colleagues indicated to me emotional opposition to my reasoning. So, I thought the best way to prevent controversy and to bring about unity of action and to establish a clear chain of command in the exercise of authority, which is very much needed in the Senate for its officers and employees, was to put forward the suggestion that the Speaker should become the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. That, in my mind, was the best solution for the good of the Senate and to maintain its integrity. I still believe it is. I claim no special merit for that. If there is any merit due, it is so because of having reflected on the question.

We all know that in New York barmen are considered to be the best renowned legal advisers to their customers. One afternoon after a lengthy consultation with a client who had a serious problem and had imbibed a great number of dry martinis, as the customer was leaving the bar, undecided and oscillating, the barman said to him: "Feel free, sir, to consult any other barman in this city."

I believe that an interpretation of the authority of the Speaker in the Senate should be sought only from constitutional lawyers. My suggestion is that the Speaker should have full authority to seek outside counsel. That would be a very constructive and helpful decision.

[Translation]

I move the adjournment of the debate on my inquiry.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am going to be away next week and perhaps with Senator Riel's permission, I might intervene at this time. Some years ago I achieved the height of my political ambition by being made a member of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Parliamentary Restaurant! At least that is a little better than being a member of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament or the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament. During our occasional meetings the question of the authority of the Speaker came up. I had a research paper prepared by officers of the Library of Parliament on the administrative role of the Speaker of the Senate. That paper is dated March 28, 1980. I remember giving the late Senator Grosart who, at that time, was the Speaker of the Senate, a copy of this paper, and when Senator Marchand became Speaker I also sent him a copy, but I neglected to send one to Senator Riel. I certainly will provide him with a copy of it. I have not read that paper for five years but my recollection of it, without going into the details, is that it does not agree with Senator Riel's comments. The result of that research is that the Speaker has no administrative powers.

Senator Frith: Let's hear it. Put it on the record.

Senator Godfrey: Do you want me to read the whole thing? Senator Riel has moved the adjournment and I am going to send him a copy.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, did Senator Riel not say that he was closing the debate on his inquiry?

Senator Riel: I did not say that.

Senator Frith: It is not closed?

Senator Riel: No, it is not. I moved the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: That is fine, if it is not what you said.

[English]

Senator Riel: I must say to Senator Godfrey that I did not find any copy of that paper in the files of the Speaker's Office and the Law Clerk never offered to provide me with a copy. I would like to know if this gentleman is a lawyer.

Senator Godfrey: It is five years since I looked at it. I will send you a copy and perhaps you can comment upon it the next time you speak to this matter.

Senator Riel: I would like to do that. My conclusion still stands that we should consult a constitutional lawyer.

On motion of Senator Riel, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE, REGINA, FEBRUARY 1985—FAILURES AND SHORTCOMINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 19, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain failures and shortcomings of the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina in February 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, this inquiry has been on the order paper for a long time but, due to certain circumstances, I have not been able to speak to it before now. I might have let it drop but certain recent events warrant my going over some of my perceptions of that conference.

It was held in Regina in February and the press, the media generally and those who were present said it was really something of a love-in. The essential issues of the day were not really fully debated. The government's policy at the time was not at all clear, and I suggest that the first ministers met in an unreal atmosphere.

Prior to that meeting the Prime Minister, I believe, showed his general approach to government and the exercise of power by some of the things he did. One of his early moves was to use the authority of appointing a chief of staff in each of the departments for each of the ministers, and an edict went out that he was going to vet the press releases that came from the ministers. I think that that general approach to the ministry and to the government is still there and its effects are still being felt.

One reads from time to time newspaper reports that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is really not a minister in his own right but that it is the Prime Minister who is exercising that power. The same thing has been said about the Minister of Finance and about other ministers in important economic portfolios.

I was able to be present at that conference more by good luck than anything else. The conference was held at the Arts Centre in Regina, which is a very spacious centre. I asked the leader of our party how many tickets he had for the event and he replied that he was limited to four and due to the fact that someone who was allocated one of those tickets decided not to attend I went in his place.

Prior to the convention I read a news report which stated that while there were many seats in the Arts Centre, they would be occupied by the ministers' staff and by the press. When I arrived at the conference I was surprised to see that there were virtually 1,500 seats unoccupied and that the citizens of Saskatchewan—those Canadians who lived in Regina where the conference was held—were barred from attending the conference. Security was very tight and if you did not have a reserved ticket you would not be admitted. I thought that that action, the excluding of the citizens of Saskatchewan, was most repugnant.

The day the conference commenced was bitterly cold and there were demonstrations in progress outside the centre. Some of the demonstrators had been there for hours. They asked to be allowed to use the washrooms of the Arts Centre, but they were refused permission to do so. I thought that was almost unbelievable.

Senator Frith: Let them eat cake.

Senator Argue: I guess so. Meanwhile, the big shots, the Prime Minister, the premiers and the ministers were inside. One newspaper reported that the television screen in use cost $100,000. A big screen was used for monitoring the conference because the leaders were some distance away and, after all, the 1,500 occupants of the seats needed to have this large television screen so that they would have a better view of the proceedings! But these seats, as I said, were empty.

I thought Premier Lougheed made an important point when he advised Mr. Mulroney and the Government of Canada to tie the Canadian dollar to a group of foreign currencies rather than to that of the United States. That was just an indirect way of saying, "Let the dollar fall." Of course, a few weeks later that is exactly what was happening. Premier Lougheed also made a pitch for free trade, and that subject was discussed.

Our Prime Minister was the star of this well managed TV event from which the public was excluded. He was there with his friends to cosy up to the premiers of the provinces, almost all of whom were and are Conservatives. The love-in went on.

Subsequently there were a couple of elections, the results of which I thought were rather significant. First of all, after this big love feast and all the talk of co-operative federalism when everything seemed to be going fine, there was a new energy agreement for Newfoundland. The Government of Newfoundland went to the people, and the representation of the Conservatives in the House of Assembly dropped from 44 per cent to 36 per cent. The Liberals went up from 6 per cent to 15 per cent. The PC popular vote dropped from 61 per cent to 48.5 per cent.

Senator Barootes: Who won the election?

Senator Argue: The Conservatives won the election.

Senator Frith: It was not a total failure.

Senator Argue: Even with this great love-in and this bonanza worth hundreds of millions of dollars in the form of this energy agreement, the people of Newfoundland started to have second thoughts. The word in the press—and it was only that—was that as the campaign went on it was becoming more and more difficult for the Conservatives. Initially they thought there was nothing to it.

Then, of course, another election was held following this event, this time in Ontario. I followed the performance of Mr. Miller, the Premier, and after watching his performance, I thought he did quite well. However, the people of Ontario started to have some doubts about how much of this love-in they could stand and how much of this co-operative federalism was going to be really helpful to Canada. I guess they got it into their heads that maybe there was too much power in Ottawa and that there had to be some countervailing power in the provinces, particularly in the powerful province of Ontario.

I believe that to the average Canadian viewer, the Federal-Provincial Conference in Regina looked pretty phoney. They understood the phoniness of this love-in which really did not deal with any issues. Therefore, in Ontario, at any rate, they decided to act.

To respond to Senator Barootes' question, in this case the Tories, I think, lost the election. I think that is clear. Sixty-three per cent of the popular vote in Ontario said that they did not want the Tories. More people wanted the Liberals than wanted the Tories. I believe the Tories have gerrymandered their seats so well in the past that the province can have a government that the people do not want, a government that they had kicked out by means of the ballot box. But because of their manipulation of the boundaries or other actions that are purely accidental, they are still in power. I do not think they will be there for very long, at least that's the way I read it.

Then the Prime Minister of Canada who likes love-ins, who likes Tories, and does not like anyone else, said that patronage is bad when it is Liberal patronage, but when it is Tory patronage the beneficiaries are loyal Canadians and they deserve it all. I suppose the Tories have been hungry for so many years that they have become impatient. In the case of Air Canada, instead of waiting until the term of office of the various members expired in the normal course of events, they just fired the whole board and immediately appointed a new bunch. Of course, the new bunch are independent, deep thinkers and have no political attachments! That would be fine, except for the fact that everyone knows they are deep blue Tories and that is why they are there.

Senator Frith: With some family.

Senator Argue: The Prime Minister, who officiated at that conference, has looked over the Canadian scene and has said, "I have lots of power in the Commons. Heck, I have 212 seats out of 282, so I am in great shape. I have Parliament in the palm of my hand. I don't really have a cabinet in the traditional and normal sense where it discusses issues and advises the Prime Minister and where sometimes the Prime Minister comes pretty close to losing a round in cabinet." No, there is really only one minister in cabinet, and that is the Prime Minister. He has some other figureheads that are so-called ministers. This is just the way it is.

Senator Stewart: That is very harsh on Crosbie.

Senator Argue: I think he has been shut up often.

Senator Roblin: What about me?

Senator Argue: The only time Crosbie is really vocal is when the Prime Minister is out of the country, but news travels fast so I suppose he keeps track even when he is out of the country.

Senator Barootes: What about Trudeau?

Senator Frith: We are speaking about Mulroney, M-u-l-r-o-n-e-y.

Senator Argue: He appoints the bosses for the ministers and he appoints people who do the press releases. No one ever did a press release for me. Perhaps the quality of my press releases would show that. I always did them myself. If I had sent a copy of a press release on wheat to the Prime Minister, he would have sent it back to me with a note, "Don't you know anything about wheat? Why do you send me this notice? Do it again and I will get someone in the portfolio who does understand something about wheat." Therefore, I never sent him a press release, I only drafted and produced them.

Honourable senators, it was not my intention to mention this point this afternoon, but I would point out that each and every year I held my portfolio we exported more wheat than we had ever done before in the history of Canada. We broke all records.

Senator Roblin: Take credit for the weather, that is what gave you the wheat.

Senator Argue: The weather was great, of course, and the sales were great too. When the Americans had better weather and greater crops than we had, their share of the world market fell from 49 per cent to 40 per cent and ours went up from 17 per cent to 21 per cent. When you can outdo the Americans, even with the same weather conditions, that is a pretty good sign.

Senator Roblin: But you did not. You know their percentage increase was far greater than ours over the years. You know that because you were the minister.

Senator Frith: Only when it was a Tory government.

Senator Argue: Alvin Hamilton was the greatest salesman in the world but we outsold him two or three times.

The Prime Minister looked over Parliament Hill and he said, "Where is my threat? Who is going to interfere with my monarchy; with my presidential powers?" He said, "It is the Senate. The Liberals are in the Senate and they have a majority."

Senator Frith: Before that it was the Governor General.

Senator Argue: The Governor General does not have a hope. The Prime Minister is the head of state. When he meets President Reagan, the Governor General is home in Ottawa. He is the head of state.

● (1510)

My God, I do not know why these flag-wavers of ours in the country, some of whom pride themselves on being so patriotic and a lot of whom are Tories, didn't get really incensed about that. That was the most revolting thing I have seen. It is unbelievable to me. Absolutely unbelievable.

Senator Frith: You ain't seen nothing yet!

An Hon. Senator: Watch your blood pressure.

Senator Argue: I do not have a problem with my blood pressure. My blood pressure is great. It's OK. I have to get it worked up where it can function.

Senator Frith: Thanks for the thought, doctor.

Senator Argue: Anyway, there he was meeting the President of the United States. He did not want the Governor General, the head of state, interfering with his television coverage. She was left at home in Ottawa. An absolute disgrace. I do not understand it. I thought protocol was important. I think it is important. I thought that of all people, Progressive Conservatives would be the most careful about protocol, the most meticulous.

This man, he is the head of state, or he thinks he is. And he has all of the power in the House of Commons, and he wants power in the Senate. He is afraid of the Senate. Just imagine, afraid of the Senate.

And what did we do on that famous borrowing bill? We held it up a couple of weeks or so. That was unpardonable. That was a sin against the presidential aura, a sin against his monarchy, his male monarchy that he has occupied, his czarist euphoria.

That was something wrong. Well, what did we do? We just held it up a short time.

I can remember the late Right Honourable—as you can guess, he was "Honourable" then—the late Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker going after C. D. Howe. He said: "You said, Mr. Howe, 'Who is going to stop me?'"

[Senator Argue.]

Well, you wouldn't say that about Mr. Mulroney. He would say to you: "Who is going to slow me down?"

It is not trying to stop him that gets him upset; it is slowing him down.

Senator Frith: "And if you do, I will abolish you."

Senator Argue: So, we said: "Wait for a couple of weeks. If you want all of this money, you will likely get it. Just show us what your spending plans are. We don't want you to fall into the same mess as Pioneer Trust in Saskatchewan. We are just trying to keep your act in order so that we know what you want to do with the money."

So, we slowed the government down, or I guess we did, at any rate, and now the attack is on. We have done something that is unpardonable and unforgivable.

I do not know what he knows about politics. I suppose he knows something. I have been on the Hill for 40 years. Imagine, 40 years! And I can tell you that there is no great party discipline in the Senate. Who is kidding himself? Are you, on the opposition side, under rigid party discipline?

I have been a Liberal now for some 20-odd years and no one has suggested to me what I should say. They might have after I had said something, but they certainly didn't try to tell me what I should say ahead of time. I say exactly what is on my mind. I think that is my privilege and my duty.

When we, the Liberals, formed the government, I think we were responsible. We may have let things go sometimes a bit too fast, but I think we were responsible.

You know, the Prime Minister has said that the Liberals would never have blocked a Liberal government bill. Well, we bucked one of Otto Lang's bills a few years ago. Senator Hays moved an amendment to that bill, and we came within two votes in this chamber of defeating that bill, and that was even after Mr. Lang had come to the committee and pleaded with us to let it pass. And in fact it did get through. It was a bill to provide for voluntary pools on rapeseed.

Even though that bill was passed, there was never a voluntary pool set up. I think Otto Lang had second thoughts about it. Perhaps he thought that the Senate was right.

In any event, even though we were not able to defeat that bill, we did try, and we were Liberals. We had the help of some Progressive Conservatives, and that helped us come close.

The papers say that there are 77 Liberals in the Senate, or whatever the figure is. They do not mention Senators Lafond, Lang, Thompson, Bell and Deschatelets, all of whom left the Liberals when the Liberals were in office and who now sit as independents.

In my judgment, no government of Canada has any reason to fear the Senate. That has certainly been true in my time here. The Senate does not have a history of opposing government legislation for the sake of opposing government legislation or to play some kind of cheap politics.

I believe that if the Progressive Conservatives were in a majority in this house and the Progressive Conservative Party formed the government, those honourable senators, with the help of their Liberal colleagues, would exercise the powers of the Senate in a reasonable way. If they felt that the government, their party, was doing things that they felt should not be done in the interests of Canada, I am sure they would say so, and I am sure that they would use the authority of the Senate to make their views known.

To put a proposition before us now which says that on money bills the debate in the Senate will be limited to 30 days is nonsense. Part of that proposition is that the question of what is and is not a money bill will be one decided by the Speaker of the House of Commons, with no recourse to a court of law. On other bills, the limit on debate will be 45 days. In the event of there being amendments, the House of Commons will then have 15 days to decide whether or not to accept those amendments, and if they are not accepted, the bill will go through.

It should be stated in the resolution that it is not the House of Commons that will decide but the Prime Minister. With his huge majority in the House of Commons, he is the House of Commons, and he believes himself to be the House of Commons. Not only that, he believes himself to be the Parliament of Canada, and he believes himself to be the czar over all of this land.

If this resolution should happen to become the law of the country—and I do not believe for one minute that it will. I think the Ontario election has settled it. I think it is virtually dead. But miracles can happen. It might get a second life—but if that should happen, what about the regions without any power? What about P.E.I., if there is a fight about the potato market in the United States? What happens in that case if there is no one in the Senate with any authority?

What about the west, in a regional fight? What about our committees?

I think our committees do good work. Part of the respect we enjoy we owe to the work of our committees. While not everyone in the country thinks the Senate is doing all that it should be doing, they are aware that it has authority, that it has responsibility, that it has a role to play.

I think senators in the future can continue to play that role responsibly, as I believe they have done in the past. We do not need to have our powers destroyed. We do not need to have the Senate and all it stands for destroyed in exchange for the promise of a constitutional conference. That is a pretty empty promise, because a lot of constitutional conferences come to naught.

I hope that the Prime Minister will have second thoughts about this resolution. I hope he will begin to understand that he is a part of the political scene in this country, and only a part. I hope that he will not endeavour to clothe himself with more and more power. If anything, he should be taking steps to clothe others, in a parliamentary atmosphere, with greater authority and greater responsibility.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 14, 1985, at 2 p.m.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 14, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

On March 13, 1985, the Senate approved a motion by the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel) requesting the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to consider and report upon the question of the audio recording and broadcasting of the proceedings of Senate committees.

Your Committee held meetings on March 26, April 23, April 30 and May 14 to examine the matter. It first studied the point of order raised during the course of the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance held on February 18, 1985 when a member of the Committee drew the attention of the Chair to the fact that an unidentified person in the public seating area was recording the proceedings of the committee on a tape recorder.

Your Committee agrees that authorization is required in order to make an audio recording of public proceedings in a Senate committee. Since the person in question did not have such authorization, your Committee concludes that such a recording was not in order.

Your Committee reviewed the procedure for the audio recording and broadcasting of proceedings of the Senate, and noted the adoption by the Senate on May 8, 1980 of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which, as amended by the Senate on adoption, reads in part as follows: "That until further notice, permission be granted for the audio recording and broadcasting of the proceedings of the Senate in arrangement with the appropriate authority in the Senate."

Your Committee heard evidence to the effect that there is implicit authority under Rule 77(7) for a committee of the Senate, if requested, to authorize, either on an individual basis or on the basis of a general approval, the audio recording of its proceedings since such a practice would be consistent with the practice now in effect in the Senate itself. However, if such is the case, then each committee is in a position to decide whether or not it will permit the audio recording of its proceedings and this could result in varying practices among committees.

Your Committee believes that permission for the audio recording and broadcasting of committee proceedings should be explicitly granted by the Senate and that the procedure should be the same for all public meetings of the Senate and its committees.

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 109, the following:

109A.(1) Subject to subsection (2), public proceedings in the Senate or in any committee thereof may be recorded or broadcast but only through the use of such audio feed facilities as may be installed for that purpose in the Senate or in any room used by a committee of the Senate, subject to such arrangements with the Clerk of the Senate or his designate as may be necessary.

(2) Where a committee meets in a room that is not equipped with an audio feed facility, the chairman of the committee shall make such alternative arrangements, where practicable, as may be necessary to record or broadcast the public proceedings of that committee, if such recording or broadcasting is requested.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall the report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION

DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL WEEK

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to draw attention to the declaration of National Soil Conservation Week. Perhaps this item could be considered under "Reports of Committees," although it is not really a report. It has, however, something to do with the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

As honourable senators will recall, in its report Soil at Risk—Canada's Eroding Future, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry made a recommendation that the Government of Canada declare a National Soil Conservation Week.

During the month of April the Senate passed such a motion. That motion read:

That the Senate urge the Government to declare a special week for soil conservation in 1985 and every year thereafter;

That it be called National Soil Conservation Week;

That it be declared for the week May 12-19 in 1985, in conjunction with the Manitoba Soil Stewardship Week; and

That it be declared at a suitable period in subsequent years.

I am very pleased that the government, through the Minister of Agriculture, saw fit to do so.

A press release dated May 10 states:

Agriculture Minister John Wise today announced that the week of May 12 to 18 has been officially designated National Soil Conservation Week for this year.

The week will become an annual event.

I simply wanted to bring to the attention of honourable senators that that is one of the recommendations of the committee's report. It is important to bring the problem of soil degradation to the attention of all Canadians, and that will be done by designating one week during the year as National Soil Conservation Week. That will encourage all Canadians to think about soil conservation during at least one week of the year, and actions taken during that week may affect our soil throughout the year.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

DISCUSSION PAPER—"THE REGULATION OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS: PROPOSALS FOR DISCUSSION"

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of State (Finance) issued a discussion paper on financial intermediaries a couple of weeks ago, and I am sure that all honourable senators have been carefully reviewing that paper.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could assist our understanding of that paper by telling honourable senators whether the continued concentration in families of financial intermediaries is a matter of principle or is a proposal.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I should tell my honourable friend that the white paper presented to Parliament represents a series of observations on the situation that pertains today in order to provide a background for Parliament, itself, to discuss the questions that are involved, as well as cognate questions of the sort my honourable friend raises.

As a result, the committee of the other place is about to hold hearings and will invite the views of Canadians from all walks of life with respect to all matters connected with this topic.

If I am correct in my recollection, I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will conduct a review of the white paper.

After those reviews have been conducted and we have ascertained the views of as many people as possible, then government policy with respect to particulars of the kind my honourable friend has raised will be made available to the Senate.

Senator Sinclair: A supplementary, if I may. The reason I phrased the question in the manner I did was that the Minister of State (Finance) indicated that matters of principle would not be open for discussion, only proposals.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend will find that Senate committees are inclined to set their own rules as to what subjects are open for discussion. So, I would expect that when this matter is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that committee will decide how far-reaching its examination ought to be.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

NOVA SCOTIA—HEAVY WATER PLANTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on January 31 last, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and gave an overview on development policy. I raised with him at that time a question relating to the heavy water plants in Nova Scotia. I asked him whether he could tell us if the government intended to keep those plants in operation. The minister stated that the problem was under consideration, but that no conclusion had been reached as of that date, January 31.

● (1410)

Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether a decision or a conclusion has now been reached, and can he give us any assurance that these plants will be kept open since they are very major employers in eastern Nova Scotia?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that we are all very pleased to know that in the Cape Breton region, which my honourable friend represents, the success of the coal mining operation in the past year has been a matter of some real satisfaction because it will enable jobs to be preserved there. If the government finds it possible to work with others in going ahead with the expansion of the second seam in that area, then there will be even more hopeful developments ahead. That is in the realm of the possible, and I am looking forward to encouraging results.

With respect to the heavy water plant, I know that that has been the subject of some concern, both on the part of the federal and the provincial government, to say nothing of the people who are more directly concerned, and I regret that I have no information that I can give my friend on that. I will have to take his question as notice.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for his willingness to find out what the situation is. While he is dealing with the question of the heavy water plants, perhaps he would also follow up on the question I asked the minister on that occasion, which he was then unable to answer. The question had to do with the Sydney Steel Corporation.

My question was whether any negotiations or discussions were under way on the second phase of the modernization of the Sydney Steel plant. As the Leader of the Government knows, the first phase was entered into and jointly financed by the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia. It was planned that there would be a second phase of modernization. My question is whether discussions or negotiations are under way and whether a decision has been reached on that second phase of the modernization plan.

Senator Roblin: I will take the question as notice.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

FAILURE OF PIONEER TRUST—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate which concerns the failure of Pioneer Trust in Saskatchewan. Yesterday in the Saskatchewan legislature, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Blakeney, requested that a public inquiry be held into the failure, the mismanagement and the possible problems that the management had before that company folded. The Government of Saskatchewan, led by the finance minister, refused to hold such a public inquiry. If my memory serves me correctly, the Minister of Finance said that he did not want to vilify anybody and he felt that Touche Ross, the trustees in bankruptcy who are looking into this matter, would find out if anything had gone wrong. Any of us who have followed what happens when trustees in bankruptcy are appointed know that they look into these matters in a very superficial way. They are paid to clean up the matter and get out. In a very complicated matter such as this they will not look into it very deeply.

There have been accusations by the opposition in Saskatchewan that this is a cover-up because many of the leading people in the company were supporters of the government. In fact, Mr. Will Klein, the president and chief executive officer, was a very prominent supporter, as was his wife, of Premier Devine and the Prime Minister of Canada.

[Senator Roblin.]

My question is: Since the government has passed the bill providing up to $5 million to compensate the people who trusted Pioneer Trust and who put their money into it—and you have agreed to pay that off—will you now be prepared to carry out a public investigation into this failure to ascertain whether there was mismanagement of the company or if there has been any element of malfeasance in this whole situation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think the government is very pleased that they have been able to come to an understanding with the Government of Saskatchewan and that the people who were at risk in Pioneer Trust were protected. It is only fair to say that the Government of Saskatchewan is the government that is carrying by far the larger share of the responsibility for meeting this obligation. Our share is limited to $5 million, which, nevertheless, is a substantial sum.

With respect to the particular point my friend raises, I do not altogether agree with his view of what trustees in bankruptcy do. I think a good deal depends on what their terms of reference are—what they were asked to do.

I think it would be appropriate for me to seek to obtain the terms of reference under which the trustees in bankruptcy are working in Saskatchewan so that we may come to some opinion as to whether or not those are adequate in the circumstances.

Senator Steuart: As a supplementary question, I would point out that the problems of Pioneer Trust went beyond Canada to the United States.

Honourable senators will recall the extremely serious charges which were made on the program, The Fifth Estate. Those charges concerned the operation of Pioneer Trust and the management of that company, starting with Will Klein, the president, and going on down to his associates. The very serious questions asked on that program have never been answered.

The allegation was that this company had gathered in over $100 million of trust funds, mostly from the people of Saskatchewan, and had squandered that money and had acted in a most improper manner, to say the least, and, to say the worst, had acted in a manner that betrayed the trust of these people. The tentacles of this problem have reached down to the United States, and questions have been raised concerning the people with whom we are dealing.

I think a public inquiry should be held. The Minister of Finance has said that there should be no such public inquiry because we do not want to vilify these people, but I believe they have already been vilified by virtue of the subject matters covered on The Fifth Estate on CBC.

The question now is: Was that program correct? Should they have been vilified? Did they do something that was not just mismanagement, but was legally and morally wrong?

There is no question that these people, starting with Mr. Will Klein, the president, and his associates are friends of the Government of Saskatchewan and are also very close political friends of the present federal government.

Senator Balfour: They were also close friends of the former Government of Saskatchewan.

Senator Steuart: Yes, they were, but we got rid of them—and thank God for that. They are now close friends of the Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada. Is this, as Mr. Blakeney claims, a cover-up?

I realize that the Leader of the Government cannot answer for the Government of Saskatchewan, but surely he can answer for the Government of Canada.

If this is, in fact, or in the view of the people, a cover-up, is the Leader of the Government prepared to recommend to the government that there be a public inquiry into this whole ugly mess so that it may be cleared up one way or the other?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is very good at connecting names and political parties. I regret that. I think it is not appropriate that he should do so in such a way because it has a tendency to smear people.

Senator Steuart: What is a smear?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend's connecting political parties with individuals is a smear, and it should not be indulged in. It is a statement I cannot condone.

The other day my colleague, Senator Barootes, and my honourable friend had a short discussion on the question of politics in Saskatchewan. I am sorry that Senator Barootes is not in the chamber today to hear what my honourable friend has had to say, because I do not think it should have been said.

Honourable senators, leaving that to one side, what about this particular issue? My friend has seen something on television, and that, apparently, prompts him to do what he is doing today. I think we need something more to establish a prima facie case.

My suggestion is that we should examine the terms of reference of the trustees in bankruptcy and see what particular information that examination throws up. Then we can consider the matter again.

I cannot give my honourable friend an undertaking to do what he wants me to do, but I can give him an undertaking that I will not ignore his question.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. There is more to it. It is not just a case of throwing political charges around; it is a fact that Mr. Will Klein and his associates were very close to the present Government of Saskatchewan and the present Government of Canada.

● (1420)

It is also a fact that they cost the people of Saskatchewan and the people of Canada hundreds of millions of dollars. The fact is that the Government of Saskatchewan is about to pass a bill, probably today or tomorrow, to bail out the unfortunate people who trusted Pioneer Trust, involving compensation of $20 million or $30 million. The Parliament of Canada has passed a bill under which the Government of Canada will bail out those same people to the extent of $5 million. That is a lot of money and it calls for some little responsibility.

Now we hear accusations that these people had made inside deals; that they borrowed money and bought houses down in Scottsdale. We do not know what happened in the closing days, but we know that they sold property in the United States. Who did they sell it to? We think they might have sold it to their friends at very favourable prices. The tentacles reach down to people there who are of a very unsavoury character.

These have all been public. Also public is the rumour that Mr. Klein and some of his associates who resigned—and it is a fact that they did resign; they resigned after the program—have been given very large pensions.

So, they walked out, or it looks like they walked out or that they may have walked out—I say “may have”—with their pockets full, and yet the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, are left holding the bag and this has resulted in the bill passed by the Parliament of Canada providing compensation in the amount of $5 million and a bill that is now being considered in the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan providing for compensation in the amount of $20 million.

The opposition in Saskatchewan has asked that there be a public inquiry to find out whether or not this is true.

Let me say something about your response that the firm of Touche Ross is looking into this. You and I both know that the job of Touche Ross is to wind this up as quickly as they can and as profitably as they can for Touche Ross. They will not look into what happened in western Canada—in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, in British Columbia—or in Arizona, or in Colorado. They will not look into that. They never have done so and they won't do it in this case. The only means of looking into what happened in those areas would be a public inquiry initiated by the Government of Saskatchewan, and it refuses to hold such an inquiry. The charge has been made that it is refusing because it is covering up for its friends. My question to you is: Will you take this matter back to your government and ask that your government look into it on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada, who are already stuck for at least $5 million?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend really goes too far when he alleges, as he has now done, that the Government of Saskatchewan is acting the way it is because it wishes to—

Senator Steuart: I didn't allege that. I said that that has been alleged in the legislature of Saskatchewan by Opposition Leader Blakeney.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to hear that my honourable friend is not associating his name with that charge. I guess he is just relating to us what he has heard in the legislature of Saskatchewan—and we can take that for what it is worth, because that, like this one, is a political organization. I daresay that some things are said in that forum for a particular purpose. That doesn't alter the point he is making. I simply say that it is wrong for him to allege a political cover-up. He says he is not so alleging, and I am glad to hear that.

The point that he is getting at is the question of whether or not there has been wrongdoing. I cannot stand here as an expert on bankruptcy proceedings, but it seems to me, from knowledge that I have in a general way, that trustees in bankruptcy, if they find that there have been illegal doings or wrongdoings before the bankruptcy took place, report those and something is done about it.

In many bankruptcy cases there are allegations that the people who have gone bankrupt have done something wrong, as a result of which the company is bankrupt. That is not outside the purview of the trustee in bankruptcy.

My honourable friend should allow me to make inquiries as to the terms of reference of this bankruptcy proceeding, to find out whether a prima facie case of wrongdoing—which is what he needs to establish—is indeed in prospect. I am quite willing to do that, and I think that that should satisfy my honourable friend for the time being.

Senator Steuart: I agree with that. Just to back up what I said, I am not claiming this at all. I have the Star-Phoenix of yesterday which says—

Senator Balfour: Senator Olson, as the expert on Beauchesne, is he within the rules?

Senator Steuart: I beg your pardon?

Senator Balfour: I am simply asking Senator Olson, as the expert on Beauchesne, whether what you are doing is within the rules.

Senator Steuart: Oh, I do hope so. I hate to be outside of the rules.

The headline reads: "NDP claims PC cover-up, wants Pioneer inquiry."

That is all I am saying. I am just pushing that on to you, and I am delighted that you are prepared, tomorrow or the next day, to answer the question.

Senator Flynn: For the fourth time.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that we will always respond positively where the public interest is concerned.

Senator Steuart: I hope so.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question asked by Senator Steuart. When the Leader of the Government is looking at the terms of reference of Touche Ross, if he finds that they have not been requested to look into the conduct of the directors of Pioneer Trust over the period involved, would he suggest that that be included in their duties?

Senator Flynn: It's in the law.

Senator Roblin: I believe my honourable friend has his answer.

Senator Sinclair: Then I did not hear it. Senator Flynn says it is the law; but if it is the law, then there is no difficulty in our being told that Touche Ross has specifically been asked to look at the actions of the directors to ascertain whether they have carried out their duties or not.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I should say that Senator Flynn's knowledge of the law is far better than mine will ever be.

Senator Steuart: I doubt that.

Senator Roblin: I would not doubt it, if I were the honourable senator, because it is a confirmed fact. Barrack room lawyers such as my honourable friend and I have a good time with the law. The point is that Senator Flynn advises me that the statutes covering this matter cover directors also; so the question is superfluous.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

VISIT OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER TO YUKON—USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday an important election was held in the Yukon.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: The Conservative government was defeated, but, more importantly, the trend of electing Liberals to provincial and territorial legislatures was continued with the election of Mr. Roger Coles and Mr. James McLaughlin from the Yukon.

My question to the Leader of the Government is as follows: Last Thursday the Deputy Prime Minister took a government jet to the Yukon to announce a policy that had been announced three years ago by the Liberal government. I would like to know if the trend that I believe was set by the Prime Minister on his trip to Ontario during the Ontario election, of not charging the government for the jet, is to apply in this case. I believe the Prime Minister said that he would not charge the government for his trip to Ontario because it was a political trip. I am wondering whether that will apply also to the Deputy Prime Minister in connection with his trip to the Yukon the weekend before the election—which was quite blatantly purely a political trip, since he seems to get to the Yukon about twice a year.

Senator Guay: He couldn't afford it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe my honourable friend is well qualified to recognize a political trip in a government aircraft, because he knows very well that in the record of the previous administration it was a practice frequently indulged in. If my honourable friend wants to know about the trip of the Deputy Prime Minister, the books of the government are open. He need merely go to the department and ask for the information and it will be made available to him.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I have no doubt as to whether or not he made the trip. I am merely saying that it was a political trip. Such a trip was made two weeks ago by the Prime Minister, who said that because it was a political trip he would not charge the government for the use of the aircraft. I have no doubt that the trip to the Yukon was made by the Deputy Prime Minister. Personally, I have never made a political trip in a government jet. But, I have no problem with the Deputy Prime Minister's going to the Yukon on a political trip. I think that's fine, if he wants to do that—although in this case it backfired. I am merely asking whether the federal government should be asked to pay for that particular trip.

Senator Roblin: As I say, my honourable friend can find out how that trip is accounted for by reference to the public information that is available to him.

● (1430)

I should point out that, when information is available in the public domain, it is not usual to inquire about it in this house, nor is it necessary that I should reply to that inquiry.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. All I am asking of the Leader of the Government in the Senate is if he intends to follow the example set by the Prime Minister. The question is no more complicated than that. I am not asking him to set a precedent which has not already been set by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will follow all of the examples set by the Prime Minister, it will satisfy me.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GREEN PAPER ON COMPETITIVENESS AND SECURITY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the Department of External Affairs green paper that was tabled in the other chamber today which describes the economic scene as being substantially downgraded from the level reflected in other statements that have been made by this government. In fact, the green paper professes that Canadian exports are a major weakness of Canadian competitiveness at this time, and then goes on to deal with other things.

I expect that we will get an answer in the budget as to how the government's assessment of the economy stands at this time, but I am concerned about this contradiction with other statements that have been made recently.

There is, however, another contradiction, honourable senators, that perhaps the Leader of the Government could take notice of and get an explanation for. This green paper says that Canada's membership in NATO is not open to question but that it does question whether this country can or should maintain all of the roles assigned to it within NATO, and goes on to make comparisons between the expensive presence in Europe vis-à-vis some of the functions or roles of Canadian defence efforts in such things as North American defence and surveillance for sovereignty purposes and so on. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he could find out for us why this question is raised in the green paper now when apparently the government has already decided that our role in Europe should be enhanced by assigning an additional 1,200 personnel to Europe within the past few weeks. This also seems to be a contradiction, now that we have this green paper which I presume is a discussion paper, in that it raises questions on issues that the government has already decided.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I should start off by saying that my honourable friend is obviously reading from a newspaper report. To the best of my knowledge, the green paper has not yet been tabled in the House of Commons. It may be tabled tomorrow and if it is, a copy will also be tabled in the Senate and copies will be available for all members of this house. That will give my honourable friend an opportunity to read, in full context, the discussion on economic affairs. If he does so, I think he will be convinced by the logic of the argument that the statements made in the green paper are important, serious, and worthy of the consideration of Parliament and of the people. I think that his concern about contradictory statements will evaporate when he reads it in context.

With respect to the other point he made, namely, that the green paper seems to conflict with some of the policy initiatives that the government has already taken in the field of defence, I say to him that we live in a moving world; that decisions have to be made from time to time and they are. However, to say that that precludes the possibility of raising those matters in a green paper is, I think, wrong. After all, here in the Senate we looked into the question of national defence and we questioned whether we could undertake all of the assignments that had been given to us by NATO. In particular, we examined CAST, which is our undertaking to come to the aid of Norway if that country is attacked by its enemies. Indeed, there were some questions raised as to whether or not all of the obligations we have undertaken are ones that we should continue to accept without looking at them again, and certainly this aspect is very much in the public arena these days.

The green paper is not a statement of policy; it is a discussion paper with respect to one or two fundamentals that are contained therein which I think most members of this house would subscribe to. However, there will be plenty of opportunity for my honourable friend to examine these matters and discuss them with his friends and colleagues, because there is going to be a joint committee of this and the other house which will be charged with holding public hearings and listening to the observations of all and sundry.

I do not claim any affection for the green paper. Indeed, anyone who writes a paper on foreign affairs and defence these days can expect to get some static. Also, I expect that there are plenty of comments and observations in that paper that are debatable, and they will be debated and questioned by senators among others, and that is a good thing. However, the fact that, for the first time in this long period, we do have a green paper which provides a focus for discussion, in my opinion, is a good thing and I commend the attention of senators to the joint parliamentary committee that will be studying this green paper with a view to arriving at more definitive proposals.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have no complaint with the government's amending its policy from time to time as circumstances change and as conditions warrant, as a result of such change. There is no question about that.

What we have before us now is something called a green paper, which is interpreted as being a discussion paper to raise those matters that ought to be considered in the light of changing conditions. However, what is contained in this particular green paper is, I think, the raising of a number of matters that apparently have already been decided within the last few days or weeks by the government, such as the magnitude of Canada's role in Europe. Now, apparently, that is being raised again. At any rate, I will wait until the paper is in my hands. I will be very happy to do so, but I would like the Leader of the Government to take note of the fact that we are curious about what appear to be contradictions in the policies that the government is putting forth.

Senator Roblin: I think I am correct in saying that Norway is part of Europe. It was the last time that I looked and I guess it still is. Therefore, it comes within the ambit of what my honourable friend is talking about.

Speaking as one who has some interest in these affairs, I submit that there is nothing wrong with taking a look at what the government is doing and deciding whether or not it should be altered, modified or improved. After all, that is what the green paper is for, in part. The fact that we have done something which was considered to be necessary today does not necessarily mean that it is not open for review at a later stage, and that is what the green paper hopes to do.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB CREATION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week the Prime Minister mentioned that his government had created 201,000 new jobs. As a matter of fact, according to Statistics Canada that figure is 213,000. At that time, the Prime Minister said, "These are the tens of thousands of jobs we were talking about during the election."

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me whether, when the Prime Minister and his colleagues speak about these tens of thousands of jobs, they are speaking about jobs in addition to those that were being created normally by the economy as it was growing out of the recession, and in particular in the last 12 months of the Liberal administration?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I just do not know how to handle that question, but I will say this:—

Senator Frith: You could start out by saying: "My honourable friend should know . . ." That is what you usually say.

Senator Roblin: When I say that, I think my honourable friends usually do know. Most senators do not ask questions unless they think they know the answers. At least that is the way the smart ones operate, let's put it that way.

However, let me say to my honourable friend that there is only one comment I will make with respect to his use of the word "create." I have to say that many politicians and perhaps the Prime Minister is among them—I do it, my honourable friend does it—use the phrase "creating jobs" as if it were the case that you snapped a finger and something happened miraculously. Perhaps I had better not use the Old Testament simile about Eve, but, like an act of creation, it does not work that way at all. As we all know, it is the working together of all aspects of the economy; the people and the labour unions who are working more efficiently; the management that are making decisions; the government which is trying to stay out of the way in some cases and to help in others. It all works together. I am satisfied to think that Canada is creating more employment and we politicians, of course, will take the credit for it when it happens, because we will get the blame for it when it does not. But in all cases I think the same rule applies, and it is the working of the economy that I like to see, and I think it is working better than it has been.

• (1440)

Senator Gigantès: A supplementary question. The Honourable the Leader of the Government says that they will take credit for the economy pushing forth jobs. As Statistics Canada figures show, and as I am sure the Honourable Leader of the Government knows, during the first eight months of the Tories' tenure, they saw the spontaneous generation of 213,000 jobs, or 26,625 jobs a month.

During the last 12 months of the Liberal government, an average of 26,167 jobs a month were spontaneously generated, for which the Liberals should be taking credit, as the Tories are taking credit. The difference between the two figures is 458 jobs a month; multiplied by 12, that comes to 5,496 jobs.

Senator Flynn: Nice speech!

Senator Gigantès: That does not even total 10,000. Where are the tens of thousands of additional jobs that were supposed to be spontaneously generated by the economy simply as a result of the election of a Tory government, as the Right Honourable the Prime Minister told us during the election campaign?

Senator Roblin: I do not think a single job was spontaneously created; they all came about as a result of someone's hard work.

The fact that we are making progress and improving the employment situation in this country should be a source of gratification rather than nit-picking on the part of my honourable friend.

Senator Gigantès: I have learned many lessons related to nit-picking in this chamber from listening to the great talent of the Honourable the Leader of the Government in that field. He is a magnificent debater, but the fact is that 458 more jobs a month have been generated during 1984-85 than were generated earlier. That does not even total 10,000 jobs, and those figures, if the leader cares to look at them, are not consonant even with the increase in population during that period of time. So, where is the surge in new job creation following the election of a Tory government?

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend on one thing; he is not likely to learn anything from me. I will not follow that up with the obvious rejoinder; I will simply leave that with him.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

VIEWS OF LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Over the past few years the leader has been a very articulate advocate of an elected Senate; as a matter of fact, I would say the leader has been the leading advocate of an elected Senate. I wonder if he still advocates the same elected Senate today as he did then.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my honourable friend will have to wait until we hold the federal-provincial conference on the constitution of the Senate in order to be aware of what the policy of the government is.

I have been a strong supporter of an elected Senate over the years. I think that that is a principle that has much merit. Maybe the particular pattern that I have proposed is capable of improvement—I am sure that it is—but the policy of the government on that matter has yet to be formulated.

If I am to stay in my present seat, I had better wait to see what that policy is before I get any further into the debate with my honourable friend.

Senator Everett: I gather that at this point the leader is still personally in favour of an elected Senate.

Senator Roblin: Senator Stewart does not allow me to give personal opinions.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED RELOCATION OF CO-OP IMPLEMENTS FROM WINNIPEG TO REGINA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to oral questions, and if there is no objection, I ask that they be taken as read. The first answer is to a question raised on February 18, 1985, by Senator Guay in connection with the proposed relocation of Co-op Implements in Winnipeg.

The Minister advises that CCIL publicly announced at its annual board meeting on February 15, 1985, that it was discontinuing its manufacturing operation in Winnipeg. It stated that the manufacturing rights and production equipment had been sold to Vicon Inc., a Canadian subsidiary of Thyssen-Bornemisza N.V., a large diversified Dutch company which plans to establish a manufacturing facility in western Canada. Vicon will continue to manufacture and develop the CCIL line of products which CCIL will distribute through its network of some 50 depots throughout the prairie provinces.

To my knowledge, no final decision has yet been made by Vicon as to the location of its manufacturing plant.

END OF DECADE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION AND AGENDA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second answer is to a question raised in the Senate on March 13, 1985, by Senator Marsden with regard to the End of Decade Women's Conference being planned for Nairobi.

It is not expected that the Canadian Delegation to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the U.N. Decade for Women, to be held in Nairobi July 15-26, 1985, will be named until shortly before the conference itself. Nevertheless, consultations with interested Canadian citizens and organizations concerning the agenda of the conference have been under way for some time. Two national meetings have been held with women's groups to provide them with information and to seek their suggestions for Canadian positions at the conference.

The draft of the principal document for the conference has been circulated to provincial officials and national women's groups and their views and comments have been sought. Immediately prior to the conference, comprehensive briefings will be arranged for the delegation as well as for Canadian journalists who will be in Nairobi, and the representatives of Canadian organizations being sponsored by the government to attend a parallel non-governmental meeting—Forum '85.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

REMUNERATION OF SENIOR OFFICIALS AND OTHERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator MacEachen and Senator Sinclair with regard to remuneration of senior officials and others.

The government, in setting the salaries of Mr. McMurtry and Mr. Lewis, was seeking to provide these two distinguished public figures with adequate remuneration for their heavy responsibilities representing Canada in Britain and at the United Nations.

We considered that the remuneration received by the persons appointed to the positions should be comparable to that received by Heads of Mission with similar responsibilities, for example, the Heads of Mission in Paris and Washington; this was not done by the previous government.

With regard to Senator Sinclair's question about the effect of the exchange rate on the remuneration of the High Commissioner in London, I would explain that salaries per se are not set to take into account changes in foreign exchange rates, but an allowance called "Salary Equalization", paid to government employees assigned abroad, is adjusted to reflect currency changes and ensures that the purchasing power in terms of the local currency remains comparable to that in Ottawa.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—DR. URSULA FRANKLIN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate by Senator Marsden on April 25 with regard to Dr. Ursula Franklin.

Dr. Ursula Franklin's name had been submitted, among others, for consideration for appointment to the Atomic Energy Control Board.

It was brought to Cabinet's attention, however, that Dr. Franklin held concerns about the secrecy provisions of the oath required for all board members (Section 18(1) of the Atomic Energy Control Act makes the taking of an oath of fidelity and secrecy mandatory.) These reservations were subsequently confirmed in a letter from Dr. Franklin to the federal energy minister, Pat Carney. Under the circumstance, Dr. Franklin's appointment had to be reconsidered at this time. As a result, no Order in Council was ever issued.

The letter to Dr. Franklin from Minister Carney informing her of the board appointment was sent by error. The administrative slip was explained to Dr. Franklin who understood and accepted the apologies from the minister's staff for any embarrassment caused by the oversight.

No decision has been made on an appointment to the remaining vacancy on the board.

THE SENATE

OFFICE OF SPEAKER—NEWSPAPER REPORT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, it seems that I made the headlines of a Toronto newspaper, namely the Globe and Mail.

Senator Guay: Congratulations!

Senator Riel: I was handed the item in question and I read it with care and some amusement. Since I was in the country at the time, I missed all the hubbub around this incident. I was in an atmosphere of calm, relaxation, and perhaps even exquisite delight!

In any case, I wanted to say that I have read this item published on May 10, 1985 in the Globe and Mail and entitled:

[Senator Roblin.]

[English]

Survey of Duty Met by Unanimous Silence.

[Translation]

This article quotes two or three sentences of mine, with a partly exaggerated partly false comment thrown in, the whole thing topped with a two-column heading.

The word "survey" in the title was translated, since I was called from a radio station in Quebec City to talk about it. This surprised me. I asked: "What 'questionnaire', I never used such a word." I never used the word "survey", either.

I was told that I had distributed a questionnaire, as mentioned in the article. I never distributed any questionnaire either to the senators or to anybody else. I do not intend to do so.

If you refer to the speech I made in French in the Senate—and I must tell Senator Flynn that I quote myself with pleasure—we find on page 787 of the Senate Hansard for April 23:

This was the summary I made of various activities that demonstrate the usefulness of the Senate. It is not an exhaustive list. I drew up the list according to my own lights, but I would urge my fellow senators to add to the list or to correct it—

I then said:

I would therefore urge honourable senators to submit their views, because this is not a partisan effort. We are talking about what the Senate means. I think it is something that is very little known.

Two weeks later, while making another speech in the Senate on a different issue, I made a digression. At that time, I was speaking in English, and as the late Ernest Lapointe used to say, my English is sometimes laboured.

I said at that time:

[English]

I did ask senators to help me in a non-partisan way to complete—

[Translation]

Apparently, the Debates of the Senate which I had not read has the word "compile" instead of "complete". Obviously, either the word was mispronounced or the stenographer did not hear well, whichever it was. But my text was as follows:

[English]

—to complete the list of duties or occupations of the senators. To date, after two weeks I must say that a unanimous silence has met my invitation. I have not received one response, which is good for my humility.

[Translation]

I must therefore say that those two or three sentences quoted from the Senate's Hansard are part of the debate, although I did not use the word "compile" that is printed in the English version. I asked honourable senators earlier to approve the change from "compile" to "complete". As I said, this probably was due to my mispronunciation.

Besides, my comment was half-serious, half-humorous. It was a reference to my previous speech more than anything else. I thought most senators had not had time to read it or act on it.

Anyway, I never issued any questionnaire. And indeed, in the French version of April 23, I invited the honourable senators to make corrections or additions. In my view, they could do so in public, in committee, in the Senate or elsewhere, not necessarily to me. I would have been happy to hear from them.

Anyway, my speech of April 23, which until then had remained obscure, raised quite an interest thanks to the report in the Globe and Mail of May 10. This even led to a telephone interview with station CHRL in Quebec City, during which I discussed the Senate's functions and usefulness. I hope that further to his interest in my brief comments, the Globe and Mail reporter will publish in extenso my non-exhaustive list of senators' responsibilities. This no doubt will contribute to the parliamentary education of Canadians.

Also, since that report appeared last Thursday, a few senators have made their reactions known to me. I received telephone calls and notes. Those reactions may have been due to my speech, but certainly they were prompted by the Globe and Mail report. Some senators wanted to know where they could find my list or questionnaire. Others complained about not having received it.

So, even if the Globe and Mail report is not correct, this may not be entirely the reporter's fault, because the result is positive just the same, even if at the beginning no positive impact on the Senate was foreseen by the reporter.

As Saint Augustine once said, it is a felix culpa. I ask leave to change the word "compile" to "complete", in the fourth paragraph of my speech on page 883, in the English version of our Hansard for May 9, 1985.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I think this bill will be more readily understood by reading the preamble, and therefore would like to quote the preamble while pointing out the changes that were made.

This may bring back memories for some honourable senators as it did for me.

● (1500)

The Bretton Woods Agreements go back to 1944, at the end of the Second World War. They became effective and had force of law in Canada from 1945 on.

Bill C-30 has made a slight change in the preamble. This is how it reads now:

WHEREAS the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference held at Bretton Woods in July 1944 prepared the Articles of Agreement set out in the First Schedule for an International Monetary Fund and in the Second Schedule for an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development;

When we read "and in the Second Schedule for an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development", these are the changes or amendments made to the previous text because of the amalgamation of the second agency. The preamble goes on as follows:

AND WHEREAS since that time there have been prepared Articles of Agreement set out in the Third Schedule for an International Development Association and in the Fourth Schedule for an International Finance Corporation;

The references to these two institutions are also part of the changes in the preamble. Finally, I will quote the third paragraph of the preamble:

AND WHEREAS it is expedient that Canada become a member of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation and that provision be made for acceptance by Canada of the Agreements therefor and for carrying out the obligations and exercising any rights of Canada thereunder:

Thus, the Bretton Woods Agreements created the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Later on, in 1960, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation were created.

The first stage was the reconstruction of Europe after the war. It was with this task in mind that financial resources were pooled and the World Bank was created.

Later on, once the initial task of Europe's reconstruction was accomplished, or at least to a large extent, the focus shifted to developing countries and to finding ways to finance their development.

Thus were born the organizations mentioned in the preamble of the bill. This legislation is rather technical. The word "housekeeping" is often used in English, I have never found the proper term in French. Could it be "travail domestique"? I have no idea.

Senator Frith: Du travail à la maison!

Senator Leblanc: De la régie interne!

Senator Flynn: "Faire le ménage". I thought that I should ask the advice of my wife, but I am not sure if she could have helped me.

The bill has three aims. Firstly, it would provide under a legislation a new authority to ensure the participation of Canada to the International Finance Corporation. Secondly, it would allow the consolidation of the provisions aimed at all members of the World Bank group. Thirdly, the bill would standardize the appropriation process to fund the institutions in the World Bank group so that they will be consistent with those approved for the regional development banks in 1982.

The bill has arisen of the necessity of establishing provisions on the participation of Canada to the International Finance Corporation. Although Canada is a member of that organization since its creation in 1956, no legislation has been passed on this.

Since its creation, the IFC, the International Finance Corporation, has proven a very effective tool to stimulate the private sector in underdeveloped countries. This is the stage which we have reached after having devoted ourselves to the reconstruction of Europe in the postwar years. In order to attain that aim, the IFC supported the development of financial markets in underdeveloped countries to channel local resources. The IFC also acts as a catalyst for foreign investments, while trying to steer those investments towards priority projects which contribute to the country's overall development objectives. In 1984, IFC members agreed to double the corporation's capital to $1.3 billion American dollars. This measure should enable the IFC to invest about $4.5 billion over the next five years in projects estimated at roughly $30 billion all told.

The second amendment in the bill would make it possible to rearrange the legislative provisions concerning the three institutions which make up the World Bank Group. Besides the IFC, those institutions include the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, better known as the World Bank, and the International Development Association, IDA for short. I do not see any need to say more about the latter two. Together they provide some $15 billion a year to developing countries to support their investments in high priority projects. More and more, the institutions so channel their loans as to promote political and institutional reforms designed to pave the way for the most efficient use of resources available in developing countries. The difference between the World Bank and IDA lies mainly in their sources of financing and the respective economic situation of the countries which borrow from them.

The World Bank borrows on financial markets on the strength of its Triple-A credit rating, thus securing funds for insolvent nations. The World Bank's credit rating is based on its "callable capital" which is guaranteed by its members and the financial standing it has achieved over the past 25 years. By using its callable capital—that is, by calling upon contributing countries—the World Bank can finance a program of huge loans by securing only a very small financial contribution from some of its members. To this day World Bank members have paid in only 8.75 per cent of total capital and the World Bank never had to use its callable capital.

On the other hand, IDA make loans under very favourable terms to the poorest countries. Consequently, it cannot borrow on financial markets. Its resources come entirely from its members. However, the projects must be of the highest quality and promise a high rate of economic return. When necessary, IDA will finance also the provision of the necessary technical aid required to meet the objectives of the projects.

[Senator Flynn.]

The third amendment in this bill deals with the manner in which payments made by Canada to the World Bank Group are approved or rather will be approved from now on. Instead of the figures being mentioned in the legislation itself, as is the case now and as was the case before for the World Bank and IDA, the amounts made available by Canada to each of these institutions will be subject every year to approval when the estimates are tabled in the house. In this way, it will no longer be necessary to amend the legislation whenever additional contributions are called upon, either directly to the institutions, or through special agreements such as the special assistance scheme to help sub-Saharan Africa which was recently put together by the World Bank. This would provide the House of Commons and the Senate with the opportunity to assess the payments made to each institution of the World Bank Group in the light of our spending for other assistance schemes, and to decide on the advisability of these payments at the time the estimates are tabled.

Canada participated recently in negotiations leading to the selective increase of the capital base of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, more commonly known as the World Bank. The total cost of the additional contributions which Canada may subscribe, would reach some $320 million in Canadian dollars of today. However, as I mentioned earlier, only 8.75 per cent of the nominal value of these contributions, that is, some $28 million in Canadian currency, are to be effectively paid over a period of four or five years. The rest of our subscription is "callable" and represents a potential liability for the Canadian government. By securing such a participation, Canada will be able to hold in the future 2.92 per cent of the total capital of the World Bank and will have the right to appoint a Canadian to the board of directors of the World Bank. We will then be in a position to examine closely the policies and projects of the World Bank and see to it that it maintains its good financial reputation.

Under the terms of the recently signed agreement to double the capital of the International Finance Corporation to $1.3 billion in US currency, the total of which must be paid, Canada has the right to increase its subscription to maintain its participation at its current level of 3.85 per cent. This increase would cost Canada $25 million in US currency, payable over the next five years.

The 7th reconstitution of IDA's resources was negotiated last year. It provides for the payment of $9 billion over the next three years, more specifically between 1985 and 1988. Canada has agreed to contribute 4.5 per cent of these resources, that is $500.1 million in Canadian currency. Moreover, Canada recently advised the World Bank that it would pay $100 million in Canadian currency as a contribution to the $1.1 billion US fund for the special assistance scheme to help sub-Saharan Africa. This fund will be administered by IDA specifically to support the programs of policy reforms and structural adjustments devised to break the vicious circle in which African countries find themselves at the present time. IDA makes special efforts to increase the agricultural production of the region.

Most payments to the IBRD, the IFC and the IDA will be made through callable non interest-bearing notes issued by the Minister of Finance over the next four years. However, the notes will be called over a longer period of time, as the institutions finance projects and programs in developing countries. That is why the replenishments and increases in capital stock will have a minor impact on our annual budgets and they are taken into account in government estimates. The government had hoped that Bill C-30 would receive approval soon enough for these payments to be authorized in the 1985-86 main estimates. As this has not been possible, we intend to request the necessary power in the supplementary estimates.

Honourable senators, we are experiencing trying economic times, but the sad conditions which are particularly severe in developing countries and what actually goes on in those countries have a direct impact on Canadians with respect to our exports, our employment situation and the stability of our financial structures.

Recently, Canadians have reacted with unprecedented generosity to the needs of drought-stricken African countries. The bill now under consideration will allow us to reaffirm that Canada will not abandon the developing countries at a time when they need us most. They also reaffirm Canada's strong support for the multilateral endeavours of which the World Bank Group is a shining example and which have done so much to maintain peace and ensure the well-being of nations through these trying times.

It is in this context that I urge honourable senators to confirm the commitment of Canada to those institutions and ask them to grant quick passage to this bill.

I am informed that there is some urgency in approving this bill, but I was not advised of the reasons for this. In any case, because of the delays in negotiating the reconstitution of IDA resources, the lending power of this agency has nearly run out.

It is therefore especially important that this bill receive approval in time for the Government to table supplementary estimates authorizing our first payments so that they will be made before the end of the World Bank's fiscal year, which is June 30.

If honourable senators so wish it, naturally, after second reading, this bill can be referred to the committee where additional explanations can be provided.

Those who would like to refresh their memories more fully are invited to read the schedules of the acts of 1945 and 1960. These contain a whole series of highly complex documents which might help cure their insomnia if they really need it!

For the moment, I urge you to approve this bill in principle.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

MEAT INSPECTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-33, respecting the import and export of and interprovincial trade in meat products, the registration of establishments, the inspection of animals and meat products in registered establishments and the standards for those establishments and for animals slaughtered and meat products prepared in those establishments.

• (1510)

She said: Honourable senators, when I first came to this rather dignified and solemn chamber, I doubted that my first words spoken would be in defence of meat inspection. But here we are!

As the Minister of Agriculture said in the other house, this bill is long overdue. We need to pass this legislation to give clear authority to Agriculture Canada meat inspectors as they perform their vitally important function. Moreover, this bill will give consumers a firmer guarantee of the quality and the wholesomeness of Canadian meat.

A great deal depends on maintaining that support. Sales by Canadian packing plants amount to roughly $8 billion a year, and the industry provides direct employment for about 33,000 Canadians. Exports of meat products generate $750 million every year.

Essentially, Bill C-33 will revoke the obsolete Meat and Canned Foods Act of 1907 and consolidate the existing Meat Inspection Act and the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act.

There are six major features of the bill. First, it provides the legal basis to condemn and dispose of diseased animals and unwholesome meat products. Secondly, it provides the legal authority to inspect imports of meat products and to remove from Canada any imported meat product found to be unwholesome or otherwise in non-compliance with the Canadian standard.

In studying this bill, honourable senators, I was surprised to find that we had no legal authority whatsoever under the existing act to inspect imported meat products. This was simply done by the Inspections Branch, but in the event of a challenge, there was no legal basis for the inspection.

Third, it provides the legal basis to insist on the humane slaughter of all animals in federally inspected establishments. Fourth, it provides penalty provisions for violations of the meat inspection regulations. Fifth, it provides adequate protection against misuse of the meat inspection legend, which is the stamp that shows that the meat has been inspected by Agriculture Canada. And sixth, it provides the legal authority to charge fees for the inspection and the re-inspection of meat products.

The present legislation does not provide a legal basis for many meat inspection activities that are currently carried out. In many cases, the penalties for infractions under the existing legislation are so low that they could be considered a licence to continue an illegal practice.

The new legislation will provide more effective penalties for non-compliance. It allows for jail penalties for conviction on indictment of serious offences, such as the fraudulent use of the meat inspection legend.

At the same time, the bill has been drafted in compliance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A search warrant will be required for entry into principal residences, such as homes and apartments, and police officers must be present if force is required.

The new legislation will make the inspection of imported meats and meat products mandatory. It will provide for cost recovery for import inspection.

The present Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act provides virtually no legal protection to animals presented for slaughter. By incorporating that act with the Meat Inspection Act and providing for separate regulations, the protection offered will be greatly enhanced.

The new legislation will provide for the incorporation of the trademarks provision for the meat inspection legend. This will facilitate legal proceedings in the event of the misuse of that legend.

The proposed legislation will not expand existing inspection activities and therefore will not result in additional financial expenditure.

And finally, honourable senators, I should like to mention that our trading partners will welcome the strengthening of the legislative basis for meat inspection in Canada.

Given the clear need for this bill and the fact that it enjoys the support of the Canadian Meat Council, I urge honourable senators to approve its second reading at this time.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Robertson.

On a very cursory look at the bill, I cannot find anything that reassures me that we will now be able to import haggis, something which is not possible under the current legislation, apparently because some ingredients are not in compliance with Canadian standards.

While under this bill we will be able to inspect imported meats, I am not assured that, in future, we will be able to import haggis.

Am I right in assuming that?

Senator Robertson: I am afraid I cannot give you an answer in relation to the importation of haggis. However, I feel certain that, if the product sought to be imported meets the specifications, it could indeed be imported. I will get you that specific information, if you so desire.

On motion of Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE OFFICE OF SPEAKER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Riel, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to his tenure as Speaker of the Senate, his experiences and his recommendations to the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Riel, P.C.).

[Senator Robertson]

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I will not take much of your time. I would simply like to put something on the record, because it is my turn to be away for a few weeks. I referred last week, on May 9, to the authority of the Speaker of the Senate. At the end of my speech, Senator Godfrey asked for leave to be heard because he was going away. I am doing the same thing today.

As a matter of fact, it is concerning Senator Godfrey's remark that I would like to put something on the record, so as not to let things remain uncorrected.

I will read, for the sake of accurateness, what I have here in front of me.

• (1520)

[English]

Last Thursday, May 9, I gave another instalment of my report on my term of office as Speaker. I dealt with the constitutional and statutory basis of the Office of the Speaker and with the legal basis of the powers of the Speaker in the administration of the Senate. At the conclusion of my speech, Senator Godfrey said:

I had a research paper prepared by officers of the Library of Parliament on the administrative role of the Speaker of the Senate. That paper is dated March 28, 1980. I remember giving the late Senator Grosart who, at that time, was the Speaker of the Senate, a copy of this paper, and when Senator Marchand became Speaker, I also sent him a copy, but I neglected to send one to Senator Riel. I certainly will provide him with a copy of it. I have not read that paper for five years but my recollection of it, without going into the details, is that it does not agree with Senator Riel's comments. The result of that research is that the Speaker has no administrative powers.

Senator Godfrey did send me a photostat copy of the document to which he referred and which he had said he had not read in five years. I shall read the covering letter sent to Senator Godfrey by the then researcher in the Parliamentary Library, concerning this document. It says:

Dear Senator Godfrey:

I enclose a paper entitled "The Administrative Role of the Speaker of the Senate", which I hope answers at least partially the questions which you have posed. As indicated in the paper the tendency in the Senate, in contrast to the House of Commons, favours the exercise of control over administrative policy by the Senate itself, principally through its Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. The Speaker of the Senate, as a result, does not hold the sort of administrative authority which is associated with the office of Speaker of the House of Commons. Of course, precise delineations of authority in all circumstances are impossible to provide in respect of a body such as the Senate which operated as much by custom, understanding and tradition as by codified rules.

That is the covering letter sent to Senator Godfrey by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. There is more.

The document itself, on the title page, contains an important caveat, which reads as follows:

Note: Projects prepared by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament are designed in accordance with the requirements and instructions of the Member making the request. The views expressed should not therefore be regarded as those of the Research Branch or of the individual preparing the project.

Three lines below it says:

Not to be published.

Ne doit pas être publié.

With that caveat, in my view the document undoubtedly is not a legal opinion. It is merely a letter of comfort, as bankers would call it, which in no way constitutes a letter of guarantee.

The researcher obviously starts off from different premises and follows a different road from mine. He follows the trends and I look at the laws which create the office of the Speaker. The researcher does not refer to, or consider, article 18 of the Constitution; articles 4 and 5, Chapter S-8 of the statutes; Chapter S-14; or the order in council appointing the Speaker and mentioning the powers of the Speaker. Neither does he refer to the law or the principles of interpretation. I am sure the researcher would readily admit that his work is not exhaustive, and that explains the caveat on the title page of the document.

If it is with such a document that some leading senators satisfy themselves and want the Senate to be guided, it is really dumbfounding. It will not then surprise honourable senators when I state that I maintain all of my conclusions in my speech of May 9. My prima facie case for the authority of the Speaker in the administration of the Senate is not altered, nor shaken; as a matter of fact, I consider it not even challenged.

On motion of Senator Riel, debate adjourned.

HEALTH

ILL EFFECTS OF SMOKING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the ill effects of smoking to smokers and non-smokers alike.—
(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this order stands adjourned in the name of Senator Petten, because he felt that some other honourable senator might wish to speak on this inquiry. Senator Bosa may wish to close the debate on the inquiry and he has asked me to adjourn it. Therefore, the order stands in the name of Senator Petten until May 23 next.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Keith Davey, pursuant to notice of May 8, 1985, moved:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.

● (1530)

He said: Honourable senators, at the outset let me make it clear that this motion is not a whim, not an idle suggestion nor simply a caprice. It is a serious, thoughtful, carefully considered proposal. I am shocked to realize and distressed to inform you that next February, I will have been in this place for 20 years. I have not always been a diligent senator but, from time to time, I have been enormously involved. Through all of those years from the very beginning through this past weekend, I have lived, as have all of us, with this stereotype which, even today, would impress Walter Lippmann. As he said, we are all ancient, useless hacks who are overpaid and do nothing at all, and don't do that very well. The stereotype is force-fed day after day by journalists, broadcasters and frequently even by academics who should know better.

In this business—or is it a game, a science, a skill, an art or whatever?—of politics, perception, as you all know, is reality, so you know what that says about us as senators.

Bill C-11, of course, exacerbated the stereotype. As God is my judge, we had absolutely no intention of thwarting the will of the popularly-elected lower chamber. As we saw it, we were doing our duty. Be that as it may—

Senator Flynn: Who is “we”?

Senator Davey: I am referring to the Liberal members of the Senate committee who dealt with that bill, and indeed to the attitude of caucus in the subsequent debate. As we saw it, we were doing our duty. In any event, the Prime Minister saw it differently and two things happened: first of all, an entirely new harvest of media hostility towards the Senate was generated. Then the Honourable John Crosbie's questionable resolution came forth. That resolution, incidentally, has been widely criticized by much of that self-same media. However, that, Senator Flynn, is another speech.

The facts of this chamber are very different from its image. There is no need to belabour here our purpose, our achievements, our intrinsic worth, or even the long list of remarkable senators, past and present, who have served Canadians so well from this chamber. Three examples will suffice: First of all, the government leader is a distinguished parliamentarian who served many years as the Premier of Manitoba. My own leader is perhaps the most skilled parliamentarian of his generation. In fact, honourable senators, there could be no better television than some of those Roblin-MacEachen exchanges that we have been privileged to watch during the last six months. These leaders are giants, as is my friend Senator Croll whose lifetime of service to Canada is legendary. I think of Senator Croll not only as a mentor and a man for all seasons, but it is Senator Croll who has most persistently and most ardently promoted television and the televising of our proceedings. Indeed, it was Senator Croll who spurred my own current initiative.

Briefly, let me state why I would like to have the Senate seen on television. First of all, television has already become far and away the most significant medium of communication. Happily, print still orders society's agenda. There is no doubt about that, but it is principally television which determines how society will respond to each item on that agenda.

The Senate of Canada badly and immediately needs public impact. There is no better way to let Canadians see for themselves who we are and what it is we are doing. Second, and in particular, the Senate's use of contemporary means of communication would perhaps help to dispel our keen and vintage image. Modern politicians should employ modern means of communication. Third, television in the House of Commons has been a distinct success. It has worked well for Canadians. It has been of inestimable value; it has brought parliamentarians directly into the homes and into the lives of ordinary Canadians. Surely this is what democracy is all about.

I would like to add one footnote about television in the other place. There is one concern we can set aside. The editing of television in the house has been proven fair to all concerned. Incidentally, honourable senators, I rather deliberately included in my motion reference to Senate committees, because so often that is where the Senate is at its very best.

Dealing with the arguments against televising our proceedings, one argument which I have heard most often, and I intend to be very frank about it, is that we will embarrass ourselves. What a sorry observation to make about this great old historic chamber. If that argument has any validity at all, then let us scrap the Senate, Debates of the Senate and close the public gallery. After all, honourable senators, television is simply an electronic extension of the public gallery. I concede at once that we must get our act together to improve and to become more effective. Indeed, that is one of the reasons why I am sponsoring this motion. It will force us all to become even better parliamentarians.

There are two other questions: When would we be seen on the screen, and how much would it cost? The CBC, as most honourable senators know, has a parliamentary channel which is not in use much of the time. At the very least, Senate sittings or portions thereof could be carried on TV each evening. On the other hand, Senate committees could be televised live because certainly at this time, the House of Commons committees have not yet made themselves available to television. In any event, I believe that times of broadcasting could easily be worked out.

The cost would, of course, be substantial. It cost approximately $5 million to establish television in the House of Commons and about $1 million per year thereafter to operate. For the Senate the cost would likely be about half as much to establish, but it would cost about the same amount annually to operate. I would like to stress to honourable senators at this time that these are ballpark figures.

However, either the Senate is significant and its members have useful things to say, or else we should all quietly disappear into the night. The value of democracy in action, honourable senators, simply cannot be measured in dollars and cents.

Honourable senators, I appreciate your courtesy, your time and your attention. I hope that a useful debate will ensue and that out of this debate television in the Senate will receive broad acceptance from every corner of the chamber. With that acceptance in hand, I would hope and expect that the government leader would move expeditiously to bring television into the Senate. In that way, the Senate will finally come alive.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: May I ask a question of my honourable friend? Based on the principles that he has elucidated and the arguments in favour of the democratic process, as it would be exemplified through our exposure to the media, would he agree that perhaps in extending these principles, television coverage should also be given to the party caucuses? Would he agree that perhaps in extending these principles, television coverage should be given to the party caucuses?

● (1540)

Senator Davey: I could not imagine coverage of party caucus meetings by television because caucus meetings are private gatherings, as I am sure Senator Lang knows.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the motion states: "Arrangements for radio and television broadcasting." I cannot recall that the honourable senator mentioned radio in his remarks.

Is that due to the fact that he is aware that the chamber has been recording the debates for approximately five years?

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I did not make any reference to radio in my original motion, so I simply did not address that subject when I spoke today.

Senator Phillips: I am puzzled by the reply. The honourable senator said that he did not make any reference to radio, yet the motion, as printed, states:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.

So, honourable senators can see the reason for my being puzzled.

Senator Davey: Then that is my mistake; I should have corrected Hansard.

Let me make it clear that I have no objection to our proceedings being broadcast on radio. I would encourage that, as a matter of fact. I dealt only with television because I believe that is the principal means of communicating directly with the people of Canada.

If that is in Hansard, the mistake is mine in that I should have corrected the motion.

Senator Phillips: I thank the honourable senator for his reply and move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GREEN PAPER ON COMPETITIVENESS AND SECURITY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to refer the Leader of the Government in the Senate to an answer he gave yesterday to my question respecting a paper that he has tabled in the Senate today—namely, a green paper on foreign affairs which was, in fact, tabled in the other place yesterday afternoon.

Yesterday, when my honourable friend replied to my question, he expressed the hope that, if and when I had had an opportunity to read this paper in its context rather than taking it from a newspaper report, my concerns over contradictory statements would evaporate. I can tell the Leader of the Government that they have not evaporated; in fact, my apprehension has increased substantially since then in terms of the service to the Canadian public. Apparently, there is going to be a joint committee set up to which this paper will be referred. The difficulty is that the government has practically stated that decisions on some of the matters raised in this paper will be made before that committee reports. That is, I think, an unacceptable abuse of Parliament—

Senator Flynn: Excessive, excessive.

Senator Olson: I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us whether decisions are to be left until the committee reports on such matters as defence, a subject on which we are to expect another paper—and I am not sure whether it is going to be a green paper or a white paper. In any event, it is expected that we will receive that paper within the next two or three months. Yet the committee to which this paper will be referred—and I would point out that this paper does talk about the interrelationship between defence policy and foreign policy—is not expected to report within that time frame. I hope that the Leader of the Government will be able to explain the purpose of this paper if this is the procedure that will be followed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will deal with the question regarding defence policy first, honourable senators. My honourable friend is correct when he says that we can expect a white paper on defence quite soon, which will no doubt subsume the focus of our concern regarding defence policy.

With respect to the green paper we already have before us, the government will not make decisions on matters included in the green paper, if it is possible to avoid doing so, for the reasons my honourable friend has stated, but one has to recognize the possibility—and I put it no higher than that—that it may be necessary to deal with some matters in advance of completion of the studies. However, we hope not. Still, it cannot be positively ruled out, as my honourable friend will understand.

The purpose of a green paper, of course, is to try to stimulate interest on the part of the Canadian public in the field of foreign affairs. In my opinion, that is a subject that is sometimes neglected by Parliament, although honourable senators have been fairly active in that domain. The aim of the exercise is to arouse public interest in the subject and to secure public input.

Although statements made in the green paper are not strikingly new—how could that possibly be the case?—they still involve issues over which there is considerable debate as to what the right policy ought to be.

Senator Frith: I would think that is the understatement of the year.

Senator Olson: I do not want to retreat from the assertion that this is a ridiculous and disrespectful way to treat Parliament.

To put before Parliament a green paper, the purpose of which is to generate discussion on matters on which the government has put out options rather than a statement of its policy, and at the same time to tell Parliament that it is prepared to present a white paper, which contains government policy, before the study gets under way, as I have said, displays a great deal of disrespect for Parliament, for its members and what they are expected to do.

So, I wonder if the Leader of the Government can try to explain why the government is proceeding with a commitment to present a white paper on defence before the committee has had an opportunity to examine the topics set out in the green paper, and which constitute our options with respect to our role in Europe and North America.

Senator Roblin: I think the two papers are part of the same process: one is a green paper, which is a little more relaxed with respect to statements of policy; the other is a white paper. But while the latter sets out government policy, that policy is not set in concrete. Both these documents are intended to bring matters of considerable importance to the attention of the Canadian public. Both papers will be subject to public comment and observation.

I am quite sure, depending on the kinds of representations made either on the green or the white paper, that they will have an effect on subsequent policy.

Senator Olson: I will ask a final supplementary question, if for no other reason than that I do not seem to be getting anywhere. I cannot believe that the Leader of the Government misunderstood my question.

Senator Flynn: You were more subtle and more understanding when you were sitting in his seat.

Senator Olson: The leader continues to define for me the difference between a white paper and a green paper. I know the difference.

Why are we being told that we will receive a white paper on defence, one which will contain government policy, and that it will be presented prior to the committee's examining the options? As I said earlier, that is being disrespectful to Parliament. Why does the leader not deal with that rather than trying to deal with these other things?

Senator Roblin: I would be glad to deal with that. Parliament will be dealing with both the green paper and the white paper; Parliament is not precluded from dealing with the white paper. In fact, it is intended that Parliament will deal with them. My friend does not like the timing or the connection between the two. Well, he is welcome to his opinion.

● (1410)

Senator Frith: What is the committee supposed to do?

Senator Olson: Yes, what is the committee supposed to do?

Senator Roblin: The committee will decide its policy when it meets; it will decide its own affairs. My honourable friend knows that these committees, particularly ones with Senate representatives, are ones that are able to make up their own minds as to how they will deal with matters before them.

Senator Frith: The point is, what can it do except take a useless trip around the world?

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, perhaps my question ought not to be directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I will ask it of him anyway.

[English]

Senator Flynn: You're invited, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Thanks for inviting me, but no, I won't.

Senator Roblin: I should like to ask you to respect the honourable senator who is trying to ask a question. I cannot hear what he is saying.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I did not want to disturb my colleague Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: No, it was Senator Frith.

Senator Denis: Well, both did interrupt me, as they are wont to do.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PARLIAMENT HILL

LANDSCAPING EAST OF CENTRE BLOCK

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Speaker pro tempore to satisfy my curiosity and, I suspect, that of other senators, and tell us what is happening east of the Centre Block, next to the Senate. The beautiful grass has been removed and replaced by crushed stone. I do not know what kind of plant they want to build there, but I would be very interested to know what the government or the Speaker of the Senate intend to do.

If the Speaker pro tempore does not know, he might convey the message to the Speaker of the Senate to satisfy our curiosity by telling us what is going on and how much this project will cost.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am always afraid to ask that question for fear that it will turn out to be a parking lot or something disagreeable like that. I will try to find out for my honourable friend because my curiosity has been stimulated, and he prompts me to find the answer.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GREEN PAPER ON COMPETITIVENESS AND SECURITY

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the green paper. I have been advised, although I did not see the program, that the minister on television, and possibly in the report, made the point that the referring of this paper to a joint committee means that it will be the first time that Canadians have been invited to have an input into foreign policy before parliamentary committees.

I would like to comment on the fact that this paper is heavily weighted toward economic and trade matters, although it is a foreign policy paper. I would first like to applaud the minister for that emphasis in this paper because trading relationships are an increasingly important element in our foreign policy, and, of course, our most important foreign relationship is that between Canada and the United States and includes our mutual trade, which is foremost in our considerations today.

Regarding the suggestion that this will be the first time that Canadians will have input into this matter before parliamentary committees, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will send the minister a copy of the reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs which over the past few years has conducted studies on the Caribbean, and on our relationship with the European Community, also the three volumes on Canada-United States trade, and our present study on Canada's relationship with countries of the Middle East and North Africa and the testimony of several hundred witnesses before that committee on all of these subjects from all parts of Canada and all walks of life?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: For once, I know Senator Roblin's answer is going to be, "Yes, I will."

Senator Roblin: Before I say, "Yes, I will," I want to say that I am not surprised to hear my honourable friend advert to the trade focus in this green paper because I do not think any committee of Parliament has done more to examine the impact of economic matters on our foreign policy than the committee chaired by my honourable friend. As he knows, I am an admirer of the work that that committee has done, and this gives me all the more reason to accept his proposal that I should point out to the minister concerned that in this case he is far from accurate.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I come to him looking for help. The other day the Minister of Justice, Mr. Crosbie, indicated that the government was opposed to an elected Senate. Then he took great exception to published reports that the government opposed an elected Senate.

What is the difference? What does this mean, and what is Mr. Crosbie trying to say?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Mr. Crosbie is well known for being able to express controversial opinions, and I am not surprised that my honourable friend should raise this point.

I have to say—and I think Mr. Crosbie made it perfectly clear in his own statements—that he was not stating government policy with respect to the future of the Senate in those comments he has made from time to time. That is a matter which will receive active consideration in the not too distant future.

Senator Davey: I have a supplementary question. Is it a case of an elected Senate if necessary, but not necessarily an elected Senate?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend had remembered everything that Mr. Crosbie said on the subject, he would have added to his statement that, while he had some views about the present Senate, he did not rule out the possibility of a body that might replace the Senate more effectively.

In other words, the principle of a second chamber in a federal society was not discarded out of hand by Mr. Crosbie in any of his statements. In his later statements, which resulted in a retraction, or at least a correction, on the part of the press, he stated clearly that he was not talking about government policy.

[Senator van Roggen.]

Senator Davey: I also have a further supplementary. Can we expect further retractions or explanations from the minister?

Senator Roblin: I think the minister is all too capable of speaking for himself.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB CREATION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I address my question to the Leader of the Government. I was wondering if he could convey my congratulations to his government on the figures on unemployment.

Yesterday I did some further digging. I said to the honourable senator that I did not think the increases in jobs were consonant with the increase in population.

I have looked at the Statistics Canada figures and if anyone wants to see them I will make them available.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: We can read as well as you can.

Senator Gigantès: I have ample evidence, from his erudite and cultivated comments, that my honourable friend, Senator Flynn, is a well-read man, but I wish he would read something and allow me to continue.

Senator Flynn: But you do not have to tell me what I should read. I will just tell you to mind your own business.

Senator Gigantès: The problems of the unemployed are the business of the Parliament of this country, and the Senate is a part of that Parliament.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point. Try to understand what I am telling you. You were suggesting that I should read something. I know what I should read, and you are not going to tell me what it should be.

Senator Guay: He wants to be leader again.

Senator Molgat: Senator Flynn should rise on a point of order.

Senator Flynn: If you, as chairman of the Rules Committee, do not understand that I am rising on a point of order, perhaps you should resign.

Senator Guay: We will give him an honorary leadership.

Senator Molgat: Senator Flynn should say, "I rise on a point of order."

Senator Flynn: I don't have to say that.

Senator Molgat: Your Honour, we are constantly being interrupted by Senator Flynn. He does this even when his own colleagues are speaking. If he has a point of order, he should get up and say that he rises on a point of order, and then the house will listen to him.

Senator Flynn: I thought everyone would have understood that this is a point of order, particularly Senator Molgat.

Senator Gigantès: In the last 12 months of the Liberal government, the Canadian economy—not the government; I take the strictures of Senator Roblin on this issue—according to this table, produced 314,000 new jobs, which come to over 26,167 per month. However, the population grows at 1.7 per cent per year.

For the Tories to match the rate at which the economy produced jobs under the Liberals, 319,338 new jobs would have to be produced during the first 12 months of the Mulroney administration, or an average of 26,612 new jobs per month.

● (1420)

Is the Leader of the Government aware that the economy during the first eight months of the Mulroney rule appears to have topped the Liberal record by 13 jobs per month, producing an average of 26,625 jobs per month, or a total of 104 more jobs per month than would have been produced at the rate of increase under the Liberal government?

Could the Leader of the Government tell me how many jobs in excess of the number under the Liberal rate would have been produced if one subtracted order in council appointments since September 17 last?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I know my honourable friend truly does not expect me to answer that question. If he wants to debate the question of unemployment and job creation, if I may use that inappropriate term, let him introduce an inquiry, pursuant to which he can present his views in extenso.

In the meantime, he and I had better exchange reading material, because the information that I have does not jibe with the information he has given the house.

My information is that from September 1984 to April 1985 a total of 201,000 jobs were "created"; in the period September 30, 1983 to April 1984, the coterminous period in the previous year, the number of jobs created was 93,000.

So, obviously we are miles apart in our figures. He can send me his figures if he wishes and I will send him mine, and if he wants to have a debate on the subject, then let him put an inquiry on the order paper.

Senator Gigantès: A supplementary. My figures are from Labour Force Survey. Since he doubts my figures, I would ask the Leader of the Government to look at the employment figure for August 1983 which was 10,727,000 and the figure for August 1984, a year later, which was 11,041,000, for an overall year-over-year increase of 314,000. When that total increase is divided by 12, we have a monthly rate of 26,167.

The difference between 11,041,000, the figure as at the end of August 1984, and 11,254,000, the figure as at the end of April 1985, is the figure I quoted.

I would be extremely grateful to the Leader of the Government if he were to use the superior resources of the government to contradict these figures of Statistics Canada as given to me by the Library of Parliament.

Senator Roblin: I detect no question of which I feel obliged to take notice.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government about the very sad news today that the government does not intend to keep its promise made last summer to double Canada's research and development expenditures.

In fact, the minister responsible for research and development, who has been put in a very compromising position, has said to a committee of the other place that by 1990—never mind in the first year or the first term—the government will not be able to put 2.5 per cent of GNP into research and development expenditures.

Mr. Siddon, the minister, has now issued two or three publications, including his working paper on Science, Technology and Economic Development and his paper for the economic conference, in which he points out the very poor situation in Canada in respect of research and development expenditures.

Can you explain why it is that the government would have made that promise to that key community, why it would set out at great length to young Canadians and to our existing industry the necessity of having a diffusion of innovation and the necessary research that lies behind that innovation, which the minister and others have done very clearly, and now fails to meet the promised expenditures in that area?

Senator Flynn: A good speech!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I should point out to my honourable friend that the campaign promise in question was not referring solely to the government's contribution to R&D; rather, it was the community contribution to R&D.

I am just trying to remember the figures. I think it was at 1.5 per cent at the time and it was supposed to go up to 2 per cent, or something like that.

I think the minister's statement was related to his assessment of what the total community would do in terms of research and development, as well as what the government's contribution would be. I have to say that I have no information at the present time to clarify those figures further, but I believe it would be interesting to look into this matter further. However, I have a hunch that after we hear the budget, we may be able to come to some more optimistic estimates as to what the Canadian community's contribution to research and development is likely to be over the period.

Senator Marsden: As a supplementary, the Leader of the Government is absolutely right. The figure was 1.3 per cent to go up to 2.6 per cent. I have in front of me the minister's own figures for the contribution of government, business enterprise, and others. The point is that tax expenditures will be made, presumably, to get the private sector to stimulate its R&D funding. Certainly that has been a policy instituted by the Liberal government, one which worked very successfully; so one way or another this is going to come out of the public sector. I will be pleased if the Leader of the Government can clarify for us how that arrangement will work—that is, whether there will be a change in policy in that regard.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have to remind my honourable friend that the major initiative taken by the former government had to do with the tax concession with respect to research and development, which resulted in abuse of the plan—quick flips, as they were called—and a haemorrhage of hundreds of millions of dollars from the public treasury in order to accommodate that new policy. If one were to have the statistics to hand as to what went into R&D after that policy came in, one would probably find that they were quite astonishing. But, on the other hand, overall that is not good policy, because it allows people to use that mechanism for ends and purposes that were never intended when that mechanism was brought in. Consequently it is being revamped. My honourable friend will have to wait until the budget has been brought down to get the details.

Senator Marsden: With respect, the Leader of the Government concentrates on a very narrow aspect of the question. In fact, we have seen the impact of that tax concession, which probably does need some modification; but it did stimulate a great deal more than had previously existed in private sector industry, and particularly in small private sector industry, which is precisely where the government has promised to create economic stimulation.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have taken note of the fact that my honourable friend supports, apparently without equivocation, the policy of special tax concessions for research and development, which, in my opinion, have proved to be unsatisfactory.

Senator Marsden: I would point out that I did say that no doubt the tax policy needs some modification.

END OF DECADE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a different question. Yesterday, in response to my question in March concerning the composition of the Canadian government's delegation to the U.N. End of Decade Women's Conference in Nairobi, the Leader of the Government said that the members of the delegation would be named shortly before the conference itself. As he knows, the Americans named the members of their delegation in February, the Netherlands government has named theirs, and the British have named theirs. Why is this a secret?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply, I wish to tell my honourable friend that the names of the members of the delegation will be announced in good time before that conference meets. It is the intention of the government that before the delegation proceeds to Nairobi there will be very extensive briefing sessions so that the members will be fully informed on all of the issues involved.

[Senator Marsden.]

My honourable friend can rely upon it that Canada will be well represented by informed people.

Senator Marsden: The Leader of the Government says that the delegation will be named in good time. However, I suggest to him that if the critics in the House of Commons, who have traditionally been part of that delegation, are to prepare themselves adequately to be part of the Canadian representation, the "good time" would have been two months ago. I just do not understand why our government—in marked contrast with other governments—cannot name the delegation.

Yesterday the Leader of the Government said that the draft of the principal document in connection with the conference had been circulated to provincial officials and national women's groups. Indeed it has, and that is where I have seen it. But the critics of the two opposition parties in the House of Commons have yet to receive a copy of that document, and I wonder if they could.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe they can easily obtain a copy by asking for it, and no doubt they will. My respect for the critics on the opposition side is such that I believe there will be no problem in their mastering all aspects of this question before they get to Nairobi. They will manage, and very well too.

Senator Marsden: Nevertheless, the critics of the two opposition parties have not yet received a copy.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GREEN PAPER ON COMPETITIVENESS AND SECURITY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to revert, if I may, to the green paper on foreign policy and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government is announcing in this paper the first step of a quiet yet dramatic retreat to a policy of neo-isolationism, reminiscent of the 1930s, by suggesting, as does the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his foreword when he refers to Canada's efforts to improve the international order, "But not everything is possible."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The answer is an emphatic "no".

Senator Grafstein: I would point out to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in that same foreword, goes on to say:

In fact, reduction of the budget deficit may require further retrenchment in some of our international activities.

Is this not the herald of a policy that suggests that we intend to reverse a long line of activism on the international front in dealing with improvement in the international order that was started after World War II and promoted by successive governments headed by Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Trudeau?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend need not be alarmed. We will try to take care of our international responsibilities in a way that reflects credit on the country and encompasses the interests of Canadians.

Senator Grafstein: I have a final supplementary question. If the government, in effect, is sending out a signal to the rest of the world that we are about to reduce our activities on the international front because of our budgetary difficulties at home, is that an appropriate signal to send to the people of Canada, as well as to our friends around the world?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is the only one, to my knowledge, who has detected this signal so far. Others may feel that such a signal is being given, but I certainly do not, and I have to say that the policy of the present administration, particularly with respect to its treatment of the crisis in Africa, speaks volumes for the intention of the government to fulfil its role in the international sphere.

If my honourable friend wishes to debate the matter, I suggest he put it on the order paper.

Senator Grafstein: I would bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the fact that there is a statement of policy in the foreword, and I would ask him to comment on that statement of policy.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I would point out that my honourable friend has been out of order several times. Rule 20(4) of the Rules of the Senate states:

A debate is out of order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator who asks the question and by the senator who answers it.

Of course, my honourable friend is a new boy and does not know any better.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask for clarification. I did not understand what Senator Walker's point of order was.

An Hon. Senator: He did not, either.

Senator Frith: If he did not understand it either, then that is all right.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, there are no delayed answers today. We are doing pretty well but we still have one or two answers outstanding and they will come in due course.

Senator Frith: Oh, yes; the famous "in due course".

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-30, intituled: "An Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no problem in supporting the thrust of this legislation because it is an effort on the part of the government to provide a more orderly way of arranging financial support for the World Bank group of international financial institutions. The three members of that World Bank group—International Financial Corporation, the World Bank or the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the International Development Association—are to be consolidated under one piece of legislation. Also, authority hitherto stated to be lacking is now to be provided legislatively for the financing of the International Financial Corporation. With these objectives, certainly there cannot be any fundamental disagreement.

The sums of money involved are considerable, and of course they are sums of money that flow to the developing or underdeveloped countries of the world. The statistics put on the record by the government indicate that the International Financial Corporation, which operates in the private sector, expects to invest $4.5 billion over the next five years in projects estimated at a total value of $30 billion.

The subscribed capital of the World Bank now amounts to $80 billion and, last year, the World Bank approved some 130 loans valued at approximately $12 billion to more than 43 developing countries, and the International Development Association last year provided loans valued at over $3.5 billion to 43 countries. So, all told, this is a very considerable flow of funds, however inadequate it may be in the minds of developing countries.

I think it should be mentioned that the World Bank does operate on a commercial basis and provides loans on commercial terms and under commercial criteria. IDA, or the International Development Association, is the concessional window of the World Bank and provides loans on a long-term basis and at very low rates of interest. For that reason, it is a facility of the World Bank which is of deep interest to the developing countries.

I certainly continue to support, as I have done in the past, credible Canadian financial participation in the World Bank group and in the International Monetary Fund. Not only do I believe in that support, but I believe that the support should be credible and adequate so that Canada has a convincing say in the operation of these financial institutions, and can show that we are carrying a fair share of the burden commensurate with our industrial strength and our political status. Usually, the government has dedicated a flexible portion of its international development budget to the maintenance and support not only of these World Bank institutions but also of the regional development banks. I think that is an extremely good policy, but we must watch very carefully that the magnitude of our support does not fall below an amount that would signal either a lack of interest or a lack of influence in these international institutions.

Senator Flynn, in introducing this bill, told us that its contents would be a reminder to us of past events, and certainly the contents do remind us of past events; they remind us of the effort made at Bretton Woods, following World War II, to create a new international economic system, and the efforts that resulted in the creation not only of the International Monetary Fund but the World Bank and the various facilities which have been mentioned already.

These institutions, in my judgment, have operated effectively since that time; they have assisted in the maintenance of international financial stability, and they have contributed to the prosperity which countries such as Canada have enjoyed since World War II.

There is no doubt that the economic difficulties which the world entered, particularly at the beginning of the 1980s—including high interest rates, fluctuating exchange rates, high inflation and recession—have put an enormous strain on those international financial institutions, so much so that we have heard a call for a new Bretton Woods, for a restructuring of these financial institutions in order to meet the new challenges.

The first international figure who called for a world monetary conference, or a new Bretton Woods, was the former Prime Minister of New Zealand, Prime Minister Muldoon. At a meeting of finance ministers of the Commonwealth, he issued a call for a world-wide conference that would be a new Bretton Woods. The result was that the finance ministers of the Commonwealth commissioned a study of the international economic system led by Professor Helleiner from the University of Toronto, which made some suggestions about a fine tuning of the international economic system, but certainly not a restructuring.

Subsequently, and as is well known, the President of France, understandably concerned about the wide fluctuations in the exchange rates and the powerless state of the French franc, called for a world monetary conference. That was raised at at least one Economic Summit. However, the industrialized nations of the world, acting together, through the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund, or through the Economic Summit, have never responded to the pleas for steps that might be interpreted as a lack of confidence in the viability of these international institutions, particularly the Fund. They have never really yielded to the pressures coming from a number of industrial countries, and strongly from developing countries, to restructure the Fund.

It is notable that in the communiqué released after the recent Bonn Economic Summit there is no reference whatsoever to a restructuring of these financial institutions, or to a call for a world monetary conference. There is a reference to international monetary stability in the communiqué under the heading of "Multilateral Trading System and International Monetary System," as follows:

It is also essential to improve the functioning of the international monetary system. We take note that the Finance Ministers of the Group of Ten, at their meeting in Tokyo in June, intend to complete their current work on ways to improve the functioning of the monetary system and to put forward proposals, to be discussed at the next meeting of the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund in Seoul in October—

These institutions, particularly the Fund, have shown remarkable adaptability and have improved their effectiveness as new challenges have arisen. But because of the discipline which the Fund has imposed on the world, and because no one has been able to define a new system that would be better, these institutions still continue. I must say that, in my view, they have carried the burdens of the past several years effectively, and it is a tribute to the resilience, not only of the leaders of these institutions, but of the industrialized countries and the developing countries, that they have remained intact and have come out of this period of deep recession and instability in reasonably strong condition.

As I have mentioned, honourable senators, the cluster of institutions with which we are dealing in this bill are concerned basically with providing either commercial loans or concessional financing to the developing world. It is obvious that the International Development Agency of the World Bank, or IDA, as it is called, is the largest single development agency in the world and constitutes an important source of financial flows to developing countries.

In the operation of the International Development Association, the concept of burden sharing has been a leading concept. In recent years, a major obstacle to maintaining adequate levels of financial flows to the developing world has been the reluctance of the United States to carry what other donors regard as a fair share of the international burden.

When the United States, as the largest donor, is allotted a share of the replenishment of IDA, then, of course, other significant donors, such as West Germany and Japan, fall in line, but because it is burden sharing, they are not prepared to accept responsibilities beyond their fair share or fair burden. The International Development Agency has been hampered by the reluctance of the United States to carry its fair share of replenishment. The Administration says that the House of Representatives and the Senate are unsympathetic to the work of the World Bank and, therefore, it cannot go as far as it would wish.

We were told that last year the replenishment was $9 billion; I think that the original goal was at least $12 billion. Other countries were prepared to go up to that amount, but the United States refused, and the Bank was, therefore, unable to go to its maximum targets. Not only that, but because of the delays in the provision of pledged funds by the United States, other countries have had to step in and provide bridge financing.

So, no one can be pleased at this development, all the more regrettable because the poorest countries, the low-income countries, need not only what they are getting but much more if they are to meet their responsibilities. Due to the fact that the replenishment was inadequate, the Development Committee of the World Bank at its recent meeting in April asked the management of the World Bank to conduct a mid-term review of the IDA VII replenishment. The intention is, undoubtedly, in the direction of seeing whether the atmosphere might be more favourable for an improved or greater replenishment from the United States.

● (1450)

I have been mentioning the official development assistance because that is the name of the game in this series of bills, particularly with respect to the World Bank group of institutions, but I would not want to sit down without mentioning other factors which may be of even greater importance to the developing world at the present time. One is increased access to markets of the industrialized countries. Greater access to markets in Canada, Europe and the United States can do much more to increase the incomes and the standard of living of the developing world than ever can be done through the provision of official development assistance. That is why the developing world is constantly urging us to open our markets to their products. If there is to be a new round of multilateral trading negotiations, then, of course, the access to markets by developing countries will be a major item on the agenda; otherwise, the exercise will be of little interest to many countries of the developing world. Not only is access to markets important but there is also the necessity of increased long-term financing for developing countries, particularly in the form of equity capital. We are told by the government that it will make a contribution to the increased capital stock of the International Finance Corporation, and that the institution will be able to, as I said, invest in projects valued at over $30 billion in the next five years. It will be interesting to know more about the International Finance Corporation and what it is doing and how effectively it is operating in the private sector in the developing world.

I noticed, honourable senators, that at the Bonn Summit the leaders called for improved co-operation between the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank Group. The leaders stated and I quote:

We emphasize the crucial role of, and the improved cooperation between the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank Group in supporting policies by debtor countries necessary to strengthen the confidence of domestic and foreign creditors and investors, to mobilize domestic savings and to ensure efficient use of resources and sound long-term development.

Of course the leaders referred to the necessity of increased resources, but their reference to increased resources for these institutions was far from a commitment. This reflected, no doubt, the reluctance of the United States to undertake additional obligations.

The leaders said:

We agree to work to ensure that these institutions are equipped with the necessary resources and instruments, and we stand ready to discuss an increase in the resources available to the World Bank—

Perhaps it is a help to say that you are prepared to discuss an increase, but when these increases have been refused in the past, maybe the words from the leaders of the seven industrialized countries will not be credible. I am personally pleased that the matter is raised and that they are allied to the necessity of increasing the resources to the World Bank institutions.

We all know that one of the big burdens that is carried, and has been carried, by the developing countries is high interest rates. Some of them have been pushed to the walls by the burden of these interest rates. In many cases they have inadequate earnings of foreign exchange to service their international debt, and they increase their indebtedness sometimes in order to discharge their interest payments. It seems to me that what is absent from the Bonn Summit is any real commitment to do something about the interest rate question. I think one of the significant things of the Bonn Summit is the low-key manner in which interest rates are dealt with. That, undoubtedly, is because of the necessity of reaching a compromise and the reluctance of the United States to have a finger pointed at it and its crucial role in the world economy, and the impact of its interest rates not only on Canada, the United Kingdom and Europe but also on the developing world. All that is said in the Bonn Summit is that:

We will follow prudent, and where necessary strengthened monetary and budgetary policies with a view to stable prices, lower interest rates and more productive investment.

I think that we all agree on the necessity for lower prices, more stable prices, productive investment and lower interest rates, but I do not think that each of them is in the same category of importance. If we are talking under this bill of ways to assist the developing world, we cannot be blind to the burdens that have been placed on those countries as a result of high interest rates, let alone the burdens that have been placed upon countries like Canada. In this case we are talking about developing countries.

It is true that interest rates have come down, and that has been mentioned at the development committee meeting in April and at the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund. Even though the Interim Committee of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund did refer to the lowering of interest rates, they took occasion to point out the heavy burdens that are being borne by the developing countries as a result of higher interest rates. I should like to quote one sentence which is as follows:

The committee noted, however, that the external debt problems of a number of countries remain serious and have been exacerbated by rates of interest which, while they have declined, remain very high.

We all know, and the developing countries know, that interest rates will come down for them and for us when the United States succeeds in bringing rates down in that country. Some progress has been made but not enough. At the Bonn Summit, both Canada and the United States undertook to take steps to reduce fiscal deficits.

● (1500)

Canada may succeed in reducing its fiscal deficit, but let there be no mistake about it, it will not have an impact on the rest of the world. It will have an impact on Canada. The country whose deficit has an impact not only on the developing world but on the industrialized world is the United States.

Honourable senators, it would be wrong not to put the valuable work of these institutions into context so that we understand that what they are doing is addressing only part of a very large problem which has to be tackled from a number of angles.

It is interesting how the United States has been able to operate a monetary, budgetary and trade policy that has been, in a sense, so damaging to the rest of the world. No one can escape from that fact. The United States, of course, has its own explanations for the necessity of that policy, but it has had a damaging effect on the rest of the world. I do not think it was ever put any better than it was in the British House of Lords last November by the former Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, who is now a member of the House of Lords, Harold MacMillan.

Those of you who may have listened to Senator Davey talk about the possible televising of Senate proceedings may be attracted by the impact which Harold MacMillan's speech made in the House of Lords. He, at age 90, spoke for over 30 minutes without notes. So impressive was his speech that it was reprinted in full in The Sunday Times. Anyone who wants to be impressed by a speech, whether given at age 30 or 90, should take a look at that address, which I think is worth reading, by the former Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

He talked about the United States and its role in the world economy. As you know, he has a great interest in the United States. He said, "Let us look somewhere else—at the country of my dear mother, the United States." He then went on to talk about what has happened there. He mentioned the reduction in unemployment with the creation of five million new jobs and new industries. He said, "It is a miracle;—"

He went on to say:

I think I know how it has been done: it is because they have had the sense to make somebody else pay for it. By keeping the bank rate at 1% above everybody else they have attracted all the money from the old world to the new. It has been flowing in—not only the quick money, but also serious investment, because everybody believes in it. It is not only the quick money that moves about. If you ask any investment banker, the trustees of funds, and even I expect, the trade union pension funds, you will see that they are all making long-term investments in the United States. In a word, Reagan . . . has called in the resources of the old world in order to finance the expansion of the new.

He said that they have had this miracle because they have made the rest of the world pay for it.

Honourable senators, I think it is true that they have had this miracle. They have had this enormous flow of funds. They have had a huge balance-of-payments deficit which is being financed because the United States is the haven at the present time. Let it not be stated that I am anti-American; I think it is an economic reality that is apparent, as it was stated so forcibly in the British House of Lords by that televised, I hope, speech of the Earl of Stockton. He said that the world has paid for the miracle in the United States. If the world has paid, then the developing countries have certainly paid a high price, because they have borne the brunt and are least able of all to bear that brunt.

It is for that reason and many others that I wanted to make some comments about this important piece of legislation. It raises an important area of foreign, international and economic policy. If this bill cannot now be referred to a committee, I hope that it will be possible to raise a number of these questions before some expert witnesses in order to have additional information and a deeper understanding of these particular problems.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Flynn speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-30.

Senator Flynn: I believe I am expressing the sentiments of all senators in thanking Senator MacEachen for his most interesting contribution to the debate on second reading of this bill. His long experience in the Department of External Affairs and his knowledge of the institutions concerned in this bill make him an extraordinary expert in the problems these institutions are trying to solve, especially with regard to developing nations.

I am not in a position to argue with him on the problem of high interest rates. I agree that they present a problem to developing countries, as they do to Canada and most of the countries of the world. He may be right in saying that the United States is responsible for that situation because with its high interest rates it has been able to attract a very large share of the investment including, as he said, the good, bad and quick money.

This question would justify a much longer discussion than is allowed by the restricted purpose of this bill.

I merely want to say again that I think everyone appreciates Senator MacEachen's contribution, and again I say, I am sure that all senators are grateful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: As I mentioned yesterday, this bill is really a housekeeping bill. It tries to bring under the umbrella of one bill all the contributions that are made to the three institutions concerned and to simplify the procedure for the contributions to be made by Canada by providing that, and I quote from the proposed subsection 5(3) as it appears in clause 6 of the bill:

Sums required for the purposes of subsection (2) shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purpose.

● (1510)

The proposed subsection 5(4) also deals with the question but in the negative, in saying:

(4) The amount of financial assistance provided pursuant to subsection (2) in any period shall not exceed the amount specified for the purpose in respect of that period in an appropriation by Parliament.

Once this bill becomes law, we will find in the main estimates the amount of the annual contributions which Parliament will authorize the Minister of Finance to make to these institutions.

Because this bill is being dealt with only at this time, that could not be done in the main estimates for 1985-86. However, the contributions for the current year will be set out in the supplementary estimates to be tabled at the end of this month, assuming the bill is passed into law in the coming days. Those supplementary estimates, as is usual, will be referred to the Finance Committee, and it will be up to the committee to decide who they want to hear in respect of this particular item, and others. The Leader of the Opposition and any other honourable senator will then be in a position to indicate to the committee the witnesses they would like to question on this matter. All of the matters raised by the Leader of the Opposition can also be dealt with at that time.

Given that the questions raised by the Leader of the Opposition can be dealt with at the time the Finance Committee is considering the supplementary estimates, it may not be necessary to refer this bill to committee.

With that in mind, assuming the bill is approved on second reading today, I shall move that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow. If, nevertheless, it is the desire of any honourable senator to have the bill referred to committee, it could be dealt with by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee tomorrow morning. If need be, the committee could go through the mechanics of the bill at that time. I do not think it is necessary, but certainly it could be done tomorrow morning, if it is so desired.

Insofar as the substance of the questions raised by the Leader of the Opposition is concerned, I think we will be in a better position to deal with that when the supplementary estimates are before the Finance Committee in due course.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Flynn, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

MEAT INSPECTION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of the Bill C-33, intituled: "An Act respecting the import and export of and interprovincial trade in meat products, the registration of establishments, the inspection of animals and meat products in registered establishments and the standards for those establishments and for animals slaughtered and meat products prepared in those establishments".—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Bill C-33 will revoke the Meat and Canned Foods Act and will replace, with some amendments, two other statutes, the Meat Inspection Act and the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act.

Bill C-33, although relatively short, covers a great deal of important material relating to the food industry. Its implications are extensive and detailed.

I want to congratulate Senator Robertson for the adroit way in which she analyzed the bill, summarizing its content succinctly for the benefit of this house, yesterday.

What we have here is an extensive and detailed intervention by the government in our domestic economy. In addition, it has implications for the international market. It provides for government approval of the design of registered establishments, and an "establishment" is defined as "any place in which animals are slaughtered or meat products are prepared, packaged, labelled or stored."

As I said, the bill provides for government approval of the design of "registered establishments" and for government approval of facilities and equipment placed in such registered establishments. It then provides for government inspection of animals ante mortem, and post mortem if necessary, and of meat products in these registered establishments. It provides for the prescription of quality standards for meat products prepared or stored in registered establishments. It provides for a national trademark for the exclusive use of persons designated by the Minister of Agriculture as meat inspectors.

The bill prohibits the export of any meat product that was not inspected under the provisions of the act.

It prohibits the marketing of any meat product that, among other things, does not conform to the standards prescribed for imported meat products.

It prohibits the transport from any province in Canada to another province of any meat product that was not inspected under the provisions of the act and that does not conform to the prescribed standards.

I go into this detail, honourable senators, to point out to you that this is a very highly regulated industry. This is a massive intervention by the government in the economy.

The proposed act, of course, is couched in very general language. I am sure that it will produce a plentiful progeny of regulations. Indeed, I suspect that people in the industry will say: "We are not so much interested in the bill as we are in the regulations. It is the regulations that we really want to see."

There is a long list of topics on which the Governor in Council may make regulations. Of course, honourable senators will realize that many of these regulations are already in effect under the statutes that this bill will revoke and replace.

I have some questions to which I should like answers. I really do not expect Senator Robertson to undertake to deal with these questions as many of them go to the regulations and, of course, the regulations are not before us. I think it would be useful for us to have answers to these questions. I am not implying, honourable senators, that there are any great, dark secrets hidden behind the words of the bill. However, simply for the record and to show that we have done our job properly, we ought to have answers to certain questions. I will mention one or two, to show what I mean. We are told that the provisions of the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act are being carried forward into this new legislation. However, I have gone through the bill carefully, but I find no specific reference to the provisions of that act. I suspect that the truth of the matter is that the content of that act will be found in the regulations, and by that I mean the regulations to which an establishment will have to conform if it is to achieve registration. I suspect that the truth of the matter is that the substance of the Humane Slaughter of Food Animals Act is being moved out of statute law into regulation. I have no objection to that, but I should like the record to show that that is what is being done, if indeed it is being done.

Then there is the question of who may apply or use the "meat inspection legend." In the Agriculture Committee of the other place there was considerable discussion of this, because evidently it is the practice that companies in the meat business have a supply of these "meat inspection legends" which their employees apply to the products under the guidance, more or less vicarious, of the inspectors. Questions were raised in the other place as to how close the surveillance of the Minister of Agriculture's men is over the employees of the packers. I did not consider that the answers given were sufficiently clear to be entirely reassuring.

Another question concerns fees for inspection. One of the topics on which the Governor in Council would be authorized to make orders is as follows:

20.(g) providing for the inspection of establishments and registered establishments and the animals and meat products in registered establishments and prescribing the fees payable therefor;

I understand that the existing act permits fees. Whether or not they are actually prescribed and collected is a question to which I should like to have an answer. I should also like to know the intention of the present government if this power is conferred on the Governor in Council by Parliament.

There is a rather interesting delegation, in that the bill would authorize the Governor in Council to make an order:

20.(r) Exempting any person, establishment, registered establishment, animal, meat product or any class thereof from the application of this Act or the regulations or any provision thereof;

That is a virtual repeal, in specific instances, of a statute of Parliament. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture, from past experience, has in mind the kinds of situations for which that power would be appropriate. But I think we should have on our record an explanation to justify this vast power.

Honourable senators, I have no objection whatsoever to the bill. It looks like a good bill, but it is couched in very general language, a situation which is inevitable when we are dealing with this kind of regulatory intervention in the market, and I hope that the house will find it agreeable to send it to committee. If the questions I have in mind—which can be answered by an expert witness in 20 or 30 minutes—are answered satisfactorily, as I am sure they would be, there should be no problem in moving the bill forward.

Hon. Brenda Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Robertson speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his comments. He is absolutely right. Although it is a short bill, there is a lot in it. There is also a good deal in the regulations. I am advised that it has to be that way because of the necessity to comply quickly with the requirements of other countries as they change their qualifications. I will not, of course, attempt to answer questions relating to regulations. The honourable senator is quite right in saying that he will obtain answers to his questions in committee. I believe that the expert witnesses will be able to explore in committee a number of his concerns.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, some members of the committee will not be present tomorrow because of other senatorial obligations. However, there will be a committee meeting at 9.30 tomorrow morning in room 256-S to deal with this bill.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was presented on Tuesday, May 14, 1985.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I would first like to thank my colleagues on the committee who, together with myself, spent a considerable amount of time on this question. It might surprise people that what, at first glance, seemed a simple issue should take such a large amount of time.

● (1530)

Honourable senators will recall the incident which brought this matter before the Senate. It occurred in a committee on the 18th of February of this year when a news reporter had a hand-held tape recorder in that committee room. This was noticed by an honourable senator; the question was asked whether this was in order and the chairman, I think quite properly, said, "There is no rule. I will try to find out what the situation is." Eventually, the matter ended up before our committee.

The first thing that the committee did was to look at the incident, and the committee concluded that, indeed, the person who had the tape recorder was not authorized to do so and, hence, was out of order. I have to say in fairness to that reporter that, the moment the matter was brought to his attention, he ceased to make the recording. I think the whole thing was a very innocent incident, in the first instance.

The next thing the committee then had to look at was: What is the present situation here in the Senate and in the committees with regard to recording and broadcasting through the audio-reception system? We found that, as a result of a decision of the Senate in 1980, arising out of a recommendation from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, that permission had been granted by the Senate for the audio recording and broadcasting of proceedings. This chamber is therefore wired and the audio goes out from this chamber from the moment that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod turns the key at the beginning of our proceedings, and that system remains on during the whole of our proceedings in this chamber. However, the material that goes out over that audio system is obviously only that which goes out via the microphone or the receiver switched on at that time. Other conversations, unless they are very loud, cannot be picked up.

We also found that room 356-S, our main committee room, is wired in the same fashion and that there is a control within that room for each one of the microphones. The other two committee rooms, namely room 256-S and room 250 in the East Block, are presently not wired. Therefore, by decision of the Senate, it is possible now to record and broadcast the proceedings of this house, and the proceedings of a committee held in room 356-S could also be broadcast but, at the moment, that is not done.

The committee then looked at the whole issue of what ought to be done and we came to the conclusion that, in a modern society, it would be proper to extend the original decision of the Senate to the other committee rooms and that it is proper to have an audio recording and a broadcasting of the proceedings of the chamber and of meetings in those three committee rooms. We felt, however, that there had to be some way of controlling the process within those committee rooms in that, if there were simply a broad authorization, the risk would be that someone could come in with a hand-held tape recorder and, at any location within that committee room, that tape recorder could pick up all sorts of conversations. This was not felt to be desirable. It was felt that the rule should be made clear and that it should be the same rule for all committees, in other words, that it should not be simply at the choice of the committee chairman. If the Senate decided that audio broadcasting was to be allowed, then the same rule should apply to everyone in every committee.

The committee then looked at the implementation of this conclusion, and I think it is correct to say that the view of most senators, in the first instance, was that this should simply be done by a general recommendation to the Senate. However, as we looked into the details of the matter, we came to the conclusion that a rule change would be preferable so that the matter would be crystal clear; that any committee chairman could refer to it at any time and that there would be no possibility of confusion on the issue.

As a result of that decision, there arose a recommendation for a new rule, in addition to rule 109(a)(1) and (2), as they are listed here. Those amendments to the rule will provide for audio recording and broadcasting from the Senate chamber, room 256-S, room 356-S and room 250 in the East Block. In all cases, this facility would be available through the outlets that are provided in each one of these rooms so that someone could record by plugging in to those outlets, as we do with our earphones at our desks here in this chamber.

Then came the question of how the matter would be handled if there were more requests from people who wanted to broadcast the proceedings than there were outlets to accommodate them. It was decided that the best way of doing this was to leave the arrangements in the hands of the Clerk of the Senate or his designate where there were difficulties; for example, where there might be 10 or 12 people who wanted to record at one time and possibly only six outlets available.

The other issue, then, was how these requests could be complied with in rooms where there is not presently a wiring system or where one cannot be installed. As honourable senators are aware, we occasionally use room 260-N and room 263-S and sometimes there are, of course, travelling committees. When committees are out travelling on the road, they should have the same facility available. It was felt that we should not insist that these rooms be wired and that travelling committees would not necessarily need to have with them a wiring system for tape recordings. It was felt that, in those cases, we would leave the matter up to the discretion of the chairman of the particular committee and that, wherever practicable, they would find some way of allowing the tape recording. In those cases, it might mean recording with a hand-held tape recorder but that, then, would be at the discretion of the committee itself, and persons who asked for the right to record could be clearly identified; they would request the right to do so and they could be seated in one part of the room. In any case, the honourable senators who were present would know exactly what the situation was and there would be no risk of inadvertent recording of conversations other than those specifically relating to the work of the committee.

Honourable senators, I recommend the report to you and hope that the Senate will be agreeable to including these two rules in our rule book.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Would Senator Molgat entertain a question?

Senator Molgat: Of course.

Senator Le Moyne: Honourable senators, since the Liberal Caucus of the Senate meets in Room 356-S, can Senator Molgat give us the assurance that our proceedings are perfectly secure and that there can be no breach of security either purposely or through any oversight?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I think we can give that assurance, because the control mechanism is in the same room and can therefore be watched by the Liberal caucus. Since you are the chairman of the caucus, the security of your meetings is in your hands. No broadcasting takes place unless you activate the sound system or order it to be activated.

In the Senate, for instance, if the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod does not turn the key, the sound cannot go beyond this chamber. He controls the sound, and we can see him. We trust him to do his job, obviously.

The same system applies to the committee rooms, the person at the console can turn the key.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GREEN PAPER ON COMPETITIVENESS AND SECURITY— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to our business for today I would like to raise a matter that touches on the privileges of the Senate. It has been pointed out to me by the chairman of what was then the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence that in the green paper entitled "Competitiveness and Security: Directions for Canada's International Relations" an error has been made in figures 13, 14 and 15 on pages 26 and 27. The error consists of having failed to recognize that the charts set out in those three figures were prepared and included in the report of the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. The reference to the Senate in those instances has been omitted, which I think is quite unfair to the committee and to its distinguished chairman. I shall certainly take the first opportunity to bring this matter to the notice of those concerned so that an appropriate correction can be made.

Senator Perrault: In the second edition!

PRIVATE BILL

BILL TO EXTEND TERM OF CANADIAN PATENT NO. 855,255— FIRST READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, for Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, moved the first reading of Bill S-4, to extend the term of Canadian Patent No. 855,255.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, for Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, May 21, 1985.

PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF COMMISSION TO REVIEW SALARIES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND SENATORS—DEFINITION OF "MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT" AND "SALARIES"—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise once again on a question of privilege I have raised many times in the past. I guess it does not sink in anywhere, particularly in the other place and among the bureaucracy. I do not know who the barbarians are around here in terms of constitutional law, custom and practice, but I have before me a document entitled, "Report of the Commission to Review Salaries of Members of Parliament and Senators" which was placed on my desk this morning. I am commenting on the face of the document. I shall not protest its contents, which are rather ill-considered.

Senator Perrault: A total ignorance.

Senator Lang: Can honourable senators imagine a government publication including in its heading the words "Members of Parliament and Senators"? Don't they realize that the members of the House of Commons and the members of the Senate are all members of Parliament—period?

I do not know how often this has to be reiterated to get it through the dull minds that compose these documents. If it does get through to them, is this, then, a deliberate act to try to separate members of Parliament, in the minds of the public, from senators and to obfuscate the fact that the members of both houses are in fact members of Parliament?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Let me say a word on the point of privilege raised by my honourable friend. I want him to know that I am most sympathetic to his complaint, a complaint that is well justified.

I regret to say that this sort of thing has happened in the past and continues to happen. We are going to have to work hard to prevent its happening in the future.

I shall take advantage of the position I hold to bring this matter to the attention of not only those who read the report but also those who might have been involved in its printing, so that we can at least draw their attention to this egregious solecism.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: About this question of privilege, honourable senators, it is interesting to note that the French version appears to be fully in accordance with usage and practices concerning senators and members of Parliament.

However, there is a breach of the practice whereby reference to members of this honourable house should precede reference to members of the other place.

Here is how the title reads in French:

Rapport de la Commission chargée d'étudier les traitements des députés et des sénateurs.

According to a long-standing practice observed by the government, when one addresses or refers to both houses senators are named first, followed by members of the other place.

[English]

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, since we are dealing with these fine points, may I just point out that members of the House of Commons and the Senate do not receive salaries, unless they are cabinet ministers; rather, we receive indemnities.

MEAT INSPECTION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 16, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, to which was referred Bill C-33, intitled: "An Act respecting the import and export of and interprovincial trade in meat products, the registration of establishments, the inspection of animals and meat products in registered establishments and the standards for those establishments and for animals slaughtered and meat products prepared in those establishments", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, May 15, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Acting Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, our committee considered this bill and, as was expected, the evidence of the officials from the Department of Agriculture was most helpful. However, I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators particularly to clause 20.(r) under which Parliament would authorize the Governor in Council to make an order or orders:

(r) exempting any person, establishment, registered establishment, animal, meat product or any class thereof from the application of this Act or the regulations or any provision thereof;

As honourable senators will realize, that is a sweeping delegation of legislative authority by Parliament to the Governor in Council. It is interesting to recall that it was just 30 years ago, these very weeks, that John George Diefenbaker was mounting his great attack on the St. Laurent government, claiming that that government was guilty of arrogant contempt of Parliament by pushing through bills which conferred upon the government the right to make regulations and orders. That was the foundation from which Mr. Diefenbaker and the Progressive Conservative Party went on, in the following years, to win a great electoral victory after the pipeline debate.

Over the 30 years since then, this whole question of delegating legislative power to the executive government has been a matter of constant complaint in Parliament, in both the Senate and the House of Commons. For evidence of that one has only to turn to the index of the Debates of the House of Commons. I did that quite at random and I chose a quotation from Perrin Beatty, who is now the Honourable Perrin Beatty, Minister of National Revenue. When speaking in the House of Commons on May 12, 1978—and I submit, honourable senators, that this is relevant to the passage to which I have called your attention—he said:

The issue is nothing less than the need to preserve parliamentary sovereignty. No issue is more important to members of parliament than this. To this government the issue of parliamentary sovereignty appears to be an arcane one and parliament is viewed as an impediment, not as a partnership. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, the power of parliament is nothing less than the power of the people of Canada. If the government takes away the ability of parliament to debate, scrutinize, and hold it accountable for its actions, it undermines the ability and power of the people to keep an effective check on democracy and on this government.

He, of course, was speaking about the Trudeau government; and those Canadians who have lamented the growth of the practice of delegated legislation over the years must have applauded that statement. Those same people, I am sure, if they happen to see this particular provision in the Meat Inspection Act, will deplore it and be aggrieved.

Honourable senators, I have two particular complaints. The first is that this subclause authorizes the Governor in Council effectively—not formally, but effectively—to repeal the entire act in particular instances. I do not suggest that the Minister of Agriculture is likely to do that. I raise the point as a question of legislative principle. Is it desirable that Parliament should confer upon a minister or upon the Governor in Council the authority to wipe out all the provisions of an act of Parliament by a subordinate instrument?

My second complaint is that as this provision is worded it permits the Governor in Council to deal with particular instances and particular persons. It authorizes the Governor in Council to exempt any person, any establishment, any meat packing plant and so on. Surely that is offensive. If we are going to have this kind of sweeping delegation, it should authorize the Governor in Council to exempt any particular class of persons, such as airlines flying between provinces, or any particular class of establishment rather than giving authority to deal with particular persons and particular establishments.

I suggest, honourable senators, that this is a very offensive type of provision and that we ought to deplore it every time the present government indulges in what they used to deride as the arrogant contempt of Parliament. We ought not to give up on this but be persistent. I shall rely upon the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate to raise this with his colleagues and suggest to them that at least some of us here object to this kind of absolute and extensive delegation of power.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may add a word of support for Senator Stewart of Nova Scotia, I think that this is an issue that most of us have confronted many times over the years as parliamentarians and I do not think there is any partisan division about it. The problem is not, then, a new one and that is why we feel so frustrated. No matter how often it is raised by parliamentarians, no matter what government is in power, it seems to be brushed aside. In effect, the executive branch or the bureaucracy is given the right to legislate. The difficulty often is to find an example that will attract attention. For example, the wording of subparagraph (m) of clause 20 which reads: "respecting the inspection and disposal of imported meat products" makes it difficult to get people excited about the principle. The reaction is that that sounds quite reasonable. It is worth repeating our objection, and I am sure if Senator Godfrey were here he would have a comment to make, as would Senator Nurgitz as past joint-chairman and present joint-chairman, respectively, of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. That committee has the power to review these regulations but only after they are passed, not before. So, its exercise tends to be, though persistent and scholarly, a bit academic. By picking out clause 20, subparagraph (r), which provides for the exemption of "any person, establishment, registered establishment" and so on, we see that that provides the authority, in effect, for the bureaucracy not to have the act apply.

Senator Flynn: I doubt that.

Senator Frith: There may be some doubt as to how effective it could be, but that does not change the fact that we should draw attention to it.

Senator Flynn: Oh, sure.

Senator Frith: In doing so, Senator Stewart has picked a particularly meaty example, if I may use that expression.

Senator Flynn: I doubt that you could find a formula that would replace this one. The exemption has to be something special.

Senator Frith: The only way that you could do it is to try, at least, to reduce it to classes instead of to individual persons. It is persons and "classes" of persons.

Senator Flynn: It would be the same thing.

Senator Frith: I am not willing to give up that easily.

Senator Flynn: I am not saying that you should give up.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise to speak in the debate following on the opportunity provided to me by Senator Stewart. I should like to make a comment on his observations. I believe that he has a point, but did he not rather overstate his case by saying that this clause could be used to abolish the act insofar as people are concerned? I do not really read that into it. It seems to me that it renders the person exempt from the regulations. Perhaps it is a nice point but there is a difference between regulations and the statute, and I would think that perhaps Senator Stewart is over-reaching a little in making such a wide claim.

Nevertheless, from the point of view of strict parliamentarians—and we all belong to that category, I suppose—these clauses do cause some problems. However, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, there does need to be some kind of escape clause or release valve within the system, because it is entirely conceivable that there are instances where undue hardships will undoubtedly be imposed if, under certain circumstances, all the regulations under this law apply to a certain plant. I say that because, in my own province of Manitoba, we have had, from time to time, a number of smaller plants, and they are the ones who have found difficulty in complying with regulations laid down in good faith by the federal authority on interprovincial trade, but which impose an unrealistic obligation on some of the smaller livestock operations in a province such as Manitoba. Therefore, there is a reason for this and I do not object to it on the grounds that it is unreasonable. But let me be candid about it; I would feel happier if there were some provision whereby any exemptions, no matter how unusual they might be, were publicized in some way so that if there did appear to be an abuse of the system it would be brought to the notice of Parliament and others concerned.

What I would like to do, honourable senators, is to take advantage of the opportunity raised by this complaint to consult with my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, to see whether there is any procedure in his system whereby he could do something to allay the concerns of members of the Senate about conveying a power of exemption which, in the opinion of some, appears to be extreme. As I say, there is a good reason for having this clause in the bill, but there also may be a good reason for keeping an eye on it. So I will look into that situation to see whether anything can be done.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate two questions. First, he said that I over-react, and then he says that this simply exempts any person, establishment, et cetera, from the regulations. I wonder if he would read what the bill says. It does not say "only the regulations." It says:

... from the application of this Act or the regulations ...

It seems to me that he misreads the words of the bill.

My second question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Are we to understand from what he has said that it is the intention of the government to use this power to exempt smaller plants? If that is indeed the intention, I should think that it really is cause for alarm, because here we are dealing with regulations concerning the humane slaughter of food animals and the sanitary packing of meat. I should think that we would not want any exemptions, whether plants were large or small, in these regards. Perhaps he was grasping for an example and picked an unfortunate one.

Senator Roblin: No, on the contrary, and I will come to that in a moment. With respect to the first observation, I see the weight of my honourable friend's argument about the "application of the Act" phrase, but that applies only to the single instance that might be exempted. He left the impression in my mind that the act would be rendered null and void on a wide scale. But that is all right; we will not argue about that.

However, on the question of the smaller plant, I can tell him from my experiences as a person formerly in charge of live-stock regulations in a province, that we had difficulty in devising regulations which were fair and equitable for plants of various sizes, and if I remember my own experience correctly, it was in that area that some degree of discretion was required. I have no means of knowing whether that was the motive behind the inclusion of this particular clause, because I have not had the opportunity to ask about it, but I do know from my own experience that that could probably be a reason why this is so.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-45

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 21, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be authorized to examine the subject matter of the Bill C-45, intitled: "An Act respecting employment and employer and employee relations in the Senate and House of Commons", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, normally at this time I would move a motion indicating the date until which the Senate will adjourn. I am sure it is of particular interest to honourable senators, and I am happy to advise that the motion will be moved following Royal Assent this afternoon.

Senator Frith: At four o'clock, as planned?

Senator Phillips: At 5.55 p.m.

Senator Roblin: It is Opposition Day in the House of Commons, and you cannot shorten that.

Senator Phillips: I am sure Senator Frith will agree that we cannot be too certain, when things are in the hands of the opposition in the other place. This happens to be their day.

Senator Frith: Were it up to me, I would arrange it for four o'clock.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that next week the Senate may not have formal sittings in the chamber. However, all committees have permission to meet even if the Senate should not be sitting. It is expected that the following schedule will apply for committees next week.

On Tuesday, the Special Senate Committee on Youth will be meeting in Winnipeg; the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry will also meet, as will the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, and the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

On Wednesday, the Special Senate Committee on National Defence will meet and it is expected that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet. The Special Senate Committee on Youth will meet in Regina.

On Thursday, the Special Senate Committee on Youth will meet in Edmonton and there will be a meeting of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will also meet on Thursday, at 9.30 a.m., to hear the Minister of Justice on the amendments to the Criminal Code.

Some committees may hold additional meetings if the Senate does not sit. I have in mind, particularly, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs which has a very heavy schedule, as well as several other committees which are trying to complete their reports.

Honourable senators, I anticipate that the Senate will not sit next week, but I would point out that, as is usual in the case of such an adjournment, the Senate will be subject to recall, since there is a possibility, and it is only that, that this chamber may receive Bill C-32, to amend the Fisheries Act. If that happens, we will be recalled to deal with that piece of legislation.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the Senate Gallery in the House of Commons will be reserved for honourable senators wishing to listen to the budget speech. I should point out that guests will not be allowed into the gallery so that all honourable senators can hear the wisdom contained in the budget.

Senator Frith: I was going to go until you added those last words!

Senator Perrault: Beautiful dreamer!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

REQUEST FOR BRIEFING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand that the Minister of Finance has arranged for officials of the Department of Finance to brief members of the House of Commons about the budget after its presentation. Will the leader ask the minister if the same useful briefings on the budget by persons from the Department of Finance will be available to honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall make inquiries.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO LEAK

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to another leak just as astonishing as the other one. I am referring to the Macdonald Commission's report which is now in the hands of the editors of La Presse.

Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government intends to launch an inquiry into this matter?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that when the report is officially received the government will announce what it intends to do about it. To the best of my knowledge, and in spite of what appears in the newspapers, the report has not been completed to the point where it can be handed to the Prime Minister. When that is done, the Prime Minister will make a statement as to the government's response to the report.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: A supplementary question, honourable senators. Should the situation be cleared up, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government would then direct that the report be made public forthwith, considering that it is now readily available in newsrooms?

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think we will have to wait until we see the official report before anything can be done about that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary. Would the leader determine if there is any intention to inquire further as to the leak and as to whether any steps will be taken against the person who did leak the document?

Senator Roblin: We will have to await the Prime Minister's reaction to that because the report was commissioned by the Prime Minister and I presume the report will be made to the Prime Minister. It will be up to the Prime Minister to decide whether or not the leak is a matter that needs further attention.

Senator Frith: Will the Leader of the Government ask the Prime Minister, and inform the chamber when the Prime Minister makes a decision on the subject of the leak?

Senator Roblin: I think that if my honourable friend is patient the Prime Minister will tell him directly.

Senator Frith: That's a difficult "if".

Senator Perrault: The universe will unfold.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

FAILURE OF PIONEER TRUST—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. D. G. Stewart: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would look into the possibility of the federal government's conducting some kind of inquiry into the collapse of Pioneer Trust Company. He pointed out at that time that there had been a trustee appointed and that he would want to see the terms of reference for the appointment of the trustee before he could answer the question.

Has the leader examined that document, and is he now in a position to answer the question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am in a position to say that receivers in bankruptcy are officers of the court, are appointed by the court, and make their reports to the court.

Among the items on which they will have to report is the conduct of the directors in the recent past insofar as that might have had any impact on the bankruptcy, as well as a great many other factors in connection with the events leading up to the bankruptcy. If in that process they discover matters that require further attention, then the court will be seized with them.

• (1430)

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. My understanding is that the leader said he would look into that particular document about the trustees and find out just how broad are the terms of reference, particularly as to whether or not they are broad enough to cover all these questions that have been raised by myself and by people in the province of Saskatchewan. Does the leader have that document in his hands? Has he examined it and, if so, is he prepared to say whether or not the terms of reference are broad enough?

Senator Roblin: The terms of reference of a body like this are part of the statutes of law. They can be obtained from the Bankruptcy Act. As I told my honourable friend—and I repeat it—I shall make additional inquiries to see whether there is any further information in addition to what he has mentioned that would be useful to him. When I get that information I shall let him know.

Senator Steuart: I do not know why it is taking the leader so long. I have the document here and I will send a copy of it to him. The document is quite straightforward and begs the question. As a matter of fact the trustees were appointed by the Attorney General of Canada, so I would not think that the leader should have much trouble finding the document. I certainly had no trouble getting a copy yesterday. The order bears out what I said at the time. Under paragraph 2(d) of the document it says, “for an order that the liquidator”—which is Touche Ross—“until further order of the court and to the extent that he deems it prudent so to do, may . . .” As I read that item, the trustee need only look at what he deems prudent, and even then it says that he “may” look into it. In other words, he does not have to look at anything as long as he carries out his first responsibility which is to the creditors, to pay them off and get out as quickly as possible, which is mostly what such people do.

The former Minister of Justice shakes his head. I do not know whether he is trying to clear his brain or whether it is a habit.

Senator Flynn: I am trying to understand the honourable senator's point.

Senator Steuart: The honourable senator has the same problem no matter who is talking. He seems to have trouble understanding any point that anybody makes.

I will give the Leader of the Government an opportunity to look the document over and to respond. However, as I read it, and I have had legal advice on it, there is no requirement that Touche Ross look into anything that has been done wrong, whether it be by the directors, by management or anybody else. The point I have been trying to make is the one which the opposition in the Legislature of Saskatchewan has been trying to make, that if the Government of Saskatchewan will not do anything, then it is the responsibility of the federal government, which has appointed Touche Ross, to look into the affairs of this company and the terrible default on hundreds of millions of dollars. There is no guarantee that Touche Ross will go beyond paying off creditors and getting out, and there is nothing in here or anywhere else that will force them to do so.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it would have been more courteous of my honourable friend to have informed me right away that he had this document in his hand. I confessed that I did not have it. It is not very productive for him to conduct himself in the way that he has. I have to tell him from a cursory look at this thing that it is a legal document and that it requires a legal opinion. I certainly do not think that it comes within my terms of reference to supply legal opinions. However, I shall not allow that to divert me from the intention I expressed the last time we discussed this subject to look into it further. I shall look into it further and take the points my honourable friend has raised and examine them seriously to see whether or not they fall within the four corners of the statements I have been making or whether or not there is another approach to the matter. I tell my honourable friend that I am not yet ready to do so. When I am, he shall hear from me.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I do not need a lecture on courtesy from the Leader of the Government. I first asked my question last Tuesday. I received this document Tuesday evening, a document put out by the Government of Canada. Surely, if the leader wanted to fulfil his responsibility, he could have had it today. I had no trouble getting it. When I asked my questions of the leader I thought that perhaps he had a copy of it. Obviously, he did not, or if he did he ignored it. Therefore, I ask that he not give me lectures on courtesy. I am suggesting that he should do his job because there is some importance and urgency to this matter.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will find that I do my job. I do not know his sources of information, but it looks to me as though somebody is feeding him the information that he wants. I congratulate him on his sources of information. I am doing my best with the poor facilities of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, last Tuesday I raised a question with the Leader of the Government about the directors of this company. I was told that I had received my answer because his colleague had said that it is the law. The petition on behalf of the Attorney General, which is dated February 8, has with it an exhibit which is also dated February 8, 1985—a long time ago. This information has been available since then. I think I know a little bit about the Bankruptcy Act. This document specifies what Touche Ross will be looking at. The question I asked of the Leader of the Government was: Would he not undertake to have it specified that the liquidator look at the conduct of the directors to determine whether or not they carried out their duties as prudent men? I put that question to him again.

Senator Roblin: I give my honourable friend the same answer that I gave Senator Steuart. I take the matter seriously and I shall see that all aspects of the situation are reviewed.

Senator Sinclair: All aspects of the situation may not include a specific designation to Touche Ross, which has the right to employ counsel and the right to employ solicitors, to look specifically into the conduct of the directors of the company over a period of time. Will he undertake to make sure that that specific responsibility is brought to the attention of the liquidators?

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Roblin: In my vocabulary, "all" means "all."

Senator Sinclair: Thank you.

INDUSTRY

YUKON—CLOSING OF CYPRUS ANVIL MINE

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There was an announcement this morning that the Cyprus Anvil Mine in the Yukon will be mothballed and that all employees will be paid off. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government has an update on the information on this matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to thank my honourable friend for giving me notice of his question. He assumed, quite correctly, that without notice I would not be able to give him an answer on the spot, so I thank him for his courtesy.

I can tell him that the minister, the Honourable David Crombie, has received a letter from the Amax/Samim Group, which is a mining group, outlining a letter of intent with respect to their proposals for the re-opening or reactivation of this mine. This proposal has been presented to the owner, which is Dome. The fact that this private investor has made a serious proposal is a hopeful omen because we are all concerned about the future of that mine. It is one of the main sources of employment and income in that part of the world and its closure is a local disaster. So anything that leads to the re-opening of that mine has to be encouraging.

I would point out that these are merely negotiations. I cannot give any more information than that. Even if I knew, which I do not, it would not be very helpful. I can tell my honourable friend that there is an interest in this mine and that it is hoped that something good will come of it.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, the word I received from the Yukon this morning was that people were concerned that the mine was finished, that it is closed and it is being mothballed. What I am being told now is that the negotiations for the sale of the mine are ongoing and that there is still a possibility that the mine will be purchased by Amax and re-opened.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend what Amax is saying about it. Their feeling is that the proposals they have made provide a sound base for the development of a viable operation, which obviously means re-opening the mine. Amax feels positive about the outcome. That seems to me to be hopeful.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 28, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

On April 30, 1985, a motion by the Honourable Senator Godfrey relating to the invitation to provinces to appear before Senate committees was referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Your Committee met on May 14 and May 28 to examine the matter. Your Committee concludes that the motion should not become a formal rule of the Senate at this time. It does recommend, however, that the following be observed by committees of the Senate as a general practice:

That, whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which, in the opinion of the committee, a province or territory has a special interest, alone or with other provinces or territories, then as a general policy, the government of that province or territory or such other provinces or territories should, where practicable, be invited by the committee to make written or verbal representations to the committee, and any province or territory that replies in the affirmative should be given reasonable opportunity to do so.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall the report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator MacEachen, later this day I will be presenting a Notice of Inquiry. It is not yet ready, so later I will be asking for leave to revert to Notices of Inquiries. I have already mentioned the subject matter to Senator Doody.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

TAX INCREASES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government one or two questions with respect to the budget that was presented during the Senate's short recess. I would draw to his attention the statement made by the Minister of Finance on November 8, 1984, in which he stated, under the heading "Our Strategy for Growth and Jobs":

Our immediate goal is to reduce the deficit through expenditure reductions and not through major tax increases.

Can the Leader of the Government explain why the government has had such an abrupt change in policy, and why it has misled the Canadian people in bringing in massive and inequitable tax increases, when the minister assured the Canadian public last November that he had no intention of bringing in major tax increases?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand from my colleague sitting next to me that the inquiry, of which notice is to be given later, has to do with the budget. If that is correct, then I believe it would be more fruitful for us to deal with our examination of that subject in the course of debate.

The question asked by my honourable friend is one that does not permit itself of a short answer such as "Yes" or "No," but it does permit itself of an answer, and I am looking forward, in the course of the debate on the budget, to offering some comments on that subject.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, obviously I cannot force an answer out of the Leader of the Government, but it certainly would be better to be entering the debate on the budget with a better knowledge as to the reasoning of the government. If the minister is not able or is unwilling to tell us why this abrupt change in policy has taken place, then, until we have that information, we can only regard it as a cynical misleading of the Canadian people. If the minister were to give us some reasonable explanation, we might take a different view. It is not just a commitment that was made only last November. On March 1 of this year the Minister of Finance also stated publicly that he had no intention of increasing taxes for the Canadian people. Therefore, I believe it is reasonable, before we enter into debate on the budget, to know why the government has had such an abrupt change in policy. So I invite the Leader of the Government to give us at least a tentative answer. I invite him into the ring.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe my honourable friend will recollect his own experience as Minister of Finance, and he will understand that these matters cannot be dealt with in Question Period. Indeed, I will go further and say that they should not be dealt with in Question Period. They require extensive consideration, and when our policy is under challenge, as it will be in the inquiry we are to consider with respect to the budget, we fully expect to defend it and to defend it successfully.

• (1410)

Senator MacEachen: Why is it not possible to defend it in Question Period, which is the normal forum for the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate? It is obvious that the minister is unprepared to deal with that difficult question; he has to get some briefing somewhere, or get some fraudulent reasoning that would be difficult to find.

[Senator MacEachen.]

May I give the minister another opportunity to come to the bat on what appears to be an indefensible budget, even in the mind of the Leader of the Government in the Senate? The Minister of Finance has told us, as has the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government, that extensive consultations would take place before any major changes were made in Canadian practice. Will the minister tell me what consultation took place on the question of the elimination of the full indexation of the tax system? Was that a matter of discussion at the economic conference which the minister attended and where the personalities were asked to give their views on the elimination of the full indexation of the tax system?

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend was on the government side of the house he never hesitated to point out that Question Period is Question Period; that it is restricted to those matters which can be dealt with in a succinct and successful manner; and that it is not a substitute for debate. Now, my honourable friend wants to debate. I encourage him to debate. But he should restrict his debating proclivities to the proper form—namely, the resolution which he himself is prepared to propose. If he is prepared to propose this resolution, as I understand he is, then he can give vent to all his suspicions about "fraudulent reasoning" and other unworthy statements he has been making in this connection. I look forward to receiving the full thrust of his argument and his intellectual curiosity on these matters, and I expect to be able to give an adequate answer.

Senator MacEachen: An adequate answer, but not today. Why not answer today? Is there not an answer for this reversal on the part of the government, which has now launched a savage assault on the middle- and lower-income people of Canada? The minister cannot tell us why. He cannot tell us anything about indexation. He has to wait. Why the delay? Is he merely justifying what we all think, that the budget is indefensible and the minister cannot answer anything unless he goes and consults with more imaginative members of his party?

Senator Roblin: I doubt that my honourable friend really thinks that I am in that position. He is merely attempting to use Question Period to draw me out on to grounds which ought to be covered properly in debate. He knows that as well as I do. If he were standing, in my position, he would be presenting those arguments himself, I have not the slightest doubt. So I suggest that he restrain his impetuosity and, if I may say so, his petulance and wait until he is able to present his case in the appropriate manner, in the appropriate way, by means of the debate—and we look forward to hearing from him on those occasions.

Senator MacEachen: I am not impatient. I am incredulous that the Leader of the Government should say now that it is not parliamentary practice to answer questions on a budget statement. From the day I entered Parliament there was no Question Period more lively than the ones following budgets, when Ministers of Finance daily and for weeks answered questions on the budget. That has been the traditional parliamentary practice, not to hide behind spurious points of order, raised not because they are valid but because the minister is reluctant to deal with the inequities of this budget.

Senator Roblin: Well, it is perfectly clear that my honourable friend has not considered very seriously the way in which we deal with the budget in the Senate, because that has not been our custom in the past. My honourable friend knows perfectly well that the Minister of Finance is in the House of Commons, not here, and the Minister of Finance is therefore, I think, quite logically expected to deal with these matters in the House of Commons. In the Senate that has not been the case. My honourable friend should check the record and he will see that it has not been the case. What we have done is, we have had a resolution such as the one that is now being proposed, and when that resolution has been put forward we have dealt with matters in connection with the budget, so my honourable friend really need not try to impute to me any motives I do not have.

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government seriously stating that it is inappropriate to ask in the Senate questions on a budget presentation; that that is not the practice? I must say that I cannot give an answer because I have not had the experience of the past, but if the Leader of the Government tells me that it is not the practice and that it is inappropriate, of course, I shall accept it as truthful. I must say that if there is a case for Senate reform, it should begin immediately and we should insist on getting answers from the minister on budgetary matters.

Senator Roblin: I give my honourable friend no advice about asking questions in the Senate. He is entitled to ask any questions he likes. However, I have to tell him that he is proving every minute the point that I am trying to make, that this is a matter of debate and not a matter for Question Period. Look at the smile on his face.

Senator MacEachen I smile at ridiculous answers.

Senator Roblin: He knows very well that this topic is a matter for discussion and debate. How on earth can I answer in the course of Question Period complicated questions which involve answers that might extend to 20 or 30 minutes? That is not the purpose of Question Period. If we had in this house rules such as they have in the House of Commons, my honourable friend would never get away with the kind of nonsense he is trying to get away with now.

I tell my honourable friend that if he stands up tomorrow or the next day and introduces his motion in connection with the budget, we will be able to answer the questions that he raises and give satisfactory explanations on the points that bother him.

Senator MacEachen: After you have had a caucus.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which arises out of the answer he has just given and is stimulated by his belief that someone is getting away with nonsense.

Senator Flynn: That is nothing new.

Senator Frith: Nothing new for the—

Senator Flynn: There is nothing new in getting away with nonsense.

Senator Frith: I do not agree. I think that for Senator Roblin to try to get away with nonsense is not usual.

Senator Flynn: Do not distort what I said.

Senator Frith: It is not usual for him to make such an attempt, but in this case he is. If the leader is suggesting that there is to be an inquiry dealing with the budget and that, therefore, it ought not to be a subject for Question Period, in the first place, that assertion is clearly unreasonable and, in the second place, it is not supported by practice in the Senate. As I recall, one of the first times we ever dealt with the budget in debate was the last budget, when the then Leader of the Government, Senator Olson, introduced an inquiry. I agree with Senator Roblin that an appropriate way to debate the question is to deal with it on an inquiry.

But, as Senator MacEachen has pointed out, in the House of Commons the budget can be a subject matter for Question Period, notwithstanding the fact that they have set aside a number of days to debate it. If the point being made is that anything that is the subject matter of debate, either by inquiry, resolution or otherwise, should not figure at all in Question Period, particularly as it refers to the budget, there is no authority whatsoever for that position. Certainly, Senator Roblin can say, "Look, I don't want to answer that question" or he can refuse to answer the question, because, as we know, he is entitled to do so. However, I do not think he can reasonably take that position on the basis that the topic is going to be the subject of an inquiry. If the leader is saying that he does not want to answer such questions until the matter is debated, that is fine, but to suggest that there is something improper about raising the subject in Question Period is supported neither by reason, practice, tradition nor order.

Senator Roblin: Of course, my honourable friend omitted to remember the fact that I said that honourable senators on the other side—indeed, any senator—can ask any question he or she likes. It is not up to me to tell him or her what questions he or she should ask. That is at the discretion of the senator. But when a question involves a matter that is debatable in the sense that it requires an extensive answer, as the points we are discussing today require extensive answers, I do not think it is a proper subject for Question Period, because it cannot be dealt with satisfactorily in that way. If we think about it for a minute, we will all agree that Question Period was not intended for that purpose.

Senator Olson: Since when? Since Senators Flynn, Roblin and Murray—

Senator Doody: Order!

Senator Roblin: I did not get answers either.

Senator Olson: No, but you tried.

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: I must say that the questions I have received so far I am prepared to deal with not in Question Period but in the debating forum.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as long as it is clear that we are not referring to questions relating to the budget being out of order during Question Period; rather, we are talking about questions that the Leader of the Government in the Senate says he would rather debate than answer. That is a different matter.

I hope it is clear that there can be questions during Question Period relating to the budget; that such questions are perfectly proper; that they are normal; that they are common. When Senator Olson introduced the inquiry that had as its subject matter the last budget, there were plenty of questions every day for many days, including days on which we debated the inquiry. On those days, there were questions during Question Period and of course, under those circumstances, as was usually the case, Senator Olson did his very best to answer.

Senator Flynn: You have a good memory.

Senator Doody: You must have made a wonderful Mikado.

Senator Roblin: I must start off by saying that while there are rules in the Senate, they are sometimes hard to identify. I have to admit that for starters, because this is a free-form assembly in many ways. However, as the person called on to answer the questions, I feel I am entitled to discriminate between those questions that I think are appropriate for me to answer and those which I should answer in another way or at another time. That is all I am trying to do.

I only hope that, when I do come to speak in this debate, as no doubt I shall, I give as good an account of myself as Senator Olson has done.

Senator Frith: You are setting high standards.

Hon. H. A. Olson: The record must include the fact that Senator Roblin, who is now the leader, was at that time Opposition house leader and deputy leader and that Senator Murray who sat behind him as well as the leader, Senator Flynn, attempted to argue that they were not out of order in asking the type of questions that Senator MacEachen has just asked, and that they would never have attempted to stop that kind of questioning on the basis that it was out of order or improper during Question Period. I think that Senator Roblin ought to admit that he is not willing to answer the questions now, as Senator Frith has said. However, to try to argue that it is improper or out of order is a complete contradiction of the activities carried on for many years by at least those three senators and perhaps others.

Senator Frith: You must admit that Senator Olson did have answers. That made it easier for him.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, of course, ought to do me the credit of remembering that twice today I have said that I do not tell people what questions they may ask. They may ask any questions they please. I have to deal with the answering side of the matter, not the questioning side.

IMPACT OF TAX INCREASES

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, perhaps I can help the Leader of the Government in the Senate by asking him a specific question. I have the privilege to be from Halton, Ontario. That designation may not mean very much to honourable senators, but Halton has in its environs the Ford plant. Ford employs some 35,000 people in Canada.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me how an increase of nine cents a gallon in the price of gasoline and an increase of 1 per cent in the sales tax will result in more jobs at Ford in Halton?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must point out to my honourable friend that one of the problems of trying to deal with his question is that it does not involve merely the tax on gasoline—although goodness knows that is important enough in itself; it involves all of the various considerations that go into the formulation of a budget and that, again, bears on the question of employment. If my honourable friend expects me to answer that specific question without discussing the whole of the rationale behind the tax and expenditure problems of the government, then I think he is asking me to do something that is unreasonable.

Senator Sinclair: It may be that you are entering into a philosophical discussion, but I think the people who work for Ford are considering what people look for when they buy a car, namely, what it will cost them to buy and what it will cost them to run. Perhaps his philosophical argument will be that these measures will result in a cheaper and lower cost of living. I find that difficult to understand, but if he does not want to answer that question, perhaps he can help me with my next question.

All of us have looked forward to the fairness that was emphasized prior to this budget and underlined in the documents that were tabled in the other place on Thursday of last week. Could the leader indicate how fairness results when there is a skewing of the impact of taxation?

Senator Roblin: Will the honourable senator repeat the last part of his question?

Senator Sinclair: The budget skews the impact. I am asking the leader how this fairness fits.

Senator Roblin: The question of fairness is an essential element of this budget, and I am sure we will hear about that later.

But in connection with the gasoline tax, I will not propose any philosophical argument; when the time comes, I will be dealing with dollars, cents and percentages; I will be speaking about deficits, expenditures and all of the elements that go into the creation of policy, of which this item is one. It cannot be dealt with intelligently, if I may be allowed to use that word, by trying to deal with each item separately. That is not the way it works; it hangs together as one conceived whole, and that is the way I intend to deal with it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, when I graduated from university—

Senator Flynn: Did you?

Senator Sinclair: Unfortunately, they graduated me—to the great delight of my mother, but perhaps not to your great delight, Senator Flynn.

Nevertheless, let me say this: Many Canadians have graduated from university in recent years who cannot find gainful employment. That is a demonstrable need, and those people expect that definitive, recognizable action will be taken immediately. They do not expect philosophical statements that things will be better mañana.

Would the honourable Leader of the Government let us know where in the budget we can find immediate action with respect to unemployment and Canada's youth?

Senator Flynn: You went to university, so you should be able to read it.

Senator Roblin: I cannot believe that my honourable friend has not taken the trouble to examine the documents that were tabled in the other place last week and those documents that were tabled in the Senate today in connection with the government's views on unemployment, and the monetary allocations that have been made with respect to that.

Senator Olson: It is $78 million less!

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend reads those documents, he will be able to get a good deal of the answer to his own question.

I expect to hear his more precise objections to the government's policy with respect to jobs when he takes part in the debate on the budget speech. I want to hear what he intends to do with respect to job creation, and when I have heard that I will be in a position to measure his views against those of others.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—FUTURE PROSPECTS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the future of the sugar-beet and the sugar-processing industry in Canada.

It is clear now that action has not been taken and no program has been announced which would allow the sugar-beet producers in Canada to plant a crop this year. That has many ramifications in that the processing factories will not operate this year. That also raises for the sugar-beet producers the question of whether or not they should keep their specialized machinery and other equipment in a state of readiness so that it can be utilized in future years.

• (1430)

I would ask the Leader of the Government to make inquiries of the sugar processing factories in the three areas of Canada in which they are located—southern Alberta, southern Manitoba, and Quebec—as to whether or not they will be maintaining their processing capability in such a state as to be capable of processing sugar-beets in 1986 and subsequent years.

There is of course some expense incurred by producers in maintaining their machinery in a state which will enable them to be ready for another year. There needs to be some understanding between the producer organizations and the processing factories so that the producers will be in a position to plant a crop in 1986.

This is not the first time that the sugar industry has been in the precarious position of not knowing whether or not there is going to be an on-going sugar producing industry in Canada. Many times in the past we have been faced with the very difficult situation where the price of imported sugar was below the cost of production in Canada, and at those times the federal government introduced deficiency or stabilization payments to carry the industry over such periods. That was not done this year, with the result that the industry is shut down for 1985.

I am wondering now whether we can advise the sugar-beet producers in my province and those in southern Manitoba and Quebec that this industry is going to be retained or saved for future production years.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend was good enough to give me notice of his question, and I thank him for that.

My honourable friend is quite correct when he says that this is a very difficult year for sugar-beet producers. The price of sugar on the international market, landed at Canadian ports, is probably about three cents a pound, whereas the cost of production in Canada must be five or six times that amount. That is certainly the case in the west, as I understand the situation.

The federal government offered an element of subsidy in Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec, and I think in all three provinces there was a matching subsidy from the provincial government. So, there was an element of support. But I think my honourable friend is correct in saying that, in spite of that, in southern Alberta, at any rate, nothing is going on in the sugar-beet fields. I must confess, I am uncertain as to the situation in Manitoba and Quebec.

The question my honourable friend raises is one that is easy to answer in the short run. In the course of the next 12 months or so, one can fully expect the sugar companies to maintain their plants. It is in their economic interest to do so. I think it is safe for me to say that that will happen. But my honourable friend puts his finger on a far more important point, and that is the long-term future for this industry. On that aspect of his question, I am unable to give him an answer. I can tell him that the problem is now being considered by the federal Department of Agriculture. Consultations will take place among the sugar-beet growers, the manufacturers and the provincial governments over the next little while to see what light can be shed on the long-term future of what is now a very depressed industry.

Apart from the fact that we are seized with the problem, it is apparent to me that it will be some few months yet before any definitive statement can be made about it.

Senator Olson: A supplementary question. I appreciate the comments made by the Leader of the Government. One question arises out of his comment to the effect that he is fairly confident that it is in the economic interests of the sugar processing factories to keep their production capabilities intact. I would ask the Leader of the Government to look into the situation to determine that that is in fact taking place as opposed to being merely an expressed hope, because many of these factories—in fact, I think all of them—are now more than 40 or 50 years old, with the result that there is the possibility of some obsolescence.

I would be interested in hearing from B.C. Sugar in the case of Alberta—and I think the same company is operating in Manitoba—as to whether it is in fact doing what the Leader of the Government says he thinks is in their economic interest to do.

Senator Roblin: I shall do my best to find out.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THIRD WORLD—GOVERNMENT AID

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, on May 15 last the Leader of the Government in the Senate in reply to my question assured the Senate that the government statement in the Foreign Policy green paper on competitiveness and security predicting “budget reductions in international activities” did not herald a retreat to a foreign policy of neo-isolationism.

In the November statement, Mr. Wilson cut $180 million from our foreign aid budget. On May 23 last, Mr. Wilson's budget announced a further slash of $50 million in foreign aid. We have now had a massive reduction of over $230 million in our foreign aid budget, which causes CIDA to severely cut or curtail its activities.

During the last election campaign, Mr. Mulroney promised the Canadian people that there would be no cuts in international aid. At the Bonn Summit, he assured not only the Third World but the leaders of the Free World that he would be a supporter of foreign aid to the Third World.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate now explain what new facts have caused the government to change abruptly or to reverse its promised policy in respect of foreign aid?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall have to take the question as notice.

[Senator Roblin.]

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question to that asked by my colleague, Senator Olson.

I am wondering whether the on-going consideration the government will be giving to the problems of the sugar-beet industry will include an acceleration of the formulation of a national sugar policy, the absence of which, I believe, has been at the core of some of these problems.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I answered that question when responding to Senator Olson's question. The development of a national sugar policy is now under consideration. However, I do not expect to be able to provide an elaboration of that policy for several months yet.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I would ask the Leader of the Government to find out from the Department of Agriculture, in the course of making his inquiries, whether or not there is any policy or program with respect to what these farmers are going to do with the acres that were devoted to sugar-beets in the past. I am thinking of programs for alternative crops.

In Alberta, some 30,000 to 35,000 acres were devoted to sugar-beets. The sugar-beet producers should have some guidance in terms of what they should do with those acres that were used for sugar-beet production in the crop year 1985.

Senator Roblin: I will see whether there is any specific information on that. I would expect that the farmers will do what they have always done, and that is to follow their own good judgment.

In Manitoba before we had sugar-beets, we had wheat, oats and barley. Since then we have had very considerable improvements in the different crops which are now available, such as canola, sunflower seeds, corn and many other special crops. I fully expect that the farmers will follow their own judgment as to what they think is their best market policy.

I shall ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has any comment on my honourable friend's inquiry.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope the Leader of the Government will do that, because when one is talking about a comparison between wheat, oats or barley and sugar-beets in terms of gross dollar value per acre, one is talking about a gross value for the alternative crops 20 per cent below that of the sugar-beet crop. If a producer has debt service charges and other commitments based on the value of sugar-beet production, these other crops would not even come near paying the expenses—expenses that were incurred some time in the past.

Senator Roblin: I do not argue with my honourable friend's opinion. I merely point out that one can sell canola at a market price that does represent a return to the producer, and the same is true of the other crops I mentioned; whereas, without some special arrangement, the same is not true of sugar-beets right now. But we do not disagree on that.

INDUSTRY

RAILWAYS—WINNIPEG, MANITOBA—TRANSCONA SHOPS AND EAST YARDS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns statements he made in Winnipeg last Friday indicating that there is going to be some "heavy spending" by the government at the Transcona shops.

As he knows, these shops represent a serious problem for Manitoba. However, after his statement apparently CN and federal transport officials said they knew nothing about such a program. In fact, we have the following quote: "I don't know what he is talking about," a spokesman for Transport Minister Don Mazankowski said." So he leaves Manitobans in total confusion at this point as to what is going to happen, what is going to be spent and what is the proposal.

● (1440)

Senator Frith: Roblin for Minister of Transport!

Senator Roblin: I have no ambition to succeed to any other post as a gift of any government of Canada, other than the trying and taxing one that I have at the present time. I can tell my honourable friend that he is right, that the government is concerned to make it known that the Transcona shops in Winnipeg have a recognized and growing future with respect to their responsibilities in maintaining the rolling stock of the railway in western Canada. Substantial investments have been made recently, as my honourable friend knows, and in my speech I said that further investments of a substantial character would be made to further improve the capacity of the Transcona shops site in the future.

My honourable friend obviously wants to know when, where, how much and why. That information will be forthcoming. He will find that in due course the people in the Department of Transport will recognize the reference in my remarks, and, indeed, so will the Canadian National Railways. It was apparent to me at the time that it would be appropriate for me to wait for those bodies, who will actually be doing the job and providing the money, to make the statement in respect of that.

So I say to my honourable friend: Be of good cheer. The outlook for Transcona is good, and before too long—the sooner the better as far as I am concerned—the substance of my statement will emerge.

Senator Molgat: As a supplementary, I wonder if the Leader of the Government can indicate when that might happen; because we have heard such statements before to the effect that it will happen, and it seems that the same project is announced a number of times. I would like to get this matter pinned down. As he knows, the employment situation in Manitoba is critical at this point. We have been hopeful that a maintenance centre would be established by VIA Rail, but that has been cancelled. Can he tell us when this might happen?

Senator Roblin: I can understand my honourable friend's concern, because the former Minister of Transport was a past master in making statements with respect to the future of his part of the country, which perhaps were a little less concrete than one might wish. So I understand the problem that my honourable friend is worried about. I can assure him that the present Minister of Transport, who will be making the announcements in detail, can be relied upon to do what he said he is going to do.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government, in his reply, referred to previous ministers, and therefore I presume it is fair game for me to mention them also. I know that a number of his announcements have been cancelled by his honourable friends. For example, the research centre in Winnipeg, which was actually under construction—three floors—has been cancelled. So I do not believe he should be referring to promises that were made and not fulfilled.

I wish to return to the subject of the railway. My concern is that the Leader of the Government makes a statement in Manitoba, on his home ground, and then an official from the office of the Minister of Transport in Ottawa says, "I don't know what he is talking about." Whom do we believe, the minister or the official from the office of the Minister of Transport? Does he know what he is talking about?

Senator Roblin: I should respond first to the comment about the National Research Council building in Winnipeg. It is not cancelled. It has been completed. There it stands, and is ready for use. I can also report to the house that the federal government minister responsible for that operation is formulating plans, in connection with the private sector of the economy, to put that research centre to use, which will be focused on the small business requirements of Winnipeg and western Canada. It is perfectly true that we have changed the plan in that we are not going ahead with what seemed to us to be a less productive way of operating that national research centre. I can assure my honourable friend that we are going to operate it in what we consider to be the most productive way possible for us, and we hope that the Province of Manitoba will join in—although that is a bit of a question mark at the present time.

With respect to the latter part of the question, I can assure him that I am right.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question relating to further comments made by the Leader of the Government in Manitoba. It is on a slightly different subject, but still affects the railway. He indicated that the government is now interested in developing the East Yards. Can he give us some details of what is proposed there? Will it be the government, the CNR or VIA Rail, when may we expect action to proceed, and how much money is involved?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am glad that my speech attracted my honourable friend's attention. I wish I could be assured that it attracted as much attention from the rest of the Manitoban public. I sometimes doubt that it did; but I am glad that one person is keeping an eye on me, anyway.

With respect to the East Yards, that is the area on the northwest side of the forks of the Assiniboine and Red Rivers. Just about 108 years ago, this week or next week, my grandfather got off a steamboat there. He had come up from some place on the Red River, and, in 1877, began the connection between my family and the good people of the province of Manitoba. So I have a special, what might be called emotional interest in the East Yards. Nowadays it is deserted. It is a wilderness of weeds, railway tracks and falling-down buildings, and so on, and it needs to be rehabilitated.

What I said in Winnipeg, and I am glad to repeat here, is that I intend to make it, insofar as I am able to do so, an important priority that this piece of real estate, so advantageously and historically situated in Winnipeg—probably a little removed from full commercial development at present—should be rehabilitated, so that instead of being discredited, rundown and a rather unpleasant part of the city, it can now become a credit to our community. It is a project in which I am taking an interest, and, I am glad to tell my honourable friend, so is the minister in charge of the Core Area Project. I am not entirely certain that the city or the province has the same enthusiasm for it as we have, but we think that despite that something may be done, and quite soon.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a few delayed answers, which I request be taken as read.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—HON. FLORENCE BIRD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate on April 24 by Senators Marsden and Wood respecting the status of women and the Honourable Florence Bird.

Mrs. Bird's term of office with the Refugee Status Advisory Committee expired on March 15, 1985. The Minister of Employment and Immigration advised Mrs. Bird, in a personal letter, that she would not be appointed for a second term of office. The letter conveyed to Mrs. Bird the deepest regard the Minister of Employment and Immigration has for the contribution Mrs. Bird has made to this country.

The decision to appoint new members rather than re-appoint former members reflected the Minister's desire to alter the composition of RSAC to ensure the Committee was drawing upon expertise, from across this country, in the emerging fields of interest to refugees.

NAMIBIA—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERIM ADMINISTRATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised by the Honourable Senator MacEachen concerning Namibia—proposed establishment of interim administration—government position.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs issued a communiqué on April 19 which made clear Canada's position on internal developments in Namibia. We regard the unilateral measures taken by the South African Government in relation to the establishment of constitutional bodies, and the transfer of power in Namibia, to be null and void. Canada remains committed to UN Security Council Resolution 453 as the only agreed basis for achieving internationally recognized independence for Namibia. In concert with members of the Security Council who issued a statement regarding the South African action on May 6, we condemn the South African Government's action, not least because it suggests that South Africa does not intend to proceed promptly with the implementation of Resolution 435.

For Canada, the essential issue has been Namibia's independence, not the work of the Contact Group as such. The long delays in efforts to bring about a withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola in parallel with the achievement of Namibia's independence do not give cause for optimism that this approach will lead to an early settlement. Canada has allowed much time for the pursuit of this approach but in view of the doubtful prospects, we are re-examining the question. Our aim will be to maintain and reiterate support for the United Nations plan embodied in Resolution 435, and to search for means to hasten its implementation. In theory, the Contact Group has an important role in the application of Resolution 435: The question we are addressing is whether that goal can be effectively pursued and made a reality.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

LONG-TERM ILLEGAL MIGRANTS REVIEW COMMITTEE—POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION OF CONDUCT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised on April 25 by Senator Frith regarding Employment and Immigration—Long-term Illegal Migrants Review Committee—possible investigation of conduct of chairman.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to hear the answer.

Senator Roblin: It is about the chairman who got into trouble regarding immigration.

Senator Frith: But I would like to hear it.

Senator Roblin: With great pleasure. It reads:

The government is not aware of any case being handled by the Long-term Illegal Migrants Review Committee in anything but the fairest manner consistent with the guidelines of the program.

There is no further investigation under way.

Senator Frith: Not there, anyway.

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator may have further questions, and we will do the best we can with them.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LIMITED CANCELLATION OF DOOR-TO-DOOR DELIVERY SERVICE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate by Senator Haidasz respecting Canada Post Corporation—limited cancellation of door-to-door delivery service.

No such action has been taken. It is Canada Post's intention to provide service—any of the four free service methods. The are: general delivery, suburban service, rural route, or door-to-door—to their customers in the most efficient and cost-effective manner possible.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—DECLARATION ON INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate on May 1 by Senator MacEachen regarding the summit meeting in Quebec City and the declaration on international security.

Canada has, both bilaterally and in international fora (NATO, the Bonn Summit) expressed support for the USA negotiating position in Geneva. In his statement to the House of Commons on January 21, the SSEA welcomed the declared objectives which the USA and the USSR had agreed on for the negotiations: the prevention of an arms race in space and its termination on earth; the limitation and reduction of nuclear arms; the strengthening of strategic stability. These themes have long been central elements of Canadian foreign policy and it is by the rigorous criteria which they imply that we will be judging developments in this area.

The Geneva negotiations, which are currently in recess, have been underway a scant six weeks. A good deal of that time has been taken up with procedural matters. This is altogether understandable given the complexity and interrelationship of the issues. At the same time, both sides have staked out their respective positions and have presented ideas as to how the negotiations should proceed.

While noting that USA positions provide the most promising course for significant progress in Geneva, we have expressed the hope that both sides will move to substantive negotiations at an early date. This process will be enhanced if the confidentiality rule is strictly adhered to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PASSPORTS—ISSUANCE AT HULL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate by Senator Molson regarding External Affairs—the issuance of passports at Hull.

(The answer follows:)

The Passport Office in Ottawa was relocated to Hull on November 19, 1982. To maintain passport service for residents of the Ottawa area, the Passport Office has a public counter in the Lester B. Pearson Building on Sussex Drive in Ottawa where applications may be submitted and passports received. The passports issued for applications presented at the Ottawa public counter and applications submitted by mail from all parts of Canada are produced by the Passport Office in Hull and are so identified. I would also like to mention that more than 75% of over 890,000 passports issued in Canada last year were processed at fifteen regional passport offices in major Canadian cities. There have been no reported instances of difficulties experienced by Canadians whose passports indicated the city in which their passports were prepared.

ECONOMIC EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES AGAINST NICARAGUA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate on May 8 by Senator MacEachen regarding the economic embargo by the United States against Nicaragua—government policy.

Canada considers that the crisis in Central America stems largely from economic and social disparities which are the root causes of instability in the region. Consequently, we believe that the interests of the area are best served by stimulating economic development: trade and aid are essential components in this process and should be encouraged.

Canada has no intention of declaring a commercial embargo against Nicaragua, and we have not been asked to do so. We have received explicit assurances from USA authorities that the USA Executive Order does not apply extraterritorially to subsidiaries of USA firms outside the USA or to third country trade.

Canada enjoys normal diplomatic and commercial relations with Nicaragua and intends to continue these relationships.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILL

BILL TO EXTEND TERM OF CANADIAN PATENT NO. 855,255—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to extend the term of Canadian Patent No. 855,255.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to move the second reading of Bill S-4, to extend the term of Canadian Patent No. 855,255. A brief explanation of the facts surrounding this matter is, I think, in order.

The patent covers an anesthetic gas with the trade mark "Forane," a life-sustaining agent used in hospital surgical procedures in Canada and now world-wide. Forane was discovered in 1965 by medical researchers working on behalf of the petitioners. By 1969 extensive toxicity studies on animals had been completed as a prerequisite to submitting requests for regulatory approval in Canada and the United States to conduct human clinical studies of Forane. In 1970 patents were granted in Canada and in the United States for this invention. These proceedings are fully described in the petition of Canadian Oxygen Limited and BOC, Inc., which support the petition which initially was the forerunner of this bill.

Regulatory review of a new drug's safety and efficiency takes a lengthy period of time. The Food and Drug Administration of the United States of America was on the verge of giving full marketing approval to the product in 1975. Canadian marketing approval was also imminent. However, at that point in time, the American and Canadian authorities received information from a medical doctor living in the State of Michigan suggesting that there might be a possibility of carcinogenicity—a cancerous agent—with this anesthetic gas. I would like to make it clear that the petitioners had nothing to do with the conduct of this study. Acting out of extreme caution, the governments of both our own country and the United States reviewed this preliminary study and suspended the approval process in February, 1976. They then required the petitioners to carry out extensive tests. These very costly studies, together with the review by the two governments concerned, were eventually completed, and I am happy to report that full marketing approval was given in 1981.

I should mention that the Food and Drug Administration in the United States issued a strongly-worded statement in connection with the studies of the Michigan doctor who caused the stall, saying that those studies had been deficient and that they were not reliable. In particular, the American authorities concluded that the Michigan doctor had used test animals which had been contaminated prior to the tests, and as a result the tests and, I might say, the results were highly suspect.

Having invested substantial time and money in the medical research on this matter, the petitioners felt that they had been deprived of a substantial part of the patent protection both in this country and in the United States. Our colleagues in the American Congress have amended the American equivalent of Canada's Patent Act to extend the term of the American patent covering Forane to make up for the United States' delay in the marketing. I have seen the Congressional bill; the extension it covers is for four years and something; it was granted about a year ago, extending the patent for virtually the space of time that it took to conduct these tests and to get the final clearance, in effect, the last time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As if it had been approved?

Senator Nurgitz: Exactly.

Canadian Oxygen Limited is now applying, with BOC, Inc., for a special act to accomplish under Canadian law what has already been accomplished under the laws of the United States of America. The market for this product is basically a continental one, the North American continent. Canada and the United States have traditionally worked very closely together in patents and patent-related matters, especially in these areas.

This bill would extend the term of the Canadian patent for a period of five years, four months and 26 days, a period equal to the marketing delay in Canada.

In a nutshell, therefore, the Canadian patent covers a product which is widely used in hospitals in Canada and the United States. It has been proven very effective and very safe. Through no fault of their own, the petitioners have been deprived of more than five years of the patent protection to which they would normally have been entitled. This has now been restored in the United States, and this bill would provide similar relief in Canada.

Honourable senators, I emphasize that this bill seeks to remedy an extraordinary situation. I am pleased that my colleague, the Honourable Senator Langlois, has agreed to second the motion for second reading of this bill. I initially anticipated that the matter would be dealt with by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, but I am informed by the Clerk Assistant of the Senate that, it being a patent matter, it might well go to my colleague, Senator Murray, and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I know that he is very anxious to receive this bill, because he has some particular questions.

Senator Frith: He is studying it closely right now.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, he is, Senator Frith. That is just to get an embarrassing question for me.

I would invite honourable senators to support second reading of this bill so that it can be referred to committee, where I understand officials of the company would be present to answer any specific questions.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

FAILURES AND SHORTCOMINGS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to certain failures and shortcomings of the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina in February 1985.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton)).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I should like to yield to the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, on Thursday, May 9, Senator Argue unburdened himself of some very interesting and provocative remarks, some of which actually bore on the notice he had given, which was to draw attention to the "failings and shortcomings" of the recent First Ministers' Conference in Regina, and I am impelled to give a brief response.

Senator Argue began his remarks by indicating that he thought the conference took place in what he referred to as an unreal atmosphere, and that the policies and the discussions were not entirely clear. I would think, honourable senators, that the term he used, "unreal," is rather significant, because the reality to which he referred, the past reality, the reality that he has experienced over the last 15 years, was a reality in which these conferences were doomed to failure before they began, and an entire generation of Canadians began to realize that.

The present reality is that the Prime Minister of Canada delivered totally on his promise to restore civility to the negotiation table. As well, the policies under discussion were very, very clear. There were four major ones: attracting job-creating investment, job training and retraining, regional economic development opportunities, and, finally, improved competitiveness and marketing of Canadian goods and services.

Senator Argue did not, with respect, have the grace to even indicate that for the first time in 14 years the national agenda was discussed in a major western city. He made six—there may have been more than six—wistful references to that conference being a love-in. "A love-in" was the phrase he used on six separate occasions.

It was Henry Kissinger who once said that one of the things that gave him the greatest pain was to see something working well and successfully in which he had played no part. What Senator Argue cannot bring himself to believe is the total absence of that confrontational spirit which, for 15 years, hampered any opportunity to arrive at a consensus on any economic agenda. There were 22 First Ministers' conferences presided over by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau of which, I believe, 12 were concerned with matters dealing with the Constitution. Whatever gifts the creator gave to that distinguished, right honourable gentleman, and they were many, persuasiveness, patience and skill in negotiation were the best concealed. Those conferences over the years were better known for the fires they set than for the bridges they built. Then, in full flight, Senator Argue committed himself to a little bit of a licence. My seat mate Senator Baroote said, "Watch your blood pressure." Senator Argue said, "There is nothing wrong with my blood pressure. This is the way I get pumped up." Then he went on to discuss his role as a wheat salesman, for which, I gather, he has never been adequately thanked or congratulated.

• (1500)

Senator Doody: And never will be. That is the tragedy.

Senator Argue: The record still stands.

Senator MacDonald: Then Senator Argue condemned the Prime Minister for hiring a number of assistants to write the Prime Minister's press releases. He said that he always writes his own press releases.

Senator Doody: That explains their quality.

Senator MacDonald: As a matter of fact, in a refreshing moment of self-deprecation, he said that sometimes you could tell from the quality of the press release. I do not know whether what I have here is his last press release, but it is the press release of May 3. While there are four mistakes in spelling in this press release, the fact is that the senator should be congratulated for his prescience or the alacrity with which people acted upon the suggestion contained herein. The press release reads in part: which is misspelled.

Senator Hazen Argue today called on David Peterson to form a colition—

—with the NDP and to seek the reins of power in Ontario. Efforts should be made by David Peterson to form a colition—which is again misspelled.

—between the Liberals and NDP along the following lines:

Senator Argue: I did that one from my tractor early one morning.

Senator MacDonald: The press release goes on from there, but obviously we are all impressed with the alacrity with which those gentlemen acted upon the honourable senator's suggestion. I can only comment that I would have thought that because of the political party to which the honourable senator holds his first allegiance, there would have been some affection left, before he volunteered his old allies to a kamikaze squadron.

Senator Argue: They weren't even around when I was there.

Senator MacDonald: Now, I hit upon a more serious note.

Senator Doody: It could not be more serious than that.

Senator MacDonald: There was in the early part of Senator Argue's comments this reference:

The day the conference commenced it was a bitterly cold day and there were demonstrations in progress outside the centre. Some of the demonstrators had been there for hours. They asked to be allowed to use the washrooms of the Arts Centre, but they were refused permission to do so. I thought that was almost unbelievable.

Honourable senators, I can go further. I say it was unconscionable. Senator Argue was there in the bitter cold. I was not. I take him at his word. I watched the event from the warmth of my home in Ottawa. I had assumed that the citizens of Regina who were jumping from foot to foot were doing so in expectation of the arrival of the Prime Minister. Now I know the difference. I think we are on to something here which I can totally support. I consider access to public washrooms of this country as an inalienable right. I think there is a watershed here. As a matter of fact, I think it is part of the legal rights in the Charter, which says that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof. I thank Senator Argue for drawing this matter to our attention. I consider that, given the impoverishment of the resources with which he worked on his comments of that particular day, Senator Argue's was a virtuoso performance.

Senator Flynn: You covered it all.

Senator Frith: I think you got off that particular metaphor at the right time though, Fin.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL POLICIES

GOVERNMENT STATEMENTS—INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiries:

By the Honourable Senator Sinclair:

19th December—That he will call the attention of the Senate to the growing concern, even in some cases fear, arising from the contradictory government statements on economic and social policy.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Stand.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I thought you wanted to discuss the budget!

Senator Sinclair: Would you like me to do it now? I thought you were not prepared to discuss the budget.

Senator Roblin: It is not I who am not prepared; it is my honourable friend. He has been at it for five months.

Senator Sinclair: I could not figure out what the government was doing, and neither could anybody else.

Inquiry stands.

STEVE FONYO

"JOURNEY FOR LIVES" ACROSS CANADA

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, today is a day of considerable significance for Canadians, and particularly for medical research in Canada. Today young Steve Fonyo poured a bottle of Atlantic Ocean water into the Pacific Ocean at Victoria, British Columbia, thereby completing a strenuous and arduous journey across Canada. On completing that journey, he brought honour to himself and honour to the many, many sufferers of that scourging disease.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to speak in honour of and in tribute to the tremendous accomplishment of this young man; in recognition of his courage, his determination and his perseverance, his strength of character, his tremendous will-power and the inspiration and hope that he gave to all Canadians as he ran across Canada.

He ran across Canada through heat and through cold; through rain and through snow; in humid weather, in hot weather and in freezing weather; and we saw him jogging in pain in the latter part of his journey because he was suffering from shin splints. But, always, we saw a smile and determination on his face.

Steve Fonyo completed a courageous journey, in the attempted accomplishment of which his predecessor, Terry Fox, had given his life.

To us in Canada, and perhaps even to those in the rest of the world, he brought a renewed awareness of this scourge of mankind, cancer. He brought it to us in a different way, not in that frightful, fearsome way that we knew of years ago, but in the rather gratifying way of seeing a recovered victim of that disease, an amputee, trudging and jogging across Canada. He is a living example that cancer can be conquered and that cancer victims can go on to endeavours of considerable endurance.

He did another thing. The millions of us who watched him on television and saw pictures of him in the press must have noticed the enormous number of young people who were present to greet him everywhere he went. That is very significant, because if honourable senators think back to when they were the age of those young people, they will realize how little was the significance of cancer in our lives. Those young people can understand and empathize, and they will work for us to conquer that disease.

Steve has brought most forcefully to our attention the tremendous funding requirements of researchers to find a cure for cancer. Even as we sit here today, honourable senators, there are, all over the world, thousands and thousands of skilled scientific researchers grappling with this problem in an effort to find solutions. Indeed, as I turn to see my honourable confrère seated here, I am reminded that Dr. Phil Gold, from Senator David's city of Montreal, has recently been highly honoured for work he has done in the field of cancer research—work which I believe is singularly important throughout the entire world.

Steve Fonyo, through his act of courage and strength, has raised millions of dollars in donations for this research. Furthermore, he has raised the hopes and ideals of millions of people. He has reinforced what I think are among the most precious qualities of human beings.

I know that I speak for all honourable senators—and I dare say for all Canadians who know of Steve Fonyo—when I say to him, "Hail to you, Steve Fonyo, for the inspiration and hope that you have brought to all of us by your great act of courage." May God grant to him the fulfilment and happiness of a long life, which his "Journey for Lives" has brought to so many others.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that I speak for all of us in this chamber when I say that we appreciate deeply the eloquent remarks addressed to us by Senator Barootes, who has, himself, established a distinguished career in the medical profession. I join with him, as we all do, in the sentiments which he has expressed.

Steve Fonyo completed his cross-country run today in Victoria, British Columbia. The final several miles he ran in great pain. I know that all honourable senators will wish to commend this tenacious, courageous young Canadian for his efforts on behalf of cancer research. He has inspired Canadians of all walks of life, regardless of political or religious affiliation, to contribute in excess of $8 million to the battle, through medical research, against the scourge of cancer.

Cancer can and will be beaten, and young people like Steve Fonyo and Terry Fox before him will deserve a generous share of credit for that ultimate victory, together with those who, in spirit, ran across Canada with them through their donation of funds to the fight against cancer.

British Columbians take particular satisfaction in the fact that Steve comes from that province. But his family came to this country following the Hungarian revolution. They came here seeking opportunity, liberty and the right to contribute in a free society. That family is to be commended for its deep dedication and willingness through young Steve and with the help of other Canadians—their fellow citizens—to achieve this victory over cancer.

All Canadians take pride in young Steve's achievement, because he has done this for all Canadians, wherever they live. Quite properly, this young man, at the conclusion of his epic run, has thanked everyone for their incredible outpouring of generosity over the past few months. All of those contributing Canadians can be proud of this achievement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE ESTIMATES 1985-86

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1986, tabled in the Senate on 29th May, 1985.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BROADCASTING

TASK FORCE—QUALIFICATIONS OF CO-CHAIRMAN

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. My question relates to the task force which has been assigned the job of reviewing the Canadian broadcasting system, and which is co-chaired by Mr. Gerald Lewis Caplan.

• (1410)

Mr. Caplan, when asked recently on CBC Sunday Morning why he was chosen, said that it was because he was not a Liberal.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Davey: And, thankfully, he is not.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Davey: What, in fact, are Mr. Caplan's qualifications to co-chair this important $2 million study?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would point out to my honourable friend that this particular inquiry comes under the jurisdiction of one of my colleagues and that I am not acquainted with the details of the appointment. I shall ask my colleague to provide that information for my honourable friend.

Senator Steuart: You would be stunned.

Senator Davey: I have a supplementary question. A fact sheet published at the time the task force was established stated:

The task force shall make recommendations to the Minister of Communications on an industrial and cultural strategy to govern the future evolution of the Canadian broadcasting system through the remainder of this century.

Senator Steuart: My God!

Senator Davey: That recognizes the importance of broadcasting in Canadian life.

While I realize that television is a medium that can compact the Hundred Years' War into a 30-minute documentary, I am still astonished that the task force has been asked to complete its work within nine months. This may explain why the task force will not—and, I repeat, not—be holding any public hearings.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Davey: Apparently, everyone is going to be consulted except those who count most, Canadian viewers and listeners.

I am wondering whether the government leader would try to persuade the minister to instruct this important task force to hold public hearings, rather than to base its findings exclusively on the views of the broadcasting elite.

Senator Roblin: I have usually found, honourable senators, that work takes the time allotted to it. If a period of nine months is allotted to the task force to do its work, there is a good chance that it will get it done within that period of time. If it were given 18 months, the comment would be the same.

On the question of hearings, I think my honourable friend is aware that this task force is to advise the minister on policy. As a result of that advice and other information and advice that the minister receives, a paper will be published outlining the details and findings of these studies, and on that publication there will be public hearings, as I think there should be. That will provide a full opportunity for those interested in this fascinating topic to have something to say about it.

Senator Steuart: Is that a guarantee? Do you guarantee that?

Senator Davey: One final supplementary question. If plans are not in place now—which seems unlikely—would the government leader urge the minister and/or the task force to find out, professionally, the views of Canadian listeners and viewers, and will the results of any such survey be made public?

Senator Steuart: Not likely.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that the report of the task force will be made public and it will be the subject—I had better watch myself here. I am not sure that the minister intends to publish the report of this task force. I can find out whether it is his intention to do so. But I do know that the operative document—this is a pre-study, as we do in the Senate here—which will cover the policy in this respect will be made fully public and will be the subject of public discussions. That, I think, is the main point that need concern honourable senators.

Senator Davey: I thank the government leader for that information. Will the document be made public on its completion? The question in my mind is whether there will be public input during the course of the hearings. I did not quite understand the response.

Senator Roblin: I think I have given my honourable friend all of the information I have on the subject.

THE SENATE

SECURITY SERVICE—STAFF REDUCTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It arises out of what seems to be a fact, that being that there has been a reduction in the number of personnel in the Security Service of the Senate. Is it government policy to reduce the amount of money available for Senate services, to the point that the size of the Senate Security Service staff is, in fact, being reduced?

I might say that my impression is that the morale of our Security Service staff is at an all-time low and there is a good deal of consternation concerning the fact that a number of cuts will be forthcoming and that the Security Service staff are being asked to undertake extra duties without the required number of personnel to do those extra duties.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend will be aware of the fact that the budget for the Senate was approved by the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. I stand to be corrected on this, but I believe it was also approved by the Senate as a whole when the committee reported to the Senate. That budget was accepted by the government and funds were provided in accordance with that budget. So one has to think that the financial requirements of the Senate have been adequately considered by our own committee and that that consideration has been accepted as the basis for budgeting by the government itself.

As for the details of the question about the Security Service, it is my impression that my honourable friend should refer his question to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, because I do not believe that it comes under my particular jurisdiction, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, to regulate that matter. It is done by the Senate itself. I believe that is the body that could probably enlighten my honourable friend with respect to the point he makes.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, it is correct that the estimates of the Senate for those purposes have been considered; but that does not mean that some senators do not have a concern about the amount of money that has been allocated to the Senate, and the way that it has been brought about.

I have a further question: Is it the policy of the government to reduce the Security Service staff for both the Senate and the House of Commons? For example, at the East Block—which I believe is operated jointly by the Senate and the House of Commons Security Service staffs—of four entrances two have been closed. The main entrance—I will call it that; I refer to the southwest entrance—is used not only by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, who with others has his offices in that building, but also by distinguished guests from foreign countries who go in to see Mr. Clark from time to time. Those visitors are often confronted with freight being brought in through that same entrance. I am wondering whether it is government policy to downgrade the services there because the Right Honourable Joe Clark happens to have his offices in that building.

I repeat that the morale of the Senate Security Service staff is at a low ebb—I believe for good reason—and when we have freight being brought in the same entrance as that used by ambassadors, I do not believe that it speaks well for the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is entitled to make his opinion known to the Senate. But I suggest that if he attends the meeting of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, which meets this afternoon after the Senate rises, it will provide him with a forum where the whole matter could be reviewed and discussed; because, as I said previously, these matters do not come within the policy ambit of the government so much as they come under the jurisdiction of the Senate itself, and the House of Commons where appropriate, with respect to this. It is not a government matter. It is a matter for the institutions of Parliament. We have our own committee in the Senate. It meets this afternoon, and I am sure that my honourable friend will be welcome to express his concerns.

Senator Argue: In reply to the Leader of the Government, I believe it is correct that the government, by the very nature of government, sets the amount of money available for Senate services. It is correct that the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee is meeting this afternoon. I shall be pleased to attend that meeting, and I hope to repeat my points at that time. I also point out to the Leader of the Government something that he knows very well. The Internal Economy Committee usually meets in secret. The public is not allowed to attend, and I think it is very important that these issues be raised on the floor of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I repeat what I have already said to my honourable friend, that the Senate set its own budget last spring and that budget was approved by the government without amendment or change. So it is a matter that lies within our control as senators. Whether or not the Internal Economy Committee meets in closed session or open session is a matter for that committee to decide. I am sure that if my honourable friend wants to raise that question the committee will consider it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to say something for the record. This question is on the agenda of that committee this afternoon. I would like to note for the record that the approval of the Senate budget by the Internal Economy Committee was anomalous, we hope, because of the election and because of the time that elapsed between the necessity for, I assume, presenting the estimates for the Senate to the government and to the Treasury Board and the formulation of the committee after the election. All these factors resulted in the budget the committee considered being a fait accompli, because it had already been approved.

[Senator Argue.]

As I say, this situation was, I hope, an anomaly. Of course, normally what happens is exactly what Senator Roblin has described; that before the estimates are presented, the Internal Economy Committee examines them in detail.

Senator Roblin: Obviously, you did not expect a change of government.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STAFF REDUCTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the subject of CBC staff reductions. Would it be possible for the leader to provide members of the chamber with a list of the cuts in CBC personnel, by broadcast centres across Canada, updated to the most recent figures? There continues to be real concern in Vancouver that much of the creative work of the CBC will be and, in fact, is being moved back to Toronto and Montreal as a result of these budget cutbacks. I know that the Leader of the Government agrees with me when I say that creative genius exists in this nation not solely in Montreal and Toronto, but, as well, in Winnipeg, Halifax, Vancouver and other centres. They are capable of outstanding television and radio productions. One of the reasons that some of us continue to ask questions on the subject of the CBC and broadcasting generally is that during another time when there was a Conservative government in Canada a chairman of the Board of Broadcast Governors was appointed and one of his first statements was: "I bring to my task an open mind. I do not own a television set and I listen to radio very rarely." I fervently hope that the quality of broadcasting appointments by the new government represents considerably more expertise in the profession.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I wish my honourable friend would share with us the name of this celebrated expert on telecommunications. I am not sure who it is that my honourable friend is referring to, but if he said what he is alleged to have said it certainly calls for some raised eyebrows.

With respect to the question asked by my honourable friend, I share his concern. I note, of course, that while the government occasionally nudges the CBC, particularly on this point as to where the cuts are to come, ultimately the CBC is responsible for making those decisions. I shall do my best to get the information he seeks.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I hate to be constantly standing for the record. The Chairman of the BBG was Dr. Andrew Stewart.

Senator Flynn: He was not concerned with the CBC.

Senator Frith: Only as chairman of the regulatory body, and whether or not he ever made such a statement, he turned out to be a very good chairman.

BROADCASTING

THREATENED JAMMING OF U.S. RADIO STATION BY CUBA—POSSIBLE INTERFERENCE WITH RADIO STATION CFRB, TORONTO

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the recent opening in Florida of an American radio station called Radio Marti which beams its broadcasts to Cuba. The Cubans have threatened retaliation by launching a 500,000-watt station from Havana to jam Radio Marti, which is an illegal medium-wave radio station operated by the U.S. government.

If the Cubans carry out their threat to retaliate, it will have a very bad effect on CFRB in Toronto. In view of the government's close relationship with the United States, I wonder if it has, in fact, taken any steps to protect Radio Station CFRB in Toronto, which is, I think, the biggest radio station in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am surprised to hear my honourable friend describe Radio Marti as illegal. Indeed, it may be, but there is no evidence that has come to my notice that it is illegal. However, that is a matter that really does not affect the substance of the question.

The point I would like to make is that at the present time, as far as I am aware, there is no actual interference with the broadcast efforts of the radio station he speaks of, so at the moment it is a hypothetical problem. Even should it occur, I think one has to recognize certain difficulties, because if we decided to operate a certain radio station in Canada that we thought was within our rights to operate, it would be difficult for us to accept that foreigners had the right to come and tell us to stop doing so, even though it might adversely affect some of their interests.

Senator Frith: It is the subject of an agreement.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps what I should say is that I will take the question as notice, because I do not put myself forward as an expert in these matters.

Senator Stollery: I would like to thank the Leader of the Government for his response, but I would remind him that there is a North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement to which Cuba and the United States are parties.

I would also like to remind the Leader of the Government that, with respect to AM broadcasting—as opposed to short-wave broadcasting—it is illegal to broadcast into someone else's territory. That was very clearly defined under the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement. In fact, there was a meeting held to decide the broadcasting circumference of radio stations and that sort of thing. Therefore it is, in fact, an important matter for the government, because if the Cubans decide to retaliate against what is clearly an illegal medium-wave broadcasting station, it will have very adverse effects on Canadian broadcasters. In order to protect the Canadian broadcasting industry, I think the government should show some interest in the matter.

Senator Roblin: I must confess that my honourable friend is not reminding me about these matters; he is telling me, because I was certainly not aware of the detail. However, I have already said that I shall take a look at this matter, and I will certainly do so.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BANGLADESH—AID TO DISASTER VICTIMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question is prompted by the disturbing news of the great tragedy that has befallen the people of Bangladesh. The stories of the tremendous loss of life and the suffering of those involved who were not killed in this terrible tragedy have, I am sure, affected all of us in this house and throughout the country.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise if our government, in consultation and in conjunction with other governments, has in mind or has in action any moves which might ameliorate the situation of these victims? Far too many people in Bangladesh have passed the stage of any help, but there are still many for whom much help is required.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my honourable friend is correct. There is a need for help in Bangladesh. I can say that the government has made a preliminary contribution of a relatively minor nature, to be sure, but they are consulting with Bangladeshi authorities and our other friends in the region to see what further measures might be undertaken.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SALE OF SHARES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what the policy of the government is with respect to the sale of its investment in the Canada Development Corporation.

• (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice.

Senator Austin: I have a supplementary question. As the Leader of the Government in the Senate may know, the minister responsible, the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, made an announcement on behalf of the government this morning with respect to the sale of shares of the Canada Development Corporation. I was hoping that the leader would be up to date and that he would be able to discuss the matter with the Senate and, more particularly, inform the Senate on that subject.

However, while taking notice of the question, would the leader also advise the Senate as to when the government might be proceeding with legislation to allow the Canada Development Corporation to have shareholdings larger than 3 per cent, which is the limitation for shareholdings under the present statute?

Senator Roblin: I am sorry to disappoint my honourable friend in not being as up to date as he would like me to be. As he can appreciate, there were meetings today which precluded my having any contact with my colleague.

I will take both questions as notice and let him know as soon as I can.

PARLIAMENT HILL

SUGGESTED RE-LOCATION OF TOURIST RECEPTION TENT

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A couple of weeks ago I asked the leader about the famous tent on the east side of the Centre Block. When I saw it a couple of days ago, it appeared as if the circus had come to town.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing new about that.

Senator Denis: As far as I am concerned, that shows a lack of good taste.

I should like to ask a supplementary question to that which I asked on May 15. Since the former government did not consider an alternative site for the tent, would the current government give consideration to doing so?

I suggest that that tent be moved to the lawn behind the West Block. There is sufficient room there, and it would be close to the parade ground, the area where the buses park, to the drinking-water fountain, to the washroom facilities, and would give a good view of the Province of Quebec and the Ottawa River.

That tent is supposed to be there for the convenience of tourists, and if it were located behind the West Block it would be in close proximity to all facilities.

The tent was erected last summer on the site it now occupies, and the water fountain did not work then. There was an ice cream and soft drink vendor in the tent, and I might say that his prices were high. There were three or four large showcases containing photographs of the buildings so that tourists did not have to visit the buildings to see them. As a result, they did not have to hire guides. They were supposed to have everything there, but, in fact, there were no facilities.

If the tent were located behind the West Block, it would be less conspicuous, and there could be benches and seats placed in it, which would be of assistance to the tourists.

I should like to know what is going to happen after the summer. Is it going to be removed and is the grass going to be replaced? I do not know how expensive an operation that would be, but I do know that it is a goddam mistake of the former government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to say that my honourable friend's eloquence moves me. When he talks about the esthetic qualities of the tent, I am reminded of an expression in French which covers the point: "A chacun son goût." So, everyone has his own idea of what is satisfactory with respect to the appearance of that installation.

[Senator Austin.]

I owe my honourable friend an apology because I received the information he asked me for but I have not yet reported it to him. He asked why it was there. It is to provide a staging post, you might say, for high school and other students, principally, and also for other tourists who have to wait before going into the buildings.

For that purpose, a permanent platform has been laid. That platform is sheltered by a tent in the summer time. I suspect that in the winter time it will be taken down.

My honourable friend has made such a persuasive case for the proposition that it is in the wrong place that I think the least I can do is bring his comments to the attention of the minister concerned, the Minister of Public Works. I will ask him to react to the comments of my honourable friend.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—PROPOSED PIPELINE TO VANCOUVER ISLAND

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to ask the leader to have his research boffins—while they are working on my first question relating to the Canada Development Corporation—produce an answer expeditiously for Senator Roblin to give in the chamber on the question of a proposed natural gas pipeline from the mainland of British Columbia to Vancouver Island.

That proposed natural gas pipeline was endorsed and supported by the current Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Patricia Carney, during the last election campaign and continues to be the subject of representations by the Province of British Columbia to the federal government for an affirmative answer.

I would appreciate, therefore, the Leader of the Government bringing the Senate up to date as precisely as he can.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall raise the question with my colleague.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. John M. Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill C-52, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-52 seeks to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in two particulars. It is not my intention to discuss the act in general, but to limit my remarks today to the proposed amendments. The bill contains only two clauses, but both are of great importance, as each has a far-reaching effect. One clause extends what is known as the variable entrance requirement, and the other freezes the contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund at the 1985 level to the end of 1986.

As you know, honourable senators, it was back in 1977 that a very important amendment was made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. That amendment took into account that there was a wide variation in the unemployment picture in various regions of our country, and that being so, it was unfair that there should be uniform standards for the period of employment a person must have to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. The standard period was, and indeed is, 14 weeks. However, under the principle adopted in 1977, a person may be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits after having been employed between 10 to 14 weeks, depending upon the amount of unemployment in the region where he or she is employed. If the rate is 6 per cent or under, the qualifying period is 14 weeks; if the rate is over 9 per cent, the qualifying period is reduced to 10 weeks. However, the legislation set a time limit, as it were, on the variable entrance requirement. I believe the original one was for 36 months. However, that has been extended from time to time, and the current legislation sets the limit at a period of 90 months, which began December 4, 1977. This limit expires on June 1 of this year. That is why the amendment contained in clause 1 of the bill is necessary.

● (1440)

If this bill is passed, it will continue the present variable entrance requirement until December 31, 1986. If the amendment does not come into effect by June 2, the standard 14 week period will come back into effect. That, in turn, will mean that many unemployed will suffer severe hardships. Certainly, I know that in my part of the country, Cape Breton Island, the unemployment rate is well over 9 per cent. Therefore, for special and, perhaps, selfish reasons, I hope that the bill will pass as speedily as possible, though, of course, only after due study and consideration.

The second clause of the bill would freeze the contributions of the employee and the employer at the present rate until December 31, 1986. If this is not done by means of this proposed legislation, the rate will increase according to the formula contained in the act.

Honourable senators, it has been stated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration that she intends to appoint a special committee to study the unemployment insurance program. In my view, this is a good idea, as abuses may have crept into its operations. It may well be that the system can be improved in order to benefit all concerned. I recognize, of course, that great care has to be taken when it comes to correcting an abuse to ensure that innocent persons do not suffer hardships.

Honourable senators, unemployment insurance can be called a fundamental part of our whole social security system. I think that it is more important than ever in our present economic state, because we are now in a kind of transitional period and are experiencing a new type of economic development, if that is the right term to use. It is possible that there will have to be not only a broadening of the present unemployment coverage, but also some type of coverage for those who are unable to find employment due to economic change or other conditions, and not through any fault of their own.

I do not know just what the terms of reference will be for the proposed special committee. I hope that they will be very wide and I hope that the legislation which will follow its report will be beneficial to all concerned. Indeed, I feel that an injustice was done to those over 65 years of age when it was decided that they would not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits except for a period of three weeks. I hope that this injustice will be corrected when the report of the special committee is received.

Honourable senators, I realize that my explanation of this bill has been brief. However, I do think that the principle involved is very clear, as is the effect of the two clauses of the bill. As honourable senators are aware, the House of Commons passed this bill yesterday after a very short debate. I would like to see it passed speedily in this chamber, also. However, if it is the wish of the Senate that it should go to committee, I would certainly not object.

Honourable senators, I ask your favourable consideration of this bill.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, while this legislation comes to us after brief consideration in the other place and will receive, I suspect, brief consideration here, we have had adequate warning of its arrival.

Some months ago, in the economic statement of the Minister of Finance, he stated that a special review committee would be appointed to examine all aspects of unemployment insurance. In his budget speech of this week, he came back again to that same point. In the Budget Papers, he states:

As announced in the November 1984 Economic Statement, the government will undertake a thorough review of the UI program. This review will be carried out by a special committee composed of leading Canadians from the private sector. Its mandate will be to re-examine and redefine the role of the UI program within the context of the Canadian social security system. More specifically, the objective of the committee is to review the changes which should be made to the program:

- to improve the operation of labour markets in Canada;
- to support more effectively the nation's economic development;
- to ensure equitable financing of the program; and
- to provide new and better opportunities for Canadians experiencing temporary unemployment.

He goes on to say, interestingly enough:

To the extent any federal savings occur, they will be reallocated to support training and employment programs.

We were warned at that time that there were two changes that would come about in the Unemployment Insurance Act by virtue of the effluxion of time. One of these changes, as Senator Macdonald has said, is that variable entrance requirements of 10 to 14 weeks would become 14 weeks for everyone on June 1 of this year. The second is that premium rates would rise by 11 per cent, adding $1 billion to the cost of unemployment insurance for employees and employers.

The government, I think quite rightly, has stated that it believes that these changes should not take place until after the review has been completed. It is my understanding that we, on this side of the chamber, are in favour of the passage of this legislation; that we hope that it will get three readings today and that it will not have to be referred to committee.

I just want to say, before I sit down, that I personally am delighted that the government is taking a look at the Unemployment Insurance Act. In appointing the special committee, I hope that this time the appointees are totally non-partisan—that the committee is composed of those people most capable of dealing with this particular subject.

Unemployment insurance is an extremely costly program. It is one that is used by a great many Canadians and, unfortunately, it is one that is abused by some Canadians. Those people who examine this program have to be possessed of the intestinal fortitude to say what is wrong with it. There are those in our society who have been looking at it not as an insurance program but as a program into which they have put some money and out of which they are going to get it back with a profit. These people work just for the 10 to 14 weeks of eligibility, only to have themselves laid off, then they collect benefits for 51 or 52 weeks. They make this a practice. It is part of their employment record.

Honourable senators, this is a situation that is costing a great many millions of dollars for other Canadians. What it means is that those who are genuinely out of work—those who need support—do not receive adequate support because the fund is constantly bumping its head against its fiscal limits. I say that this is a review that goes to the very root of economic policy in Canada.

When the Finance Committee did its study on Growth, Employment and Price Stability, we were then dealing with whether the full employment rate in Canada was 3 per cent. After much agonizing, we came to the conclusion that the reasonable full employment rate in Canada was 5 per cent. Why did we do that? We did so because Canada, as an affluent society, has concluded that it can pay for and provide safety nets for its citizens—and so it should. But the abuse of the unemployment insurance program—a safety net that should be provided and used properly—would indicate to me that the full employment rate in Canada is probably something closer to 8 per cent than to 5 per cent.

This is an important issue for Canadians. I trust that the government will not appoint people on the basis of patronage or on the basis that the committee will simply say what the government wants them to say. I trust that the appointments will reflect the kind of people who will really find out the causes of this serious problem and will articulate them for Canadians. A sound report can engender the political support necessary to change the abuses of this system and to make the act into what it was intended to be in the first place—an insurance act.

[Senator Everett.]

• (1450)

Honourable senators, as I stated before, we are in favour of these amendments, and we hope that this bill will pass its three readings today and not be referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I had not planned to take part in this debate, but after hearing Senator Everett, I thought I should say one or two words. I want to commend him as being one of the hardest-working senators in the Senate; he does an extremely good job in any committee or anything he is involved with. His speech was well delivered; he did a tremendous job on what he believes is correct. However, I just want to raise one point when he says he thinks the actual unemployment rate in Canada is about 8 per cent.

Senator Frith: No, full employment.

Senator Muir: I am sorry, full employment. Senator Everett also said that the vast majority, the great number or the overwhelming number of workers work long enough to get enough stamps to receive benefits. Now, that may be correct in some areas.

Senator Everett: Could I interject there?

Senator Muir: Certainly.

Senator Everett: I thought I said—and if I put it the other way, I did not mean to put it that way—that some Canadians were abusing the system, and some of them were using the system of working for the minimum eligibility period of 10 to 14 weeks, then being laid off or leaving their jobs and being able to collect benefits for up to, I believe it is, 51 weeks, and they were doing that systematically. I did not mean by any manner of means that it applied to all Canadians, and if I did say that I was wrong.

Senator Muir: I thank the honourable senator for his explanation. I agree with him that there is a certain number of workers in Canada who will do that, of course. As long as we have human nature, as human beings, we will find that happening. However, there are in many areas in Canada good people, men and women, who would like to find employment. Those people were there under the past government and they are there under the present government, and they are people with respect to whom the present government has not had a long enough time to show their mettle and get these people back to work.

Maybe in western Canada, in Saskatchewan and areas like that, where there is not a great deal of unemployment—

Senator Stewart: We have our fresh air bums there too.

Senator Muir: In any event, in eastern Canada there is a great deal of unemployment, and there are many good people who would like work, who would be happy to have work, to have jobs. We have a minority, a small number, as Senator Everett says, who are only interested in getting enough stamps, getting on the "pogey" as it is termed, and that's it. I do hope that whoever is on this great commission that is to be formed will not get the general idea that everybody is out to rob the system, because I think the vast majority of people in Canada, working people who pay unemployment insurance, are not in this category to which reference has been made. Don't get me wrong, honourable senators. Those who pay unemployment insurance are not the only ones who work. There are many others who work hard also. I hope that when this commission is formed it will be fully representative of all members of society, not only businessmen—

Senator Steuart: And not only Tories.

Senator Muir: Regardless of their political affiliations. I hope they will be not only businessmen, but that there will be a cross-section of people from the different fields of labour in this country and from business. I hope that all will be represented. I also hope that we will not end up with an Unemployment Insurance Act trimmed to the point where it will not be of benefit to anyone, because of the effort to catch those who are attempting to do the wrong thing with it. I trust it will not hit those who might be quite sincere and who might suffer as a result of what is done. In any event, if jobs are provided for those who want jobs, I think the problem Senator Everett spoke about will be minimal. I think he expressed himself very well and I apologize to him if I misunderstood what he said.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to speak on third reading, just to say to Senator Muir that I agree with him. My fervent hope is that this will be a blue-ribbon commission. My intervention, and my obiter dictum, in relation to this bill, was based on the fact that I really believe unemployment insurance is probably one of the greatest of all social programs. However, it is one that should work extremely well, and to the benefit of those who are genuinely unemployed. What I am concerned about is that there have been abuses of the system, and what I am arguing against is the fact that we say, "My goodness, this is a sacred cow. If we touch this, we are interfering with those people who are suffering the pangs of unemployment and all its deprivations." I say let us look at it to make it work better; let us make it work on behalf of those who are genuinely unemployed, not on behalf of those who are abusing the system. Let's not close our eyes to the fact that there are people who are abusing the system. I hope that this commission will be a blue-ribbon commission, that it will investigate the system, find out its abuses and then say what those abuses are in clear language.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak until I heard this discussion. I should like to speak very briefly, because I find that every time there is a discussion about reviewing unemployment insurance it is generally advocated by those who want to reduce the protection afforded to Canadians.

I take issue with my good friend, Senator Muir, on one aspect of his intervention. He tends to define the problem as an east coast problem, or an eastern Canadian problem. If we look at the map of this country, however, and look at the northern tier extending from practically Prince Rupert in British Columbia to the coast of Labrador, we will find that seasonality determines the eligibility or non-eligibility of workers for unemployment insurance. Are we to say to the fishermen of Lac La Ronge, Senator Steuart, or to the resource-poor fishermen of the northern prairie, that somehow in the winter time they should not be entitled to what is, if we are honest enough to admit it, basically a supplementary income?

Perhaps we should change the name of unemployment insurance to something which would reflect the reality, which is that there are in this country hundreds of thousands of people who, if they do not want to become exiles in their own country, have to put up with seasonality and minimum wages and poor living conditions. To those people unemployment insurance is not something they receive until they get a job; it is something that they need until the thaw and the return of spring.

I am concerned about a "blue ribbon committee"; if it is a blue ribbon committee which is there to "be businesslike" in its approach to unemployment insurance, then God help the northern tier of this country and God help the major part of this country from Quebec City east.

Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this bill. I have sat in cabinet and have heard bureaucrats bringing in report after report, with the same clichés and the same misinformed recommendations to ministers. Many of us had to fight within our own caucus and sometimes within the cabinet to prevent those who had never been outside the Golden Triangle from making recommendations which might then be adopted by the government.

It is my hope that if and when this issue comes before the Senate, we will have a real debate, since we are senators who represent regions and not only senators who represent parties.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

TAX INCENTIVE FOR INVESTMENT IN CAPE BRETON

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the subject of the new tax incentive for investment in Cape Breton.

As the Leader of the Government will know, in the Budget Papers, on page 18, there is a description of the new tax incentive for investment in Cape Breton. The word "new" may be a little misleading, because there is at present in place, as the Budget Papers make clear, a 50 per cent tax credit for special regions covering manufacturing and processing. A major feature of this particular measure is to extend the coverage to additional areas.

I would be interested in knowing whether the government has made any analysis of the impact of the investment tax credit introduced in 1980 and whether the proposal that this be applied to other sectors in Cape Breton is based upon some evidence—which I hope is the case—that considerable investment has been attracted over the last five-year period as a result of that 50 per cent investment tax credit introduced in 1980.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is correct in his assumption that the investment tax credit of 50 per cent is being considerably widened. My information is that it takes in a range of services, and items of that kind, that were not previously included. I must say that I do not have in my possession at present a list of the industries that are being added. However, I am sure that information can be made available.

I must also tell my honourable friend that I have no information at hand with respect to what has happened since 1950, when these investment tax credits were first implemented in this area; but I will see what I can find out about it for him.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would find out whether the Department of Finance or the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has made any analysis of the result of this 50 per cent tax credit introduced in 1980 and which is now being extended to cover new areas, with one or two additional features which I will not go into. I would like to know whether the new coverage, or the new features, are based upon past success, and, if so, what has been the extent of that success.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I know exactly what my honourable friend is talking about, because on previous occasions when investment tax credits have been discussed in committees of the Senate, that is the question I always asked: What results have you had from the investment tax credits you have in place now? I never received an answer that specified exactly what the result had been. The reasons given were that it was not within their capacity to give me an answer—which I always found unusual. I am not sure whether the situation has improved since I asked the questions, but I will find out.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps I can give some assistance. It is my understanding that the Ways and Means motion that introduced this credit in 1980 stated that the eligibility could only take place after the investment had been certified by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Senator Roblin: That was in 1980.

Senator MacEachen: Yes; and I wonder whether there is a record of the number of investments that have been certified by the minister of, what is now, Regional Industrial Expansion. That may be a way of knowing, because if, indeed, the 50 per cent tax credit has been effective in manufacturing and processing, then one has some confidence that it might be effective in the additional areas that are being covered. Perhaps the Leader of the Government will try to track that down.

I would now like to ask the Leader of the Government another question on the same subject. It has to do with the coverage. The following sentence appears:

Under the new incentive, sectors such as farming, logging, and other resource-related activities henceforth will be covered by the new 50-per-cent credit, rather than the 20-per-cent credit now applicable.

What I am really asking is whether the "other resource-related activities" includes the fisheries.

Senator Roblin: I believe my honourable friend is quoting the statement accurately, but I do not have it in front of me. I have the budget speech but not that document. These new industries face the prospect of being essentially tax free on a corporate basis for a 10-year period, which should be a pretty substantial inducement, and certainly more attractive than anything that has been available there before.

With respect to the fisheries, I expect an announcement to be made quite soon on certain developments in that industry. I will be pleased to tell my honourable friend as much as I can.

Senator MacEachen: If the Leader of the Government ascertains that the fishery in Cape Breton is eligible for the 50 per cent tax credit, would he also ascertain whether, for example, fishing vessels beyond the $50,000 threshold, will be eligible for a tax credit? Whether, for example, the Cheticamp Fisherman's Co-operative which may be interested in investing in new trawlers, each costing in excess of $50,000, could consider their investments as eligible and whether, indeed, the three-year backward feature of the incentive—because I understand that it will apply ten years into the future and three years into the past—on taxable income would apply to the acquisition of these fishing vessels?

Senator Roblin: I will inquire as to whether such investments are included. I am sure that my honourable friend is aware that a citizens' advisory committee is being established in that area. One of the things that it will be expected to do is to consider opportunities or perhaps policies which have not yet been announced by government and which may be potentially useful in the circumstances. I hope some productive ideas will come from that committee. I shall do my best to get the information he seeks.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN PORCELAIN COMPANY—OFFER TO PURCHASE BY EMPLOYEE CO-OPERATIVE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps in posing my question I could give him some of the background. The Canadian Porcelain Company of Hamilton went into receivership in December 1984. It is my understanding that some 60 workers have formed a co-operative and have obtained a line of credit of $1.1 million from the Credit Union Central of Ontario. They are interested in buying out the company. The Lapp Insulator Company, a New York company, has also put in a bid. I believe the receiver accepted that bid and that the whole question is before the Foreign Investment Review Board.

I would ask the government leader to inquire about the matter, and I urge him to make a recommendation that the workers involved with this co-operative Canadian company be given the opportunity to put this company back on the road to success, because this is by far preferable from a Canadian point of view to having the company bought by an American company. I would urge him to use his good offices and his undoubtedly great influence so that this particular end may be achieved.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am familiar in a general way with the problem raised by my honourable friend. I think the allegation—and it may be a correct one—by the workers co-operative was that their bid had not received proper consideration or comparison with other bids the receiver was considering. As far as I am concerned, that issue is still outstanding. I can tell my honourable friend that I shall certainly do my best to see that that particular problem is resolved so that we have a clear idea as to whether these people have been properly and fairly dealt with.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the answer of the Leader of the Government, and I urge him most sincerely to do everything he can to give the Canadian workers a chance to establish—or re-establish—this particular company. If I may say so, I believe that this kind of co-operative way of worker ownership has a great deal to offer Canada in the future. I hope that this matter will be resolved in favour of the workers.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, the point is well taken.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

CANADIAN HOG EXPORT EMBARGO

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The government has said a great deal about better relations with the United States. We, in western Canada, find ourselves experiencing a particular problem related to the hog producers. I presume the government is aware that, at the moment, four American states adjoining the prairie provinces have completely blocked the importation of hogs from Canada. That is having an adverse effect on that major industry in the three prairie provinces. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could indicate what action the current government is prepared to take, and when this problem can be resolved.

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is a serious problem. The fact is, as my honourable friend has stated, that three, or perhaps more, American states have refused to accept shipments of live hogs from Canada on the grounds that they have been given chemicals harmful to human health.

One American state, the State of Minnesota, declared that that was a completely unsubstantiated allegation. That is the position of the Government of Canada. This chemical has not proved to be harmful to human health.

The government is giving immediate consideration to eliminating the use of this chemical in Canada so that hogs will no longer be barred from the United States on that pretext.

I think we all recognize that it is not a question of health so much as it is a question of economics, and that farmers in the United States feel threatened by imports from Canada because of the value of the Canadian dollar compared to the American dollar.

Senator Guay: And the Garrison.

Senator Roblin: Yes. I have been told that one of the states—and this is hearsay, and I label it as such—which has imposed the embargo does not even import Canadian hogs. So, that embargo is obviously in place for some other purpose.

With respect to the action of the states that have barred Canadian hogs, we maintain that this offends the American Constitution, and we have asked the United States government to look into that, and if that government determines that it offends the Constitution, we have asked them to start legal action.

The best information is that we may succeed in having the American government take that step, but everyone must realize that it will be a long time before the courts decide what is to be done.

I see that Senator Argue is also interested in this discussion. He has been through this mill before.

That is not the worst of it. The worst of it is that the countervail measures that are now being considered against Canadian live hogs and Canadian dressed hogs is 5.3 cents (U.S.). That is based largely on the stabilization plans, both provincial and federal. Up to now, plans of that sort, which really do not affect market prices but, in the main, are intended to smooth out fluctuations—that is our contention—have not been considered as grounds for countervailing. So, it is particularly worrisome that now new grounds for countervailing appear to be gaining some support in the United States.

Canadian authorities in the Department of Agriculture and the Department of External Affairs are making the strongest representations they can. I know that the hog producer associations in Canada are doing the same thing. But I have no information as to what the outcome of that might be.

BANKING

ALLEGED RESTRICTION ON LOANS TO AID-RECEIVING COUNTRIES

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, on May 8 I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he could confirm that the Inspector General of Banks had instructed Canadian banks to lend to borrowers in 32 countries only on the basis of collateral reserves.

The concern I expressed at that time was that such a blanket restriction of credit to borrowers in Third World countries, many of which receive aid from Canada, would be discriminatory against credit-worthy individuals, companies and institutions in those countries, disastrous for the poor people of those countries and, indeed, even harmful to Canadian trade.

The leader objected that I was not working from first-hand evidence since I did not have a list of the countries in hand. I now have that list. I have also determined that 25 of the 32 countries are in receipt of Canadian aid.

In view of my honourable friend's government's earlier announced determination to reduce aid to the needy Third World countries, and at the same time to marry aid to Canadian exports in the remaining aid-receiving countries, will my honourable friend please make representations to his government to modify the Inspector General's instructions to our banks in such a way as: (1) to restrict credit only to customers with bad credit histories in those countries; and (2) to permit the financing of Canadian trade aid contracts representing the sale of Canadian goods and services in those countries so as not to conflict with his government's own announced trade aid policy?

Also, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask his government to act in the future in such a way as to ensure that the unfortunate people of the Third World are not further disadvantaged by even more harsh decisions of the Canadian government?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for raising the matter again. With respect to the list of countries he has referred to, I would be grateful if he would provide me with a copy of that list. It would help me to expedite my inquiries.

INDUSTRY

RAILWAYS—WINNIPEG, MANITOBA—TRANSCONA SHOPS AND EAST YARDS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to his expertise in the railways and backshops.

On Tuesday of this week, my honourable colleague, Senator Molgat, referred to a speech that the Leader of the Government in the Senate made in Manitoba respecting this matter, and at that time Senator Molgat concluded that the Senate leader leaves Manitobans in total confusion.

In reply, the honourable leader said:

Be of good cheer. The outlook for Transcona is good,—I wonder in light of what has recently happened—in other words, the announcements that have been made in regard to Transcona—whether the honourable leader would like to say anything further on that matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I said all that I could say on the matter in response to my honourable friend, Senator Molgat, a few days ago. There is further information to come, but I am not in a position to give it at the moment.

Senator Sinclair: Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate consider the lay-off of 4,000 backshop people by Canadian National good?

Senator Roblin: I am not aware of what my honourable friend is referring to.

Senator Sinclair: The chairman and chief executive officer of Canadian National has announced that he intends to lay off some 4,000 backshop workers. I am sure the honourable leader is aware that Transcona is the backshop referred to. I am just wondering whether there is something he can do about that matter.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Roblin: If there is, I certainly will do it.

Senator MacEachen: Surely you can.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CLOSING OF PATENT OFFICE

Hon. John B. Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the announcement that the Patent Office is to be closed.

As I understand it, the Patent Office is a government operation which actually turns a profit. Yet I read that Arthur Brooks, the president of the Patent and Trade Mark Institute of Canada, complains that if the government contracts out the examination of patent applications to other nations, then industries believe that the examination will not be done in accordance with the specifications required by Canadian law. The implications of this for registering inventions in Canada is obvious.

Arthur Brooks went on to say:

I don't know where the government got the idea to shut down this department. They never sought our views or anybody else we know of involved in patents.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Will he suggest to his colleague the Minister of Finance, or to the appropriate colleague, that this proposal to close down the Patent Office be put on hold until there has been adequate consultation with informed people such as Arthur Brooks of the Patent and Trade Mark Institute of Canada, and any other people who have a direct and relevant concern in this field?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Any provision of the Canadian patent law will be observed, regardless of how the system is operated. The international patent body to which my honourable friend refers is, I believe, just that—an international body which does this sort of work for a number of different countries. I have to tell my honourable friend, though, that I am not aware of the departmental considerations that led to this situation, and I shall be glad to try to find out for him exactly the basis for the statements that have been made.

Senator Stewart: I assume the answer implies that, if the kinds of consultation that would have been desirable have not taken place, there will be an immediate effort to have such consultations so that there will not be a need three or four months down the road to back up on this decision.

Senator Roblin: I will have to consult with my colleague to see exactly what he thinks ought to be done in the matter.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—HON. FLORENCE BIRD

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I should like to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for the two replies given on Tuesday last in answer to my questions. One was a reply concerning the situation of the Honourable Florence Bird, and, in the original reply to me on April 24, the Leader of the Government said, in part:

I would be unhappy if she—referring to the Honourable Florence Bird —were discourteously treated by anyone.

I see that the reply tabled on May 28, however, refers to the Honourable Florence Bird as "Mrs. Bird" throughout. I wonder if the Leader of the Government can tell me whether or not it is true that Mrs. Bird, or the Honourable Florence Bird, is still entitled to be addressed as "Honourable."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend raises a good point. I have never considered whether former senators are entitled to retain the title of "Honourable." If they are, then I think my honourable friend is correct to point out that she should have been referred to in that manner, and I will take the opportunity to report on that situation to those who wrote that reply.

Senator Marsden: Thank you very much.

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I should like to raise with the Leader of the Government a reply tabled concerning a list of appointments. I should like to ask about the gender ratio in terms of the budget document "New Management Initiatives," where we find that the Honourable Erik Nielsen's private sector advisory committee is composed of 12 men and no women at all, and various other of his special teams, which have reported on issues on which there was comment in the budget, such as job creation and training, also had no women, as was also true with agriculture. Where there were women on those teams, they turned out to be, by and large, junior administrative assistants and researchers. We are glad those people are there, nonetheless I wonder if the Leader of the Government could get a reply from the Honourable Erik Nielsen concerning the thinking behind the setting up of such major advisory teams, which benefit not at all from the wisdom that has been accumulated with respect to women and the situation of women in this country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think any committees I was responsible for would be sensitive to the issue my honourable friend raises. The fact is, however, that the government has been more open and, I think, more active in identifying opportunities for women to serve the country than has been the case hitherto. I know that the government will continue to try to do that. If we do not succeed all the time, then we must simply resolve to try to do better next time.

Senator Marsden: It comes as no surprise, I am sure, to my honourable colleague to hear that many members of both houses are very much concerned that there were no specific employment measures for women, and for others, in the budget, since we are experiencing a high rate of unemployment in many situations, and are in more danger of long-term unemployment through technological change and so on.

Would the Leader of the Government be prepared to ask the Honourable Erik Nielsen to re-think the composition of that job-creation and training team that is to report, in light of the outcome of the budget?

Senator Roblin: I think the plans outlined by the Honourable Flora MacDonald in connection with training and job-placement reforms that are now under way in the government have taken far more notice of the interests of women in that field than has ever before been the case. If my honourable friend examines the statements the department has made and the discussions that have been reported on between the department and the provinces with respect to this plan for the training and employment of women, I think my honourable friend will find very marked emphasis being placed on improving the opportunities for them in that sector.

Senator Marsden: With respect, I am afraid that, having examined all of the documents I have available, I cannot agree with the Honourable Leader of the Government. I wonder whether he would reply to my question. Would he be prepared to raise this, not with the minister responsible for the training issue—I am sure that she is sensitive to it—but with the Deputy Prime Minister, who seems not to be?

Senator Roblin: I will do something better than that; I will refer the matter to the minister in charge of the Status of Women.

PRIVATE BILL

BILL TO EXTEND TERM OF CANADIAN PATENT NO. 855,255—
SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act to extend the term of Canadian Patent No. 855,255".—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I was very pleased to agree to second Bill S-4, an Act to extend the term of Canadian Patent No. 855,255.

That patent covers an anaesthetic gas with the trademark "Forane", used for surgical operations in Canada and throughout the world.

Medical researchers, working on behalf of the petitioners, discovered Forane in 1965. By 1969, extensive toxicity studies on animals were completed, as a prerequisite to submitting an application for regulatory approval in Canada and the United States to conduct clinical studies of the effects of Forane on human beings.

In 1970, Canada and the United States granted patents for this invention. These proceedings are fully described in the petition filed by Canadian Oxygen Limited and BOC Inc.

In 1975, regulatory approval by the Food and Drug Administration of the United States for marketing the product was imminent.

Canadian marketing approval was also imminent at the time. Then the American and Canadian authorities received information from a physician living in the State of Michigan suggesting that this anaesthetic gas could cause cancer. I want to make it clear that the petitioners had nothing to do with that study. For reasons of extreme caution, the governments of both this country and the United States reviewed the preliminary study and suspended the approval process until February 1976. The petitioners were then required to carry out extensive tests. These very costly studies, together with the expert examination by both governments concerned were finally completed. Full marketing approval was given in 1981.

Thereafter the Food and Drug Administration in the United States issued a strongly-worded statement in connection with the studies of the Michigan physician, stating that those studies had been deficient and were not reliable. The American authorities concluded, in particular, that the Michigan physician had used test animals that had been contaminated prior to the tests, and that the results were therefore highly suspect. Having invested substantial time and money in the medical research on the gas, the petitioners felt they had been deprived of a substantial part of the benefits of the patent, both in Canada and in the United States. Recently, the Congress of the United States amended their counterpart legislation to our Patent Act to extend its term in order to compensate the company for the delay in marketing the new product. The amended legislation of the US Congress dates back about one year. It extends the term of the patent for a period equivalent to the delay incurred for clinical studies and the issue of the necessary final marketing approval.

The Canadian Oxygen Limited has petitioned therefore for a bill to obtain a similar extension of the term in Canada.

I should like to add that the market for this product is essentially limited to the North American continent and that traditionally the United States and Canada have worked closely together when dealing with patents, especially in that area.

Bill S-4 would extend the term of the Canadian patent by five years, four months and twenty-six days, the equivalent of the marketing delay in Canada. As further information, honourable senators, may I add that the Canadian patent covers a product which is widely used in hospitals both in Canada and the United States, and which has proved quite effective and safe.

Honourable senators, this bill was introduced for the sole purpose of remedying a quite unusual situation, for the petitioners simply seek to enjoy in Canada the right they already have in the United States with regard to this patent. Finally, I support the suggestion Senator Nurgitz has made to refer this bill to our Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, should the Senate be of the opinion that such a study is desirable under these circumstances.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator L.]

[English]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was presented on May 28, 1985.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, a number of you will be familiar with the subject matter of this report. I am pleased that my desk mate, Senator Godfrey, is here, as he was the main proponent of this idea. It is something he has presented to the Senate in the past and on which he has spoken on a number of occasions to the ad hoc meetings of the chairmen of committees, who meet at infrequent intervals in the Speaker's chambers.

While in general there was, I think, agreement with the principle behind the suggestion, there seemed to be disagreement as to how it could be effected and how it would be put into the rules and procedures of the Senate.

I am pleased that Senator Godfrey was able to attend the meetings of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, at which he participated fully in the discussions on this subject.

The committee in general was in favour of the procedure. On looking over the rules and procedures of the Senate, it was felt, however, that it is something that should not be made a formal rule in our rule book. Senator Godfrey agreed that the proposal set out in the report would suit his objective if there were a method of ensuring that the Senate did, in fact, follow the procedure. Hence, the committee makes the recommendation contained in its second report that we endorse as an accepted procedure that the Senate henceforth notify the provincial and territorial governments of the subject matter of bills in which it was felt the provinces and territories would have a special interest.

To make this practice effective, of course, will be the responsibility of individual senators and particularly that of committee chairmen, who would be expected to look at all bills coming before their respective committees to see whether or not there are provincial or territorial considerations and, where applicable, to so notify the affected provincial and territorial governments and arrange for their appearance before the committee.

To ensure that there shall be a regular follow-up on this, I recommend that the Director of Committees for the Senate, who is also the Clerk of the Rules and Orders Committee, be asked to send a copy of this report to all committee clerks and that the clerks be advised that they too will be expected to check all bills referred to their respective committees and bring the matter to the attention of the committee. In that way there would be a guarantee that the procedure will in fact be followed.

The language of the proposed procedure is such that in circumstances when it was simply not possible, for reasons beyond our control, to hear the representations of the provincial and territorial governments, we could not be faulted. However, the fact of having this procedure as an accepted practice will provide the provincial and territorial governments with the assurance that we can do our job better as the house of regional representation.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, this discussion is very important. I have heard no comment about the agreement by witnesses that committee proceedings be broadcast. Certain people will appear before the committee and I am convinced that they would prefer us to proceed as we are now doing, namely without the presence of the media in committee, especially radio. Naturally, there is no question of television broadcasting at this time.

Before asking the media to broadcast committee proceedings, we should ask the people who are to appear whether they would agree to this new procedure.

Senator Molgat will raise many objections, and justifiably so. Another point which should have been raised is that of the approval of those who are to appear before the committee to give evidence.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat, I think, has given me too much credit for the substance of this report, because in fact it is something that was proposed back in 1978 by a committee headed by Senator Stanbury. So, it has taken some time to be put into effect. I do think that the rewording of the motion, as set out in the report, takes care of Senator Doody's concern as to who would make the decision to notify or not to notify. Certainly the wording is improved in that respect from what I personally proposed, because it says quite clearly—

Senator Doody: Incredible, but there it is!

Senator Godfrey:—quite clearly “in the opinion of the committee”; so, it is up to the committee to make that decision.

If we adopt this report, my motion will not need to come before the Senate. The report itself will be the basis upon which the practice will be put into effect. The report itself is helpful inasmuch as it refers to the fact that the practice shall be observed by committees of the Senate “as a general practice.” This again emphasizes the fact that this is not a rule but a recommended procedure.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The report speaks of “writing to the government.” Who would be “the government”? Would the committee write to the provincial premier, the executive council, the provincial minister who might be concerned with a particular piece of legislation, or who? Who is “the government,” as that term is used in the report? To whom do the committee chairmen write?

● (1440)

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I do not believe we reached the point of discussing that specific detail, but it is my assumption that we would write to the premier of the province concerned, or the person responsible in the territory concerned. He would then seek to send it on to whoever else might be involved in the government. By “government” I do not believe it is intended to indicate the legislature. I believe that “government” means the party that is actually governing in that province, and the head of that is, of course, the premier.

Senator Doody: How about Ontario?

Senator Frith: Patience!

Senator Bonnell: Would it not be better to refer this report back to committee and change the words to read “the premier of the province” rather than “the government,” in order to remove the ambiguity?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I make the comment that in the committees I have attended—

Senator Bonnell: I have asked a question of the chairman.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am, of course, subject to the wishes of the Senate in this regard; but it would seem to me that the term “government” is clear and implies that one writes to whoever is in charge of that government. That is the premier, or, in the case of the two territories, the government leader. I believe it is an acceptable term. However, I am subject to the wishes of the Senate.

Senator Frith: I think we can safely say that the Senate demurs.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FINANCE

RESTRUCTURING OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STUDY OF DISCUSSION PAPER BY BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are two motions which I seek leave to introduce. The first is for the referral to committee of a discussion paper that was issued some time ago by the Secretary of State (Finance), the Honourable Barbara McDougall, regarding the regulation of Canadian financial institutions. It has been suggested—I believe properly so—that the document could usefully be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce; and, with leave of the Senate, I so move.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Has it been agreed that we revert?

Senator Doody: I assume that we have reverted. It is very important that we revert from time to time; it helps us retain a sense of humour.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is customary to hold sittings of that committee when the Senate rises. Because the Senate will not be sitting next week, I have decided to call the committee for 2 p.m. on Wednesday next.

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, was it not our intention to put the motion that the Senate would not sit because it would not be receiving any business from the other place?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, perhaps we should back up a little and take these matters one step at a time. The initial motion that I was given leave to present was as follows:

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e),

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to study and report upon the document entitled: "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion", tabled in the Senate on 23rd April, 1985,

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the motion raises for the first time a matter that has been discussed in the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, namely, that before the Senate is asked to agree to a reference that will involve the expenditure of budget under the heading of "Committee Expenses," that the Senate be given some idea of the price tag. Last session we tried to establish a system that would have provided that the motion be not voted on in the Senate until a budget had been presented and approved by the committee. That was found objectionable—I believe for good reason—the reason being that it put the committee in a censorship position. It meant that it could defeat the motion of the Senate by simply refusing to approve the budget. The compromise that we have reached, and will try to work this session, would only require some estimate as to cost before the vote is taken. In this case it may well be that Senator Murray is able to give us an estimate, because I believe he has given some thought to it. If not, then we should adjourn the vote on the motion until we can get some idea of the price tag and a response from the Internal Economy Committee chairman as to how it stands from a budgetary point of view.

[Senator Doody.]

• (1450)

[Translation]

This principle should also be applied to the motion moved by Senator David. It was stood today but it will probably be on the Orders of the Day next week. In that case, Senator David, or the co-chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs, will have to give an estimate of the cost of the study by the committee.

In any case, it is certainly an opportunity to inform the Senate unofficially that we want to try to apply that principle as far as such a rule is concerned.

[English]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the motion to refer the discussion paper on financial institutions to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I regret that I am not in a position at the moment to submit a budget to the chamber or to the Internal Economy Committee. I would have to consult further and give more thought to the matter.

Under the circumstances, I suggest that there are two options: one is to delay the vote on the motion; the other is to strike from the motion those references to the engagement of staff and so on, leaving it with simply the reference, it being understood that with regard to any budget that we thought was necessary I would appear before the Internal Economy Committee to get it approved.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree that those options are available. I recommend that we follow the first option—that is, adjourn the matter—because it would set a better precedent, this being a pilot for the new performance.

There are two problems with the alternative. One is that a question may arise as to whether there is some inherent ability to retain professional services. The other is that it would move this new procedure much closer to the old procedure if we make it conditional on the budget being presented to the Internal Economy Committee. As I have said, this is a procedure that will evolve. We are not insisting on a detailed budget but, rather, that the chairman give us some idea of what I have called a price tag. What we want to do is give honourable senators an opportunity before they vote on the matter and before the Internal Economy Committee sees it, to get an idea of the costs involved. So if Senator Murray and other honourable senators agree, I think it would be better to launch the experiment with the first option rather than the second option—that is, adjourn the motion.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the entire question of financial intermediaries is an extremely complicated one. It is one on which there has not been a great deal of research done, except in recent times by the academics, and there are very significant amounts of material difficulties with regard to administration, and there are some legal questions as well. However, based on my experience in making estimates, I suggest to the Senate and to the chairman of the committee that we put a round figure of $100,000 on the costs with the understanding that when we run out we will come back for a supplementary amount. Just as we learned this morning with regard to medical research, it would be up to us to prove that we needed the money. If that approach will accommodate everybody, I suggest to the chairman that $100,000 is a round figure.

Senator Nurgitz: It certainly is.

Senator Sinclair: In that way we could vote on the motion immediately.

Senator Doody: We certainly appreciate Senator Sinclair's interjection and I know that that nice round figure may seem like petty cash in some areas of the world, but certainly not in any of the areas that I have been travelling in very extensively. So, with honourable senators' permission, I think we should leave the matter and vote on it at another time. We have to establish guidelines for these budgets, and I think that this might be a good place to start. Could we adjourn this debate in my name?

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Assuming that we have still reverted to Notices of Motions, I am going to move, with leave of the Senate, that we adjourn until Tuesday, June 11, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

I should emphasize that I hope that this motion will not affect the committee schedule. A number of committees are scheduled to meet next week. On Tuesday the Special Committee on Youth will be travelling. The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs will meet on Tuesday morning. Also meeting during that day will be the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs; the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders; and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet that evening.

On Wednesday there will be meetings of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration; the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth; and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On Thursday there will be a meeting of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence; the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth; and the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

On Monday of the following week, June 10, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is tentatively scheduled to meet to consider again supplementary estimates (A). Those supplementary estimates were considered this morning and it was agreed to postpone further discussion until Monday, June 10, in order to satisfy the wishes of some members of the committee.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 11th June, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before we do that—

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I rescind and revert!

Senator Frith: I do not think that is necessary, but I wonder whether it has appeared on the record that one of the reasons we are not meeting next week is the absence of any government business. Has that explanation been given?

Senator Doody: I do not know whether or not it is on the record.

Senator Frith: It is now.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 11, 1985 at 2 p.m.

THURSDAY, May 30, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee to which the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31 March 1986 were referred, examined the said Estimates and presents, in obedience to the Order of Reference of February 26, 1985, its interim report as follows:

In its review of the Estimates, 1985-86, the National Finance Committee, as with past practice, chose to focus upon one aspect of these Estimates, specifically transfer payments to other levels of government: the payment to the provinces for post-secondary education under Part VI of the Federal Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, 1977. The government reports that for 1985-86 these expenditures should amount to $2.28 billion.

In undertaking this review, the Committee heard from five groups of witnesses:

1. March 28, 1985 Department of Finance:

Mr. J. H. Lynn,
General Director,
Federal-Provincial Relations
and Social Policy Branch;

Mr. D. H. Clark,
Assistant Director,
Federal-Provincial Relations
Division;

Mr. Frank Gregg,
Chief, Income Tax
Harmonization,
Federal-Provincial Relations
Division.

2. April 18, 1985 Mr. A. W. Johnson
Special Advisor to the Secretary of State on the Financing of Post-Secondary Education

3. April 25, 1985 The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC)

Dr. W. A. MacKay, President
Dr. David Johnston,
Vice-President
Dr. Allan K. Gillmore,
Executive Director

4. May 2, 1985 The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT)

Prof. S. Shorten, President
Prof. E. O. Anderson,
Vice-President
Dr. Don Savage, Executive Director

5. May 8, 1985 The Hon. Robert de Cotret, P.C.,
M.P.
President of the Treasury Board

Introduction

The focus of the Committee's attention, in examining the Estimates, 1985-86, was to centre upon the responsibilities of the government of Canada in meeting this financial commitment to the support of post-secondary education.

In hearing from the witnesses, the Committee discovered that four themes or issues kept constantly reappearing. These were:

- 1) the nature and level of federal funding
- 2) national objectives
- 3) the quality, quantity and direction of research
- 4) the staffing of universities.

In the course of the hearings, it became abundantly clear that instead of seeing a resolution of the issues, only questions appeared. Accordingly, this report describes the issues the Committee felt were raised and includes examples of the questions that remain to be resolved.

1. The Nature and Level of Federal Funding

In 1951, following a recommendation of the Massey Commission, the federal government began its systematic support for the universities in Canada by providing direct grants to the institutions on a per capita basis. Because this direct support was objected to by Quebec, the federal government in 1960 agreed to concede some tax room to Quebec with the proviso that Quebec make additional contributions to its universities at the prevailing federal rate. In 1967, these direct grants were stopped and replaced by indirect transfers under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1967. Through this legislation, the government of Canada agreed to meet indirectly 50% of the eligible operating costs of post-secondary institutions or $15 per capita escalated at the rate of growth of the eligible operating costs; Newfoundland, PEI, and New Brunswick accepted this option.

In 1977, with the passage of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Progress Financing Act, 1977 (EPF), the fundamental nature of these arrangements was changed from the "shared cost" principle to one of unconditional block-funding. The essential nature of these arrangements, as they exist today, is to provide half the transfer through a concession of 13.5 personal income tax points and 1.0 corporate income tax point and the remainder in the form of cash.

These EPF arrangements have come under pressure almost from their inception. Critics argue that provinces have used EPF funds to meet their own priorities and have not increased annual university grants in line with the growth in federal EPF cash and tax point transfers. Mr. A.W. Johnson, special advisor to the Secretary of State pointed out that federal EPF post-secondary transfers as a percentage of provincial operating grants have grown from 68.9% in 1977-78 to 79.6% in 1984-85; this represents a reduction in the purely provincial share of 10.7%. In particular, he indicated that in Newfoundland, Manitoba and British Columbia, the purely provincial share has fallen over the eight year period by over 20% in spite of federal increases.

Mr. Johnson indicated to the Committee that this represents a fundamental problem with EPF.

"There is no assurance to the Parliament of Canada or to the people of Canada that the moneys which have been appropriated by this Parliament and transferred to the provinces presumably for post-secondary education are actually going to post-secondary education in an unattenuated way." (Issue No. 13, p. 9)

Mr. Johnson then called for a change in the funding arrangements from its unconditional nature to one which ties federal increases to the provinces for post-secondary education to provincial increases to their institutions.

Dr. Gillmore, Executive Director of the AUCC and Dr. Savage, Executive Director of the CAUT, supported Mr. Johnson's recommendation but added that at this juncture, certainty and stability in the grants universities receive over the medium to long term is most important.

The Committee, like the witnesses, felt strongly that there is a need for stability and certainty in university funding. But the Committee also felt that many questions should be addressed before a funding formula can be developed which satisfied the two levels of government and the university community. Some of these questions are:

- 1) In 1967, the government of Canada moved from direct support of post-secondary institutions, which it had started in 1951, to indirect support tied to operating costs. In 1977, these arrangements were changed to a program of unconditional support. If new arrangements are being considered, what should be their underlying philosophy? Should the funding continue to be unconditional? Should it be tied? Should it be replaced by a voucher system?
- 2) If accountability is introduced into new arrangements, how should the institutions be answerable to the legislatures of Canada? At what level of detail should the accountability take place?
- 3) If the growth in federal fiscal transfers become tied to increases in provincial grants to their institutions, is there not a possibility that students in one province may be treated unequally by the government of Canada relative to those in another province? That is, if one province chooses to reduce the growth in its university grants below those in other provinces, the government of Canada, by the very nature of such a law, will be forced to follow suit.
- 4) Can federal transfers for post-secondary education be considered a commitment of the government of Canada to promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians? If so, can such transfers be considered part of the equalization provisions of the Constitution Act 1982, Section 36?

2. National Objectives

In 1983, in a document entitled Support to Education by the Government of Canada, the Secretary of State, to help plan and review the effectiveness of its support, listed 10 federal objectives for post-secondary education. On June 5, 1984, when the Honourable Terrence Donahoe, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada (CMEC) appeared before this Committee regarding Bill C-12, "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act," he indicated that he believed the federal government had four primary objectives for post-secondary education: mobility, access, accountability and language. While, he believed, the provinces were already meeting these objectives, he contended that the national purposes to be served by post-secondary education could be understood only in terms of the sum of provincial purposes.

During the current hearings one Committee member viewed education as clearly a provincial responsibility and stated that any national objectives for post-secondary education must emanate from the provinces. Alternatively, there was the view that national purposes are greater than the sum of the individual parts; that national objectives could only be met by consultation, involvement and agreement by the two levels of government and the university community. The witnesses were unanimous in their view that the setting of national objectives could not be the total responsibility of one level of government.

While the establishment of national objectives for post-secondary education is a difficult task for two levels of government to achieve, successfully meeting such objectives represents an even greater challenge. Both the federal and provincial governments face financial constraint for some time and, devoting increased resources to meeting national post-secondary education objectives may be difficult to justify. This is especially true since such objectives are usually long term in nature and show little immediate and tangible results. Furthermore as Dr. Johnston, Vice-President of the AUCC indicated,

"...this country is simply too small in population to have 10 individual systems of higher education and research to establish a highly civilized quality of life emerging from our systems..." (Issue No. 14, p. 22)

Mr. Johnson raised an additional problem when he pointed out that these national objectives do not necessarily go hand in hand. He indicated that:

"...whereas in 1967 the preoccupation was with accommodating the large number of students in universities and colleges, with accessibility being the critical problem, over the years we have not shifted our priorities as a country; we have continued to preoccupy ourselves with accessibility despite our conviction as a country that research and excellence are critical to our position in the world and to our position as a society." (Issue No. 13, p. 9)

Such difficulties as these point to the fact that solutions to issues are not readily available, but questions are:

- 1) Because of the constitution, Canada has evolved ten systems of high quality post-secondary education. With current financial constraints facing both levels of government for the foreseeable future, can ten duplicate systems be maintained? Will the federal government have to select the institutions it supports for research?
- 2) Are such objectives as excellence and equality of access substitutes for each other? Because of financial constraints, will Canadian institutions and the two levels of government have to address the possibility that not all objectives are achievable and that sacrifices in some areas will have to be made?
- 3) Are the objectives of post-secondary education, as perceived by the universities, long-term only or does the university community have to consider meeting some of the short and medium term objectives of government and the private sector if they wish to receive additional public and private research support?

3. The Quality, Quantity and Direction of Research

Mr. Johnson, in his report to the Secretary of State, Giving Greater Point and Purpose to the Federal Financing of Post-Secondary Education and Research in Canada (hereafter referred to as the Johnson Report) called into question the priority which governments accord to research. He indicated that because research is a contributor to economic growth, not just a sharer, research expenditures should grow more rapidly than GNP. Dr. MacKay, President of the AUCC indicated to the Committee "...that research in the universities of this country is more important than in many other countries, in part, because research activities conducted in the private sector in this country are so thin..." (Issue No. 14, p. 6)

Mr. Johnson speculated that lack of commitment to the increased funding of research may be a reflection of the fact that the university system "...is not really geared to support or to develop the kind of transcending excellence...which sets Canada apart and which gives it a lead..." (Johnson Report, p. 20)

To overcome this, Dr. Johnston was supportive of Mr. Johnson's proposal to the Secretary of State for the establishment of world class centres to foster such excellence. However, witnesses were far less certain about the form such centres should take and the methods of funding them. Mr. Johnson speculated that small, unique world-class centres were preferable whereas Dr. Johnston suggested they be part of the already well known large universities. Some Committee members speculated that if such centres were established, keeping them small, and separate from teaching institutions, could make it constitutionally simpler for the federal government to fund them directly.

While it was clear from the hearings that the post-secondary community, in the first instance, was hoping to see an increase in the level of research funding along with stability and certainty in the new financial arrangements, they evidenced an awareness that making such a commitment with scarce financial revenues is not without costs. While the Committee accepted the argument of the need for high quality research in Canada, nevertheless, it felt a number of questions should first be resolved:

- 1) Should university research be increased to fill the apparent paucity of research in the private sector as indicated by Dr. MacKay? Should research funding from the federal government be increased across the board or should such funding be directed to meet stated national priorities?
- 2) Is it feasible to foster world class excellence in research in the ten jurisdictions of Canada with eleven parliaments? If world class centres of excellence are a priority for the government of Canada, who determines the kind of research to be done? What should these centres look like; should they be small research institutes or should they be attached to large universities?

4. The Staffing of Universities

The normal structural pattern for university faculty is one which finds the highest proportion of academics made up of lecturers and assistant professors, with a smaller number of associate professors, and an even smaller number of full professors. As a consequence of the post-war baby boom and the growth of universities in the late 1960s and early 1970s, this pyramid structure has gradually changed where today a large portion of university faculty is now in its fifties and sixties. Because of the higher salary costs of senior faculty, the Committee was told by Professor Shorten, President of the CAUT, that some institutions have imposed hiring freezes with the logical outcome being the contraction of departments, disproportionately small numbers of assistant professors, but continued increased enrolment.

It was clear to the Committee that if this pattern continued for the next 5-10 years, when many of the senior staff will be retiring, the universities could find themselves facing a severe shortage of qualified Canadian faculty such as occurred in the 1960s. While the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has begun to address this problem by paying special attention to the awarding of research grants to young, aspiring potential faculty, this activity is small relative to the size of the problem. The Committee was again impressed by the shortage of solutions but the abundance of questions:

If there is a structural problem in the universities with a disproportionately high number of senior staff and a virtual freeze in the hiring of junior faculty, what kind of planning is needed to avert a manpower shortage when the senior faculty retire? Are there ways of encouraging postgraduate study in Canada with university teaching as the potential career? Are there ways of encouraging early retirement of senior faculty leaving room at the bottom for junior faculty?

CONCLUSIONS

The intention of the National Finance Committee in looking at the federal fiscal transfers for post-secondary education was to examine the responsibilities of the government of Canada in meeting this financial commitment. The witnesses the Committee heard generally agreed that the federal government has a responsibility in the post-secondary field beyond providing unconditional fiscal transfers; that the establishment of national objectives for post-secondary education is clearly of interest to the federal government if for no other reason than its responsibility to be accountable to Parliament for the amount expended in the area; that the conundrum of excellence versus equality of access brought on, in part, by financial constraint, is worthy of a national debate; that the importance, quality and type of research engaged in is the responsibility of both levels of government; and that the training of sufficient highly qualified manpower to meet the future faculty needs of Canada's universities is a concern to both levels of government. Arriving at the conclusion that there is a combined role for both levels of government in maintaining a high quality university system in Canada is not difficult, but determining what this university system should look like, what it should accomplish, and how federal financial resources should be spent to support such a system is not simple.

The Committee heard from five groups of witnesses over the course of its investigation, but quickly realized that the subject requires a much more thorough review. The Committee would have to hear from such witnesses as the Secretary of State and representatives of provincial governments; it would have to hear from a wider range of universities; it would have to hear from the private sector and from students. In short, the Committee realized that to meet its requirement to report the Estimates, it must keep its hearings limited and report on the conclusions it had already drawn. The Committee is now determining whether it should undertake a larger review of this subject.

WORLD WAR II

D-DAY—FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF INVASION OF EUROPE BY ALLIED FORCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise, although somewhat belatedly, to reflect on the fact that last week, on June 6, we reached the forty-first anniversary of D-Day. I do so because it is our duty to place on the record of this chamber our deep regard for those who fell on the beaches of Normandy on that historic day.

Last year, on the fortieth anniversary of D-Day, my colleague, Senator McElman, and I had the privilege to represent this chamber, in participation with the leaders of the super-power countries, in a ceremony on the beaches of Normandy that was seen by the world. On that day we paid homage to those of our Allied Forces who landed and began an exercise of war that ended in a victory for peace.

We also had an experience that was more real when we, along with other Canadian veterans, were able to mingle with the citizens of the France we helped to liberate. We were able to share in the emotional re-creation of a bond between nations—a bond which unbelievably continues even after four decades.

As tensions between east and west persist, and as we learn of and wonder about the new strategies of space warfare and unimaginable methods of destruction, we should pause each year to remember the end result—that too many of our youth lie in graves throughout Europe because of a battle fought 41 years ago. To them, as well as to those who came home, we pay our respects today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—DETERIORATING SITUATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting whether or not the government is putting into place any contingency plans to deal with the rapidly deteriorating situation in southern Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba because of the drought in some places, grasshoppers in other places, and the severe wind storm which occurred over the weekend in many parts of those three provinces.

The grasshopper problem has been known to the federal government for some time. To date I do not believe the federal government has announced any contingency plans to work with, or indeed to supplement, the assistance programs that have been announced by one or more of those three provinces to deal with this situation.

The situation has deteriorated very rapidly over the past few days because of adverse weather conditions. Does the leader know of any plans now, or if he does not, would he take the question as notice and refer it to the officials in the Department of Agriculture and others who may be involved in dealing with what could become a very serious matter within the next two or three weeks unless seasonal rains return to that area?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend has raised important points with respect to the spring outlook for western agriculture. It is perfectly true that this year grasshoppers appear to be a more serious threat than they have been for some time. It is also true that the provincial governments have been very active in distributing grasshopper poison in an effort to bring that plague under some control. Judging from past experience, however, I doubt they will achieve perfect success with that campaign, though it is well worth pursuing.

With respect to the recent wind storm that has necessitated the re-seeding of substantial acreage in western Canada, the crop insurance authorities in the three provinces have been active in investigating losses in order to provide compensation where that is called for under the Crop Insurance Plan. As crop insurance is a joint federal-provincial responsibility insofar as finance is concerned, I expect that the federal government will be called upon to pay its share of the expense involved.

With regard to the grasshoppers and the re-seeding that is necessary because of high winds over the weekend, it is quite possible that measures in place now will be adequate. The drought is another matter altogether. I think we will have to wait a while to see whether spring rains come in time to save the crop. If they do not, then crop insurance coverage is also available to cover that loss.

● (1420)

I am not aware that the Minister of Agriculture has taken other initiatives in this matter, but I will make it my business to find out.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. With respect to drought, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and he, in turn, could draw it to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, that crop insurance does not cover, nor was it ever intended to cover, such things as the problems that livestock producers face as a result of drought. We all know there was a severe drought in much of that area last year, and usually the second year is far worse because all the reserves of fodder and carry-over capacity of some of the grazing areas are gone after the first year. Therefore, potentially the problem is worse this year than it was last year. Has the movement of livestock to other areas been taken into account, or did problems arise because of dispersing breeding herds and such other remedial action that might have been part of the plans that the federal government might have developed?

In putting the question, I realize—and I appreciate what the provincial governments are trying to do—that we have a problem that transcends more than one provincial boundary. Nevertheless, following from the traditions of the past and, indeed, flowing from some of the rules, that is the point at which the federal government does take an active interest in setting up plans to deal with them.

Senator Roblin: My friend is correct in suggesting that the crop insurance program affects crops of various kinds but does not cover animal husbandry, so that becomes quite a distinct problem. I know that in situations of this sort where it becomes difficult to feed livestock, provinces usually take the first step in providing fodder in one way or another, either by delivering it by subsidized transport or by securing supplies from other areas or, indeed, by removing cattle to community pastures of various kinds in order that they may be kept alive. As a rule, the procedure is that a province takes such steps as it feels it can take having regard to its resources, and if it finds that those are not adequate or that federal assistance is required, a request is often made for help of that kind. I am not aware that any request for help has been made. I am sure if such a request were made, it would receive sympathetic consideration.

Senator Olson: I have another supplementary question which has to do with some amendments to the crop insurance regulations so that farmers in a number of areas would be eligible for crop insurance as a result of the very severe wind storm or hurricane that swept across southern Canada this past weekend. As I understand it, there were certain dates involved by which crops had to be seeded. But in this case they had to be re-seeded because the first planting was blown away by these winds. I want to know whether or not the federal government is taking some action to amend those regulations so that farmers can qualify for crop insurance notwithstanding the disastrous events of last weekend on a particular date that was very closely tied in with the dates when certain crops had to be seeded to be eligible for crop insurance.

Senator Roblin: It is true that the crop insurance plan envisages a crop being planted and, therefore, starting to grow by a certain date to ensure the best possible results. There are cutoff dates that are set as to when such crops should be planted in order to have a half decent chance of reaching maturity and a successful harvest. The applicable date for some of the crops under stress right now is very close, and it is true that farmers are straining every nerve in order to get their crops re-seeded before the deadline.

As far as I am aware at the present time it looks as though they will succeed and there does not appear to be a necessity for extending the deadline. I am not sure that providing such an extension would be the correct course to follow in any case because after the deadline for seeding the chances of harvesting mature crops would be greatly diminished. So if people are caught in that squeeze we will have to look at other measures to see what can be done.

Senator Olson: The problem I am raising is that the farmers did meet the deadline in having their crops seeded the first time, but through no fault of their own those seeds were blown away over the weekend. Surely, some consideration should be given to providing for an extension of a day or two, or perhaps even a few days even though it involves a risk of having problems with frost in the fall. Surely, inasmuch as it was no fault of theirs that this storm swept across the region this past weekend, some consideration should be given to that factor.

Senator Roblin: I am inclined to agree with my honourable friend, and I will ask the Minister of Agriculture what his intentions are.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I have always felt that the crop insurance programs affecting the three prairie provinces should be as near to being uniform as possible. Perhaps I might add this to what has already been said. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe that the deadline for the seeding of crops under the Saskatchewan program is June 21. Perhaps Manitoba and Alberta might now take a look at the Saskatchewan program, because I do not think there is really any great difference in the crop seasons as between the two provinces. Since Saskatchewan has already established that date it could serve as a guide for the people in the other provinces.

When the Leader of the Government looks into this, I wonder if he could ascertain whether or not the provincial governments have made any request of the Minister of Agriculture, or of other appropriate authorities, that action be taken for the protection of livestock in view of the drought or the potential for drought that exists. As the Leader of the Government will recall, a year ago a beef herd maintenance program was put into effect by the previous government, and continued by the current government. I believe it paid $48 per head, and that was very helpful.

I also wonder if this government has any contingency plans, or if it is looking at anything along those lines, to be introduced again this year. If there are no such plans, is it because so far no such request has been made to the government?

Senator Roblin: I think I will include my honourable friend's points in my communication with the Minister of Agriculture, because he is the only person who can tell us about the government's intentions at the present time.

Senator Argue: With respect to the grasshopper problem and what is being done to combat it, I might say that, in commenting on the minister's statement as to the assistance being given by provincial governments, the Government of Saskatchewan, for example, provided 50 per cent payment of the cost of one insecticide, di-methoate, and that was welcome. The trouble is that di-methoate stocks did not last very long; there are no more stocks and there is no more help. Therefore, the farmer's cost per acre has gone from X dollars to 3X dollars, because some of the alternative pesticides are much more expensive, and no subsidy is provided.

My question is whether the Leader of the Government will ask the Minister of Agriculture and the government to look into the question of assisting farmers. Will the federal government itself be prepared to assist with the cost of sprays, and, since this is a dual responsibility, will they discuss this with the provincial Ministers of Agriculture? It is a very severe burden on farmers to deal with a grasshopper plague. Sometimes, as the Leader of the Government will know, farmers have to spray a given field up to four times because these insects keep on hatching, and the total kill at a given date does not mean the problem is eradicated for the year; it is eradicated for that date, and a few days later or a week later the farmer may face the same problem. I think it is important for the government to look at the question of assisting farmers in their battle against the grasshoppers, because, if the farmers can win the battle, that small investment by the Government of Canada will pay off manifold.

Senator Roblin: I see that my honourable friend and I have been through the same grasshopper wars. I understand the situation the way he does. I will keep his point in mind.

Senator Argue: Take it to the minister in charge.

FINANCE

PROTECTION OF BONDHOLDERS AGAINST INFLATION— REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday the Minister of Finance, in an address to the investment dealers of Quebec City, raised the prospect that a measure would be introduced to protect bondholders against inflation. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would explain to us the reasoning of the government in holding out that prospect of inflation protection to bondholders while at the same time it is removing inflation protection from the pensions of senior citizens of Canada?

● (1430)

Senator Balfour: It was John Turner's idea.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think that the Minister of Finance expressed himself in quite the way my honourable friend suggests.

Senator Olson: That is the result.

Senator Roblin: I am making no comment about what the minister said. I have not read a transcript of his remarks. I was not there and I have had no contact with him. However, I do know that in some jurisdictions they index bonds against inflation, not to protect the bondholder but to protect the public purse. In this way they can get a lower interest rate than might otherwise be the case. It depends a great deal on one's assumptions as to where interest rates will go. If one thinks that interest rates will remain steady or perhaps decline, then this method of setting an interest rate for bonds is favourable to the treasury. However, I do not have a copy of the minister's statement in front of me, so I shall make no further comment about it.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have a copy of the minister's statement and I assure the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the Minister of Finance raised the question of a type of bond issue for those specialized buyers who seek inflation protection. It is a protection for the buyers of bonds, not for the public treasury. Quite apart from the appropriateness in some circumstances of moving along those lines, does not the Leader of the Government think it rather insensitive of the Minister of Finance to inflict, in addition to financial damage, a form of psychological damage on senior citizens by suggesting that the assets of bondholders may become more sacred in the future than the pension cheques they receive? Does he not think that this is a rather insensitive attitude on the part of the Minister of Finance toward the senior citizens who are, from one end of the country to the other, angry about the very serious erosion of their purchasing power next year and in subsequent years by the removal of full indexing?

Senator Roblin: I shall not make any comment upon the sensitivity or insensitivity of my colleague, because that is a matter which will have to be decided by anyone who wants to consider it. However, I would like to make this point: what he was trying to say—let me stop. I do not know what he was trying to say because I was not there and I have not seen his statement. However, I can tell you this, that the principle behind indexing bonds is to secure a lower rate of interest for the public treasury. It is based on a natural rate of interest, for example, 3 per cent, plus the rate of inflation at particular periods of time. The aim is to get lower prices and thereby reduce costs to the treasury. The juxtaposition of the bondholder as compared to the old age pensioner is not one that gives me a great deal of comfort, but I have to tell my honourable friend that that is my explanation of what indexing interest rates means with respect to bonds.

Senator Olson: Is that the government's position or just yours?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government makes much more sense than the Minister of Finance, who did not put the proposal in that light. He said:

Speaking frankly, some concern has been expressed about whether there would be much demand for indexed bonds. In order to test this it may be that we should consider a limited type of issue for those specialized buyers who seek inflation protection.

Senator Balfour: Why don't you read the whole paragraph?

Senator MacEachen: That is the whole paragraph, except for two preceeding sentences which I would be pleased to read:

As you know, there has been an ongoing discussion about whether the government should introduce indexed bonds. I want to thank the Investment Dealers Association for your views on this subject.

Then the subsequent sentences which I just read complete the paragraph. Clearly, the entire paragraph states that the intention of the Minister of Finance is to protect the buyers, not the treasury. His intention is to protect those who purchase bonds at a time when he is unwilling to protect the old age pensioners. I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that if he cannot comment on behalf of the Minister of Finance, will he not at least apologize to the pensioners of Canada, not only for eroding their financial benefits but also for slapping them in the face by saying: "Now we want to protect the bond owners, and damn the Old Age Pension cheques."

Senator Roblin: I am glad my honourable friend preferred my explanation to that of the Minister of Finance.

Senator MacEachen: I did.

Senator Roblin: I will tell my honourable colleague of that situation, and possibly he might offer me the opportunity to speak to the bond dealers instead.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have just one more question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, in reply to a question in the House of Commons that referred to this particular measure we have been discussing, the removal of full indexation of old age pensions, the Prime Minister said:

—this measure and its possible effects will be monitored closely over the course of the next few months.

Some clarification from the government of what the Prime Minister meant is surely in order in light of the subsequent statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who said that the effects of this measure would not be monitored over the next few months because, in fact, the measure does not come into effect until January 1, 1986. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate can find out for us what the Prime Minister meant by his statement:

—this measure and its possible effects will be monitored closely over the course of the next few months.

Did he have in mind the political effects? Did he have in mind the Decima polls, or did he have in mind the effects on the old age pensioners? Which effects did the Prime Minister have in mind?

Senator Roblin: I would suspect, if one were to attempt to reconcile the two statements, it would depend on the definition of the words "several months" or whatever phrase it was that both gentlemen used. It is perfectly true that the effects of the old age pension change will not become apparent until the first quarter of next year, so obviously that is the point at which monitoring will begin.

Just speaking in a casual way, however, I would not be at all surprised if other aspects of this move were also monitored within the next few months. I think any politician would be misleading if he said that that was not obviously a consideration in matters of public affairs.

Senator MacEachen: In this casual, almost permissive mood which the Leader of the Government in the Senate has permitted himself, would he not go a little further and say that there is some chance that the monitoring might lead to a rescinding of the measure?

Senator Roblin: I do not think I am as permissive with myself as that. It is an interesting suggestion, but I think we must leave it for the effluxion of time to clarify.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Do I take it that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is suggesting to the retired people of this country that if they make their opposition more vocal, there will be a greater chance of having that decision rescinded?

Senator Roblin: I have to say that any government and any politician must listen carefully to expressions of public opinion. He owes it to the public to do that, and I expect that that will be the course followed in the next little while. The reaction to that expression of public opinion must be gauged by the government's feeling as to what, in all of the circumstances, is the best thing to do for the public. I fully expect there will be wide disagreement with such a decision, but it is the responsibility of the government to make it.

Senator Frith: I think we are hearing a door creaking open.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the need to watch the polls is more important than the need to obey some principles of fairness and decency; principles which should have convinced the government, one would think, to give the same sort of indexing to the increased levels of RRSPs as it gives to pensioners. Those who can have RRSP deductions of up to $15,000 are clearly people who can spare $15,000, whereas pensioners on the guaranteed income supplement cannot spare the 3 per cent that will be taken from them. The increases in RRSPs are not indexed, yet the pensioners' pittance for buying necessities is. Does the Leader of the Government mean that polls will prevail over decency?

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: I do not think that the Leader of the Government referred to the word "polls." If I did, I retract it at once, because I am not a strong advocate of polls. There are some people who think that governments should be run by polls. I am not among that group.

There is a distinct difference between polls and public opinion in the wider sense, and public opinion in the wider sense includes these concepts of fairness and equity of which my honourable friend spoke. Those matters must always be considered by a government. I suggest to him that, as we have been given notice of a resolution to deal with this question of indexation of old age pensions, he give us the benefit of his opinions when that resolution is before the house, as I am sure he will. That will give us a chance to conduct a reasoned debate about the matters in question.

END OF DECADE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION AND AGENDA

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We are now only 35 days from the opening of the United Nations End of Decade Women's Conference on the Status of Women in Nairobi, Kenya.

On March 13 I asked the government leader when the Canadian government would be naming the Canadian delegates, the delegations of other countries having already been named by that date. This list, however, appears to remain, even at this date, a state secret. My previous question was taken as notice. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can now tell us why the list of our delegation has not yet been made public. Why do we not know which minister is going to lead that delegation? Why have Canadians not yet had a chance to speak to members of their delegation about the issues on their minds in relation to this conference?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that the details regarding the delegation—the people who will be attending that conference and the briefing associated with it—will soon be made available to her.

Senator Marsden: I thank the Leader of the Government for his answer. I would assume that everyone who is going to Kenya must already be informed of that. Otherwise, how could they make their arrangements in such a short period of time? It is the matter of making the list of delegates public that concerns me.

I also thank the Leader of the Government for providing to me a list of women who have been appointed by this government to various positions. It is a useful list and I am glad to see so many Canadian women holding those positions. The other part of my question of April 24, however, had to do with the list of women who have either been dismissed from positions or have not been reappointed by this government. I wonder whether he would be prepared to provide me with that list?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I was not aware of the other part of the question. I will have to give it some consideration before I can answer it.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

CANADIAN HOG PRODUCTION—UNITED STATES IMPORT DUTY

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, on April 1 of this year, the Americans imposed an extra duty on Canadian hogs exported to the United States of 3.8 cents per pound alive and 5.1 cents per pound dressed. This decision was to be reviewed by the American authorities. Yesterday a decision was made which, far from removing the duty, increased it on live hogs from 3.8 to 4.3 cents per pound and, on dressed hogs, from 5.1 to 5.5 cents per pound. My question is: What action is the government taking with the United States authorities in view of this decision?

Honourable senators, this is a frightening situation, indeed, because this most recent decision is worse than the original one. I believe that the International Trade Commission of the United States is making a further study and that it will take yet another decision within the next few weeks. It is possible—although I hope that it will not be the case—that that decision, which is likely to be of a more permanent nature, could even be worse. I am informed by the Canadian authorities that, as of yesterday, the Omaha price for hogs was 14 cents per pound higher than the Toronto price. This indicates to me that the hog producers of Canada are taking a tremendous beating because of this action by the United States authorities.

Some of us in Canada want to move towards free trade with the United States. It would seem to me that this decision is flying in the face of that sort of move. I repeat my question: What representation is the government making now to the appropriate American authorities as a result of this latest frightening and adverse decision?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with my friend's analysis of this problem. It is an important problem and a serious one. It has been the subject of fairly constant representations by the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States, and I refer particularly to interchanges between our Minister of Agriculture and the Secretary for Agriculture of that country. My honourable friend knows as well as I do that the difficulty is that, in the United States, there is a procedure for dealing with what they call dumping or countervail or unfair trade respecting various products. The allegation is that the stabilization plans—and I believe that the stabilization plan in the Province of Quebec was really the one that triggered this action off, because it is so rich—of both federal and provincial governments are being viewed in the United States as subsidies. We maintain that they are not. We maintain that they constitute an effort to promote orderly marketing by removing unnecessary fluctuations in the market price. Unfortunately, the authorities in the United States who control these matters have not, thus far, taken that view.

I believe that we have until July 18, on which date a final decision will be reached with respect to this matter. I can assure my honourable friend that the Government of Canada will continue to make as serious and as firm a representation as is possible to promote our point of view. I can give my honourable friend no assurance that we will be successful in our effort. If we are not successful, we will have to give serious consideration to what measures we can take to remove this threat from our pork industry. I will not speculate at the present time as to what we might do if this regulation becomes firm and we have these onerous duties imposed on our exports of both live and finished products to the United States. It may require a very serious look at the situation in which we find ourselves.

My own province of Manitoba is particularly hard hit, so I am among those who are sensitive to the issue. I repeat that I can give my honourable friend no assurance of success, but I can give him the assurance that we will continue to do our very best to get some favourable action.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I want to emphasize the necessity of doing everything possible to remedy this situation. While it applies to hogs today, there is little to suggest to me that the very authorities in the United States that are now causing problems for our hog industry difficulty could not, for the same reasons, cause problems for our beef industry, for example. The Americans have raised heck over the potato industry in the past. The strawberry exporters in British Columbia are facing the same sort of attack. I wonder whether the government is fully aware that this kind of philosophy in the United States, if it is extended to other products covered by the Agricultural Stabilization Act, virtually puts almost every aspect of our agricultural industry in serious jeopardy, indeed.

Could the Leader of the Government prevail on the Prime Minister to take action? We read that he has a great relationship with the Government of the United States. Perhaps he could lend the authority of his office to an attempt to solve this problem. Is he currently planning to do that? Is the Government of Canada assisting in a material way, perhaps through providing personnel to the hog industry to assist them in making their representations to the authorities in the United States? It would seem to me that the Government of Canada should lend every possible support in every practical way to that industry and to the hog producers so that they can make their strongest representations.

If this problem is not resolved to our satisfaction, I think that all of the stabilization programs will be put in very serious jeopardy.

• (1450)

It has to call into question the effects that may follow the beef stabilization program, in the event that that is passed. And I am in favour of it. But is the government going to start down a road at the end of which we are going to lose more than we might gain?

The Leader of the Government has said that it was triggered by the Quebec situation. In a sense it was. But we are in Canada and the solution was applied to all Canada. No particular payments were made to the Province of Quebec, or at least I do not believe there were. They were made to the hog industry generally. It arose out of the fact that the Province of Quebec had particular policies in effect which gave the producers in that province some consideration that was not given to producers in the other provinces.

Senator Roblin: My reference to Quebec had to do with the provincial subsidies on pork.

Senator Argue: I know that.

Senator Roblin: They were considered to be rather generous, and aroused some concern among hog producers in other parts of the country, and still do, I believe.

This is not only an international question; it is an internal question as well. And it has to do not only with agricultural trade as between Canada and the United States but with agricultural trade throughout the world.

Agricultural trade is bedevilled with this whole system of quotas and subsidies, and God knows what. We are seeing—rather belatedly, perhaps—the backlash resulting from some of these actions in North America, and we don't like it, and we don't want it. It is particularly ironic that in respect of some of the crops in the United States, the farmers are given support payments of the same kind as those that are being criticized in the case of our hog production.

Senator Argue: And much higher!

Senator Roblin: So, it is not a logical open-and-shut, black-and-white situation. It is a very mixed one. And it has to do with—guess what?—politics, and very much so.

It is not just in the agricultural sector that we face this problem; it has to do, as well, with the trade in lumber, and particularly so in the case of British Columbia, in respect of which the same kind of reasoning is used to suggest that the stumpage system in existence in that province constitutes a form of subsidy.

If that form of thinking should prevail, then the two problems added together present a real crisis in our trade relations with our neighbours, and we are doing everything possible to see that that does not come to pass.

If I may be allowed to pontificate on this point for a moment, the problem is this: In Canada we have one authority—or, at the most, two—in dealing with agricultural trade. If we can get agreement between the provincial and federal governments, we know where we stand. In the United States, due to their congressional system, that is not the case.

The President and the Executive may have certain views in respect of a problem, but if they are not supported by Congress—or, indeed, if Congress makes an end run around the President, as it sometimes does in these matters—it compounds the nature of the problem and it deepens the crisis we face. It means that in addition to having to convince the American Administration of the unwisdom of a particular policy, we have to convince the Congress, because more and more Congress is taking the initiative in matters of trade and foreign affairs. That is part of our problem.

That is no comfort to my honourable friend. I know that. I just wanted to sketch the dimensions of the problem for him. I assure him that we will do everything that we think is practicable, feasible and effective, in trying to present our views to the Government of the United States, and I know that in doing so we will have his support.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the answer of the government leader in the Senate. However, he did not answer the specific question I put to him as to the role being played by the Prime Minister in all of this. The Prime Minister is alleged to have a special relationship with the President of the United States. All of us here understand the division of powers in the United States. But the President is quite an influential part of that whole process. It seems to me that if the President of the United States were doing a little to help Canada's case, that might just do the trick.

So, my question is: What role is the Prime Minister of Canada playing in this? Is he lending his weight in dealing with the United States in this very adverse decision that has been taken?

Senator Roblin: I think there are some instances where it is wise to maintain a certain confidentiality in respect of interchanges of this sort, and I ask my honourable friend to consider that.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers, which I shall be pleased to give to the Senate now.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN CANADIAN FORCES CONTINGENT IN WESTERN EUROPE—EFFECT ON ESTABLISHMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on March 13, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Lafond and the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding national defence and the increase in the Canadian forces contingent in western Europe.

Regarding the increase of 1,200 in Armed Forces personnel in Western Europe, some of these personnel will come from redeployment of existing personnel and some will be new personnel.

The minister hopes to realize the $50 million cost for the 1985-86 year within the existing budget. If this is not possible, the minister has stated he will go to Treasury Board for the funds. Therefore, this item is not included in the main estimates for 1985-86.

AGRICULTURE

FERTILIZER SUPPLEMENT—POSSIBLE LEGAL ACTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on March 21, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Olson regarding the fertilizer supplement and possible legal action.

Although farm fertilizers are not prescribed for registration, all fertilizer supplements are; thus the product, Agrispon, cannot legally be imported for general sale in Canada.

Amendments to the Fertilizers Regulations have been proposed which would apparently shut off the loopholes which have been employed by the promoters of the products, Agrispon and Nitromax. The proposed amendments would restrict importation of non-registered products to use for bona fide experimental purposes only. The proposed regulations amendments have been with the Department of Justice for review for a number of months and the minister had hoped to be in a position to present these proposed amendments to Governor-in-Council prior to the present time. The proposed amendment has been strongly endorsed by the Saskatchewan Deputy Minister encouraging the adoption of this amendment with the least possible delay.

The Department of Agriculture's research scientists have published the results of their studies on Agrispon which have in essence shown it to have little or no value in crop production, both in the scientific literature and made available through news releases and summaries to the popular press.

Regional personnel of the department's Agriculture Inspection Directorate in both Manitoba and Saskatchewan have granted media interviews in which they stressed to farmers the dangers inherent in purchasing unproven, unregistered products such as Agrispon.

In regard to the second part of the question, the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, who administers the misleading advertising and deceptive marketing practices provisions of the act, will examine the matter in relation to these provisions. However, it should be noted that an offence must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt in a court of criminal law.

To date, the Director has not received any complaints or information alleging there has been a misleading representation.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

CANADIAN POTATOES—UNITED STATES IMPORT DUTY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on March 27, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding Canada-United States relations, and specifically the United States import duty on Canadian potatoes.

The Honourable John Wise and U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. John Block, met in Ottawa on October 17-18, 1984. Their agenda and discussions focussed on a variety of agricultural trade issues, including potatoes from eastern Canada.

On January 28, 1985, Congresswoman Olympia J. Snowe (2nd District, Maine) wrote to Mr. Wise. She suggested that a specific meeting be held between the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture and the Canadian Minister of Agriculture to discuss/resolve trade related potato issues.

Mr. Wise replied to Congresswoman Snowe on March 25, 1985, indicating his preference to "—reserving judgement until my next meeting with Secretary Block as regards your suggestions for specific bilateral discussions on trade in table potatoes—".

A meeting of the Secretary and Minister took place on May 8, 1985, in Washington, at which time the subject was raised but not resolved. Discussions on the subject are continuing.

WORLD WAR II

40TH ANNIVERSARY OF SURRENDER OF GERMAN FORCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): A question was asked in the Senate on May 2, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Haidasz regarding World War II and the 40th anniversary of the surrender of German forces.

The Government of Canada marked the 40th anniversary of the end of hostilities in Europe with pilgrimages to The Netherlands and Italy. Canadians commemorated those who were killed liberating The Netherlands and also shared in the celebrations recalling Canada's role in restoring freedom to the Dutch people.

In Italy, Canadian representatives paid their respects to Canadians and those of our allies in the Eighth Army who lost their lives during the long Mediterranean Campaign. No ceremonies were conducted in Canada.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST NICARAGUA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on May 2, 1985, by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding foreign affairs and the imposition by the United States of economic sanctions against Nicaragua.

(The answer follows:)

Canada considers that the Central American crisis stems largely from socio-economic problems, and that these should be addressed by encouraging economic and social development, not by measures which impede progress in these areas. Hence, a substantial Canadian aid program in Nicaragua which has recently been increased.

We continue to maintain normal trade and diplomatic relations with Nicaragua.

Canada continues to see the Contadora process as essential for achieving a framework of reconciliation in central America and that the embargo will hinder that process.

We give more than rhetorical support to the Contadora process. In response to the meeting that the Secretary of State for External Affairs convened with Contadora Ambassadors in November, Canada was asked to provide detailed comments on control and verification. This was done and the comments have been welcomed by all concerned in the region.

Canada remains concerned that the embargo and President Ortega's visit to Moscow have increased the problems of East/West tensions in Central America.

Canada hopes that Nicaragua will return to the original commitments of the revolution, e.g. non-alignment and political pluralism.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT

BONN, WEST GERMANY—WORLD DRUG TRADE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on May 7, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding the Economic Summit and the world drug trade, and government policy thereon.

(The answer follows:)

At the present time, the Prime Minister's Office has nothing further to comment on the drug issue.

[Senator Roblin.]

BANKING

ALLEGED RESTRICTION ON LOANS TO AID-RECEIVING COUNTRIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on May 8 and again on May 30, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Stanbury regarding banking and the alleged restrictions on loans to aid receiving countries.

(The answer follows:)

The Inspector General of Banks has issued guidelines to Canadian banks for establishing provisions in the range of 10 per cent to 15 per cent of their total claims on thirty-two countries by October 31, 1986. The group of countries include those that have recently encountered problems in servicing their external debt or have restructured all or part of that debt.

Such provisions are prudential in nature and are to cover sovereign and transborder risks. As a result, should any country default, the provisions would be applied to absorb the attendant losses and thereby reduce the impact on the bank.

The establishing of these provisioning standards is not expected to cut-off the lending by Canadian banks to public or private sector entities in these countries, since the final decision as to extending loans to credit worthy customers remains with management. For this reason, when the guidelines were issued, the banks were given three years to comply. Accordingly, current trade finance and other short term credit decisions should not be unduly impaired, particularly where such loans mature before October 31, 1986.

The Committee of Bank Supervisors, which meet at the Bank for International Settlements, is encouraging this approach to provisioning. Hence, other industrialized countries have simultaneously implemented similar techniques. For example, Japan has called for mandatory provisions on a list of approximately 35 countries; Switzerland has done the same, listing 100 countries; the United States has named five countries and has imposed a range of requirements against these exposures in conjunction with strengthening capital requirements for banks with significant exposure to debtors which have exhibited problems.

Prior to implementation concerns surrounding international risks were discussed with banks and bank auditors. This method was generally accepted as a tough but prudent approach which would leave banks well-placed, vis-à-vis their international competitors.

PARLIAMENT HILL

SUGGESTED RELOCATION OF TOURIST RECEPTION TENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): A question was asked in the Senate on May 29, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Denis regarding the suggested relocation of the tourist reception tent.

(The answer follows:)

The National Capital Commission are the originators of the tent idea and the operators of this facility. Initial discussions last year between the National Capital Commission and the Public Works Department officials included the possibility of locating the proposed tent on the lawn behind the West Block as suggested by Senator Denis. This location was ruled out by the National Capital Commission on the grounds that the tent would visually interfere with their Sound and Light Show.

The NCC have acknowledged responsibility for reinstatement of the grounds after the tent is removed in the fall.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SALE OF SHARES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on May 29, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Austin regarding the sale of shares of the Canada Development Corporation and government policy in respect thereto.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion announced on May 29th, 1985, that the government will sell its share interest in the Canadian Development Corporation to the public. The sale of 23.8 million shares will take place under the terms of existing legislation which governs the Canada Development Corporation. However, Mr. Stevens stated that the Government will proceed as soon as possible to introduce new legislation to enable CDC to operate in the future as a commercial enterprise with full private sector ownership. This proposed legislation will increase the maximum voting interest which may be held by any one Canadian individual or institution or associated group of Canadian individuals or institutions from 3 per cent to 25 per cent.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CLOSING OF PATENT OFFICE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked in the Senate on May 30, 1985, by the Honourable Senator Stewart regarding Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the closing of the patent office.

Concerning the possible closure of the Patent Office, the Ministerial Task Force on Programme Review did not in fact recommend such a measure but rather a better utilization by Canada of the international patent system by avoidance of duplication and the ratification of the Patent Cooperation Treaty.

In the interest of Canadians, a more efficient patent system is being sought by providing the best service at the lowest cost. It is in this regard, that the Minister has received a mandate from the Neilsen Task Force. It is the Minister's responsibility to see that the recommendations are put to best use. In doing so however, it is not the intention of the Government to give up its responsibility for intellectual property to foreign countries. Canada will benefit from the experience of other countries, but as well it will still be in a position to decide for itself what is good for the country. The present staff is the one which will be needed to do this job.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which was presented on Thursday, May 30, 1985.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate to give a brief explanation on the Fifth Report of the National Finance Committee concerning the consideration of expenditures proposed by the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986.

In its review the committee decided that the best way to consider these estimates was to focus upon recipients rather than the departments and agencies responsible for distributing the funds. Our task is made easier by focusing upon recipients, for this will enable us to find out whether the efforts of the government were successful, since all the attention is directed towards the outcome of those efforts.

Since recipients can be provinces and municipalities, crown corporations and departments, including lenders on our outstanding public debt, the committee chose to focus its attention upon the amounts paid to the province for financing post-secondary education pursuant to the provisions of Part IV of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1977, and upon federal contributions with respect to secondary education and health, the EPF arrangements.

Under this agreement, the most recent statistics of the Department of Finance reveal that payments for 1985-86 will be about $4.532 billion. This includes a $2.353 billion cash transfer, 8.5 per cent more than the previous year, and $2.179 billion in tax point transfers, again 7.4 per cent more than the previous year. In the course of this study, Mr. A. W. Johnson, Special Advisor to the Secretary of State on the Financing of Post-Secondary Education, informed members of the committee that the percentage of federal transfers paid under PSE financing arrangements had increased from 69 per cent in 1977-78 to 80 per cent in 1984-85.

In an excellent report for the Secretary of State, published under the title: Giving Greater Point and Purpose to the Federal Financing of Post-Secondary Education and Research in Canada, tabled in both chambers in February 1985, the emphasis is on the need for a new fiscal arrangement to replace PSE, and on tying the rate of increase of federal transfers to each province to the increase in provincial subsidies to the provinces' respective post-secondary institutions.

Mr. Johnson criticized the overriding concern of Canada's universities and eleven legislatures for equal opportunity for post-secondary education, at the expense of excellence.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Canadian Association of University Teachers showed appreciation for the recommendation made by Mr. Johnson concerning the unconditional aspect of federal transfers, without, however, entirely supporting the search for excellence at the expense of equal opportunity. They did realize, however, that owing to a scarcity of financial resources, the goals and aspirations of Canada's universities and colleges will be difficult to attain. Furthermore, the associations observed that as a result of budgetary constraints, Canadian universities pay very high salaries for experienced professors, and also that there is a lack of training for junior professors. There may well be a crisis in the 90s, when there will be a drop in the number of individuals sufficiently trained to replace experienced professors when they retire.

Honourable senators, as witnesses were heard, there was extensive questioning, and committee members realized that it would be impossible to find the answer to all the problems raised, on such short notice. Many of these questions are mentioned in the report, but I would like to quote only a few:

First, the establishment of national objectives for post-secondary education is clearly of interest to the federal government, if for no other reason than its responsibility to be accountable to Parliament.

Second, the importance, quality and type of research engaged in is the responsibility, at least in part, of the federal government.

Third, the training of highly qualified manpower to meet future needs of universities is a concern to both levels of government.

Arriving at the conclusion that there is a combined role for both levels of government in maintaining a high quality university system in Canada is not difficult, but determining what this university system should look like, what it should accomplish and how federal financial resources should be spent to support such a system is not simple.

The committee realized that to meet its requirement to report to the estimates, it must keep its hearings limited and report on the conclusions it had already drawn. The committee is now determining whether it should undertake a larger review of this subject.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned until next sitting of the Senate.

AGING

JUSTICE FOR THE ELDERLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll rose pursuant to notice of December 19, 1984, that he will call the attention of the Senate to justice for the elderly.

He said: Honourable senators, I had no idea that you would make the way so clear for me by adjourning each item in order. My topic, as you can see, is pretty broad. It is justice for the elderly. In the past, the elderly, the poor and the unfortunate have had occasion to look to the Senate for help. They consider the Senate particularly charged with the greater responsibility for the poor, the elderly and the pensioners because we have been around longer and we understand the problems.

Before getting into the problems—and you will hear more about them on Thursday, if I am any judge of what has been said here—I would like to say something about the responsibility of the Senate and the methods for meeting that responsibility.

Everyone has been kicking us around lately. They do not even wait for the football season to start. They start on us early. It is my considered view that there is no constituency out there for abolition of the Senate. There is a constituency out there for reforming the Senate; and the best, the most dedicated and the most competent persons to do that are in this very chamber. We do not resist reformation. We have different views, and those views can be reconciled to build a more modern and effective Senate.

Mind you, there are some, but very few, who want to abolish the Senate. But they have no constituency. They are the "holler" brigade, and they appear at all times everywhere.

Unpleasant things are being said about the Senate. There seems to be no end to the critical barrage. Proposals for reform are plentiful. They urge varying degrees of reform, ranging from severe limitations on the powers of the Senate to a system of elected senators who would represent various regions of the country.

The reason I am on my feet today is because I wish to offer a solution that has not yet been proposed. I have been doing more thinking on this. Honourable senators may not like it, but I like it. What do we do about those angry proposals? Do they represent more than the emotional attitude of a handful of critics, supported by the media, which finds such controversy excitingly newsworthy? Or do they speak only for themselves? We really do not know.

We do know that it is important how Canadians feel about the Senate. Has anyone ever asked them? No, not for 118 years. Everyone else talks about it, but the Canadian people have never been asked to give their opinion. We have had small-scale opinion surveys done in a superficial way. We have had a Gallup poll, and other polls—sometimes 400 people have been surveyed, sometimes 200, sometimes even 1,000 people.

But the method of polling on national issues is entirely unsatisfactory, because the questions are pointed in connection with a questionnaire. The result is that to wishy-washy questions you get misty answers.

● (1510)

I believe it is about time we put the question to the people of Canada, and we should do it clearly, comprehensively and soon.

The Prime Minister has, time and again, made this statement, and I quote:

My budget calls for Canadians, not government, to choose what is best for Canada.

I propose a "National Referendum" which would go to all Canadians to ask them what they wish the Senate's future to be. It is, I believe, the only way to base any decisions for such change on proper ground. If Canadians want to abolish the Senate, let them say so; if they want to reform the Senate, let the referendum show the options for change fairly and honestly, and let it record the people's views.

We have heard cries for change coming from several directions. I suggest we go to Main Street, Canada, to find out what people think—all the people. We live in a country whose national government makes much of consultation with special interests so that no one's views are overlooked. Are not the people special in this particular instance?

What does the man on the street say? For 100 years nobody has asked him. Is it not about time?

I suggest that we go to our biggest interest of all, the Canadian people, and establish their views on this issue. Such a referendum would be the ultimate expression of a working democracy. What have we to fear from finding out what the Canadian people think?

The questions on the referendum need to be simple and easily understood. There are two types of questions, the Gallup poll question and the referendum question. The Gallup poll type questions could be:

- (1) Do you favour a Senate with equal representation on a
  - (a) provincial and territorial basis, or
  - (b) regional basis?
- (2) Do you favour
  - (a) an elected Senate or
  - (b) an appointed Senate?
- (3) If appointed, do you prefer
  - (a) all senators to be appointed by the federal government, or
  - (b) half of the senators to be appointed by the federal government and half by the provincial governments?
- (4) Do you prefer a Senate with
  - (a) the same powers it now has, or
  - (b) reduced powers?

These are not tricky questions. Anyone who has an idea of what is going on can answer those without any difficulty.

The referendum question is a little different. It could be:

Do you favour amending the Constitution in order to provide for an elected Senate with an equal number of senators from each of the provinces and territories and with powers similar to those that it now possesses?

I thought it might be useful to set out an example of the types of questions.

As for the powers, that can be settled by an eminent group of Canadians who are qualified to deal with the subject, their recommendations to be passed on to a small committee of an equal number of senators and members of the House of Commons.

I am calling for a national referendum. It would be the ultimate expression of democracy in action.

The tragedy is that our story has never been told. People do not listen. People speak of a Senate that existed 20 years ago without giving the subject any thought. They just write us off as old cronies and bagmen. How mistaken they are! A national referendum would give us a chance to meet the people at the polls. I look forward to the day when I can tell the story of the Senate publicly time and time again, and so should every one of you. I want to get out on the hustings to tell it as it is.

I have spoken on the subject of help to pensioners to four generations of Canadians. I have made hundreds of speeches. The latest observation I made was, and I quote:

They have already paid a thousand times over by paying taxes all their lives, and should not now be asked to help cut the deficit.

The opposition in the House of Commons cannot stop the government from passing a bill to end full inflation protection for old age pensions.

It is interesting to note the powers of the Senate, and I quote:

Thus the Senate was intended to represent regional and property interests and serve as a check or brake on the House of Commons: it was to constitute, in Sir John A. Macdonald's phrase, "the House which has the sober second-thought in legislation".

Something that is seldom discussed is that when the Senate was established wealth was measured by property. They did not know anything about corporations. The people in Quebec and Ontario who were wealthy were careful about letting the frontiersmen and fishermen get too much of what they then possessed. They protected themselves by giving themselves good numbers of seats.

Senator Everett: That is still the case.

Senator Croll: We have already reformed that.

The point I want to make is that the reference is to people, not regions. They had in mind that the Senate would be there to slow down a government that had a terrific majority. They wanted to slow it down and stop it. They were concerned about the possibility of a Social Credit government taking over. They wanted to slow that down and stop it. They were concerned about a Socialist government taking over. They wanted to slow that down and stop it. That was the general thought in the minds of those who established the Senate.

The Prime Minister has stated that there will be no change. "The government will not retreat from its plan to end full inflation protection for old age pensioners," despite mounting public protest, the Prime Minister is reported to have said yesterday. "There will be no change," the Prime Minister told the House of Commons, as Liberals and New Democratic Party MPs continued to hammer at the government for a reversal of the curb on indexing announced in last month's budget. The honourable Minister of Finance complains that we have too few rich people in our country. What he should concern himself with is that we have too many poor people in the country.

● (1520)

The Senate has already been advised to keep the pension matter at low key. The advice is to "keep barking but don't bite." I have news for those people: If I am any judge of the mood of this house, we will not only bite but we will leave an imprint.

If the bill comes here in form and substance I, for one, will vote against it, no matter what the consequences. I have reason to believe that I will be joined by enough Liberals to defeat the bill so that the Senate can return to its sense of purpose.

I should like to say a few words about the resolution presented to the House of Commons by the Minister of Justice dealing with the Senate. I think that the resolution is a very sensible. However, he presented it with vehemence and with an element of maliciousness and directed it against the "unelected coterie of Liberals." He has the audacity to suggest that we, the Liberals, are the secret and the hidden Government of Canada. I feel rather uncomfortable about that.

The resolution was not to be introduced until after Parliament returned from its vacation, but because rumours reached the minister that the Liberal majority in the Senate would defeat the budget, he took the first opportunity to toss the resolution at us. I tell him, "I'm not afraid of the big bad wolf."

There are some good portions of the resolution that I can support, but I cannot support it totally. I should like to explain why. It will eunuchize this chamber and make it a nullity. I will not agree to support it and I do not suppose that the rest of you will either until he makes some real changes.

I prepared two speeches, one of which totals 23 pages and the other 22 pages, but I do not intend to go into both of them. Instead of speaking about it, I told you how I was going to act about it. That power to act is a power that not too many people have unless they have the position that I have. So I shall not inflict that speech upon you. You will hear much discussion from others in the days to come and until such time as the problem is settled.

I have been here longer than most of you. When I was first appointed to the Senate it bored me to death. I tried to build it up to where we could start doing some investigative work in committees, and that work has now become a major asset to the Senate. The deputy leader proposed this afternoon the pre-study of five pieces of legislation. But nobody pays any attention to our doing this work. We know what we are doing and we know that we are doing good work here.

Sometimes we are divided on political grounds but that does not happen often in committee. There we try to play it fair. It bothers me that nobody knows what we are doing and that nobody will listen. I think we have reached the point where we should ask the people of Canada to make up their minds. The questions that I placed before you anybody can answer because they are not involved. Most of my questions require yes or no answers. "The people showed a lot of wisdom," the Conservatives would say because they elected them as the government of the day. So the people have the ability to deal with these questions. Let us give them the chance. This provides a rare chance to be able to write at least part of the Constitution of an ongoing country like ours with an ongoing economy, and without hurting anybody along the way. We should take advantage of that. Think of the interest it will create in the government of the country. An 18 year old would have the choice of deciding whether he wants an elected or an appointed Senate.

I am not going on with the other speech, but I will just move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Will the honourable senator permit a question? He referred to the fact that he is going to vote against the removal of pension indexing and that he thought he would be supported by a majority of the Liberal members of the Senate. My question is: Is this just an opinion or has he actually canvassed his Liberal senators and, if so, how many?

Senator Croll: I have not canvassed them, but I assure you that there will be a majority. Perhaps a few of them will not show up, but be assured that it will not pass this house.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the honourable senator permit a question? He proposed a referendum but he also said that the press does not know what we do nor does it want to know what we do. One of the consequences of that is that the public probably does not know what we do. How can we go to the public when it has been deliberately uninformed?

Senator Croll: The press has to discuss a referendum broadly whether they want to or not. One of the tragedies in this place is that once upon a time we used to have a Canadian Press man up in the gallery but all of a sudden they could not afford it. For 15 years the press have insulted the Senate. If a senator gets thrown in jail because he wanted to speak to the sergeant at the police station with regard to being run off the road on his moped, the press give that item front-page news especially when he was convicted. When he appealed that conviction you will find a little note in the newspaper that he was acquitted on page 58 of a 59-page printing. That is the kind of situation the media always plays up, but we cannot be denied attention on a national issue as important as this. We need to get people interested and ask for their answers to these important questions. You have to treat it in the same way as it is done during an election.

● (1530)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Has the honourable senator finished his remarks? If any other honourable senator wants to speak, can he move the adjournment? The honourable senator did move the adjournment himself, but if another senator wished to adjourn the debate, would he allow that?

Senator Croll: If other honourable senators wish to speak, I should be glad to have them do so.

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE
SIXTH REPORTREPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1986

Tuesday, June 11, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of May 29, 1985, submits its interim report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From the Treasury Board:

Mr. J. L. Manion,
Secretary;

Mr. D. J. McEachran,
Senior Assistant Secretary,
Program Branch;

Mr. Harvie T. Cocks,
Assistant Director,
Crown Corporations Directorate.

From the Department of Finance:

Mr. B. Hunter,
International Finance and Development Division.

Supplementary Estimates (A) totalling $350.6 million brings the total Estimates tabled to date to $103.9 billion. The entire $350.6 million is for non-statutory items and consequently requires parliamentary approval through an appropriations bill. Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list of two $1 votes included in these Supplementary Estimates (A) which is attached as an appendix to this report.

The Committee questioned Treasury Board officials about the $110 million investment in equity to de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, particularly since this comes on top of a similar investment of $150 million to the same company only months earlier under Supplementary Estimates (C), 1984-85. Senators learned that the government was investing in equity rather than making loans to de Havilland because it was keeping the company's debt level to zero in the hope of attracting a private sector buyer. Senators also learned that the equity route was being used rather than the issuing of loans because of the absence of a reasonable chance of seeing the loan repaid. This perturbed some Committee members because it calls into question the reasons for keeping de Havilland afloat.

The Committee was surprised to learn that in spite of the precarious financial position of de Havilland, the company is the major shareholder of Brymon Airways, a small airline which operates Dash 7's and Twin-Otter aircraft within Britain. De Havilland, which was the chief creditor, rescued Brymon in late 1983 after the company lost $4.7 million in 1982-83. While de Havilland is trying to sell Brymon today, Senators wondered about the management decision to buy Brymon when de Havilland was not on a stable financial footing.

Treasury Board officials indicated that of the $209.7 million requested by Employment and Immigration for employment initiatives, $175.9 million was for the student summer employment program, Challenge '85. This program which replaces Summer Canada, was announced in February 1985 and calls for about $145 million to be distributed across provinces. While it was clear that this financial distribution did not follow the population distribution, Treasury Board officials were unable to explain the rationale for it and agreed to supply this information to the Committee at a later date. Senators also asked the Treasury Board officials to explain how Challenge '85 differs from previous summer employment programs.

The Committee learned that for the third year in succession, the Medical Research Council (MRC) is in need of supplementary funds ($30.9 million in these Supplementary Estimates (A))—to meet its commitment to existing programs. Senators were perplexed by the fact the government had agreed to include MRC's budgetary requests in these Supplementary Estimates but is only now undertaking a review of MRC's long term plans. Senators suggested that as part of this review, Treasury Board should examine the rationale for the level of support for MRC. This should include not only the level of demand for MRC's program, but also the level of need for this research by government and the Canadian public.

The Committee will continue to study the international financial arrangements arising in Vote L2a—Financial and Economic Policies in accordance with the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC,
Chairman.

Page 16 Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 5a—To extend the purposes of this Vote so as to reinstate the Ministerial Guarantee of Housing Loans to the Cree and Naskapi Bands.

APPENDIX

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1985-86

There are two One Dollar Votes included in these Supplementary Estimates. The votes have been included in the Estimates to secure Parliamentary approval for the following reasons:

Vote 20a—To authorize a transfer of $54,999,999 from Vote 15 to provide for additional payments under the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act.

As noted in the Vote wording the purpose here is to transfer funds between Votes.

The Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs is authorized by previous Appropriation Acts to guarantee housing loans to Indians by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, banks, or other approved lenders. Cree and Naskapi Bands of Quebec ceased to exist under the Indian Act when the Cree-Naskapi (of Quebec) Act was proclaimed on July 3, 1984 and so they became inadvertently ineligible for these ministerial guarantees. This $1 item will amend the previous Appropriation Acts to add the Cree and Naskapi Band Corporations created under the Cree-Naskapi (of Quebec) Act as entities for whom the Minister of IAND may guarantee housing loans.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the importation into Canada of Japanese manufactured automobiles.

In the past an arrangement has been entered into between Canada and Japan setting the level of imports of Japanese manufactured automobiles. Are there negotiations with the Japanese currently going on in this connection, and are we close to reaching an agreement with the Japanese on this important question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can give my honourable friend some information about the present status of the trade, but I am unable to give him any information as to when negotiations may be completed in this matter.

If my memory serves me well, the voluntary limitation at the moment is set at a level of 18 per cent of the automobile market, a level that is subject to monitoring by Statistics Canada.

Some figures have been given in the newspapers, and my information is that those figures overstate the current situation. In other words, the number of automobiles imported from Japan is not as great as those quoted in those newspaper reports.

Nevertheless, the matter of the quota is under serious consideration. One problem is that some of the Japanese-type automobiles are manufactured in the United States, and while it is true that they are subject to a 10.6 per cent duty, the argument by some is that those automobiles constitute American manufactured imported automobiles and not Japanese manufactured automobile imports. That is an added problem.

The point of my honourable friend's question relates to how we are getting along in our negotiations. All I can say is that we are monitoring the situation very closely indeed, and if we perceive that there is a need to do so, we shall have to take some other steps to come to some measure of agreement with the Japanese government. I do not know that we have reached that stage at the present moment.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government tell me what requirements or what demands Canada has made of the Japanese as preconditions for concluding an arrangement of this kind? Have we stipulated a requirement for the Japanese to enter into investments in Canada as a quid pro quo for access to the Canadian market?

We know that the Japanese have undertaken investments in the automobile industries of other countries as a way of safeguarding their markets in those countries, and I am wondering whether that type of condition is up front in these negotiations and whether the fact that the Canadian negotiators are pressing for Japanese investment in Canada is a sticking point in the negotiations.

Senator Roblin: In these negotiations, one has to bear in mind that most of the time we sell far more to the Japanese than they sell to us. That is a background factor that cannot be overlooked.

In connection with the Canadian sourcing of Japanese products, if my memory serves me correctly, in 1987 or 1988 a plant to assemble Japanese cars will be opened in the province of Ontario. That is certainly part of the quid pro quo in the negotiations which are being considered now.

The whole question of sourcing in Canada is very important to the government, and we are doing what we can to encourage the Japanese to do this. I am sure that it is certainly an important part of the negotiations on the quota.

Senator MacEachen: May I carry the point a step further and ask whether it is a fact that the Japanese are requesting of Canada an arrangement similar to the understanding which they have reached with the United States and that that is unacceptable to Canada; and that we have insisted upon sourcing or investment by the Japanese in Canada, and that is unacceptable to the Japanese?

In other words, the Japanese are asking for an arrangement similar to the understanding reached with the United States, which we do not accept; and they do not accept our requirements for investment. As a result, we are at an impasse.

I do not know the answers. I should like the Leader of the Government, if not today at least at an early date, to throw some light on this, because there does not seem to be very much information in the public domain.

Senator Roblin: Of course, if there were no disagreement there would be no need to negotiate. The fact that there is disagreement on several topics—and I am sure the two my honourable friend mentioned are among them—means we have the need to negotiate. It is really not practical for me to undertake to offer to my honourable friend information about our negotiating stance if, by doing so, it might hinder the success of our efforts in that respect. I would therefore like to be excused from dealing with the matter further. I will, however, ask my colleague, the minister in charge of this particular item, where he stands in these negotiations with the Japanese, and whether there is any further information he can offer that it would be appropriate to release in the public domain at this time.

Senator MacEachen: In his first answer the Leader of the Government implied, I think, that in the absence of progress, or in the absence of an understanding, the government might take steps that would force the matter along. Maybe I am stating it too strongly, but I think there was an implication that the government may have in mind some action that would make the Japanese think more clearly on the matter. For example, the question of restricting the entry of Japanese cars to western ports been considered by the cabinet? Has that been before the cabinet, and is it one of the options the minister had in mind in replying to the first question?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows it is very difficult for me to tell him what went on in cabinet. I cannot do that. All I can say is that negotiations are proceeding, and common sense tells me that our negotiators will use every tool they feel they have at their disposal to get a decision that they regard as acceptable.

BEEF IMPORTS FROM EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Hon. H. A. Olson: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question about beef imports from the EEC generally, and I think more particularly from Ireland. As the Leader of the Government knows, there has been a very large increase in such imports with some almost disastrous effects on the beef market in Canada during the past year or so. The government's response, after some negotiations about mid-May, was to set up an import quota far in excess of what it was prior to the last year, almost guaranteeing that there will be an oversupply of beef on the market in Canada for some grades of beef, which, of course, would lead in turn to a depressed price in Canada during that period of time.

I would ask the Leader of the Government if the government has reconsidered, because of the devastating results of this quota, the level of import quota granted, which is, I think, somewhere around 22 million pounds or 23 million pounds, so that it will be brought more in line with the market demand here in Canada and so that our beef industry does not have to face that kind of competition.

The other point involved is whether or not the government have considered modifying it so that the terms and conditions under which that beef comes into Canada would be the same as those for Canadian beef moving into their market, which, as he and other people in Canada know, are very much different at the present time.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): With respect to the second question, I can say that I do not think that comes within the practical possibilities of the GATT, so I do not think it is an option where we have much elbow room.

I should like to deal with the first question in somewhat more detail. My friend is right in saying that an agreement has been reached with the European Economic Community on a quota of some 20 million pounds approximately of beef to come into Canada. What happened was, a few years ago there was nothing coming from the EEC. Then, I think as a result of their common agricultural policies, very large surpluses of beef were developed, as one might expect, and these have been pushed into foreign markets, of which Canada is one. As I said, a few years ago it was nothing. Three years ago the volume of imports into Canada from that source began to increase. In the recent past they were very much larger than 22 million pounds, and the forecast for 1985 was for a very large increase, amounting to, if memory serves me correctly, some two or three times the amount of the quota that we set.

• (1410)

In our negotiations with the EEC we established a quota based on the historical record. This historical record ran from zero to about the projected figure of 83 for 1985. We arrived at a certain figure. The EEC then made it clear to us that they regarded this as unacceptable under GATT. Indeed, upon looking at the rules of the GATT we concluded that we had to reconsider the amount of beef to be imported into Canada. To the best of my information, it was in accordance with the rules of the GATT that that final figure was agreed upon. Why did we agree to it under any circumstances at all? Force majeure was the reason, because the EEC said that if we did what we were proposing to do with their beef—that is, for all intents and purposes, keep most of it out—they would to take action against our imports into their community. They listed some $80 million worth of Canadian imports into the European community on which they said they would erect barriers.

So it was the usual question of a trade-off. We had to decide what would be the best deal we could make in view of the threatened limitations or barring of some $80 million of our agricultural products going into the EEC if we took action which they regarded as unfair with respect to their beef. They were able to make this proposal because the conditions of GATT provided for it. So we were in the position of having no standing in court, so to speak, with respect to the matter. Therefore, we were under some real pressure to make the best deal we could, and that is where the decision was made to settle on the figure of approximately 20 million pounds.

As to the related question on imports from other places, I believe that matter is being examined. I must be careful of my response here because I am relying on my memory, but I believe that the matter is being examined with respect to some other people who export very large quantities of beef to Canada, particularly from the Antipodes. American trade is not affected because it is a different class of beef and, therefore, it seems to be a different matter. The long and the short of it is that we made the best deal we could under rather trying and irritating circumstances.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I hold in my hand a news release issued by the Alberta Cattle Feeders Association, and I have seen a couple of other press releases by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association that state that they have been sold out for some other commodity. Judging from the response from the minister, it seems that that is in fact the case, that they were traded off in the interests of some other commodity. Will the government come clean now and tell us for whom they were traded off? Why does the beef industry have to accept this kind of competition in the trading and dealing that is done in the interests of some other commodity? At least, if you are going to be sold out, you should know who you are being sold out for. Would the Leader of the Government in Senate provide us with the rest of the story? It would seem that what he has already said gives credibility to the press release and the accusation that this new government has sold them out.

Senator Roblin: I would not expect any cattle raiser to be ecstatic about the deal.

Senator Olson: You are right there.

Senator Roblin: I am a realist and I know that when an action is taken that affects a particular interest group, we will hear from them, and why not? That is the way our system works and I respect the right of the Alberta cattlemen to take the view that they take. The question is: How can you limit the damage?

If we had not been able to make some deal by way of a trade-off here, then we would not have been able to keep the quota from the European Economic Community to 23 million pounds, and a very much greater amount of beef would be coming in. Therefore we must saw things off and make the most advantageous arrangement we can, considering all the factors.

If my information is correct, I take the view that if we had not been able to make this deal with Europe on the 23 million pounds and if we had allowed the regular GATT trade regulations to apply without any bargaining on them, then we would probably have had to absorb, or expose our market to, a larger import of beef than we have at the present time.

The possibility of reducing the quotas of other suppliers into the Canadian market is one that, as I have already said, is under examination. You must remember that, while 23 million pounds is a great deal of meat, the European Economic Community is not the only place that exports beef and other livestock products into Canada. Others do so as well in very large amounts—indeed, in greater amounts.

I am not trying to say that the Alberta cattlemen have nothing to be worried and annoyed about. I am sure they have, but what I am saying is that this arrangement that was made was not only a reasonable one but, what is more to the point, it was the best that could be made in the circumstances. There is no sense in sacrificing all elements of our agricultural community. Everyone takes a little share in this, and the Alberta people are taking a very big share at the present time. I simply say that when you have all the facts on the table, you make the best deal that you can. If some people feel that it is unfair to their interests, you must listen to what they have to say, which heaven knows the minister did, because these negotiations took place over several months. The minister heard from everybody in the industry in no uncertain terms and at great length, so the views of the industry are well known. It is the minister's responsibility, however, to make the best deal that he can with the knowledge that it is in the general interest of the nation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a final supplementary. Now that the government has admitted that they have done damage to the beef industry in Canada, what is the next action that they are prepared to take to pay for that damage? Obviously, someone is benefiting from the deal, as he puts it, that was made when the minister had all of the so-called facts on the table in front of him, along with the terms and conditions that we are required to abide by under the GATT regulations. However, the result was that the beef industry was damaged. Does the federal government not feel some responsibility to make some transfer or institute some program to compensate for the damage that they have done to the beef industry as a result of this deal?

Senator Roblin: Of course, I do not agree with my honourable friend's premise, because I think the action of the government has limited the damage to the beef industry. If the action had not been taken, the damage would have been much greater. I think that is the point that my honourable friend is ignoring.

Senator Olson: I would point out to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate that his explanation does not apply to the beef industry. I accept your argument that it might have been greater in aggregate to all sectors that would be affected by imports or Canadian exports to the EEC. However, I am talking more specifically about that sector, namely the beef industry, that was damaged as a result. On balance, it seems to me that that is what governing is all about; that you try to work these things out and be fair to everyone involved. If you damage someone's interests for the financial benefit of someone else, then you do something that affords some compensation for that damage.

Senator Roblin: I do not see eye to eye with my honourable friend, because if the government had not made this arrangement, the imports of beef from the European Economic Community would not be 23 million pounds; they would be several times that amount. That is the situation that would have prevailed if no agreement had been made with them. The amount of beef imported from the EEC would have been much greater. In fact, if you look at the figures for 1984, if my memory serves me correctly, they were much greater. So there actually has been a reduction over the period, and that is what the government has been trying to do—to limit the damage to that industry. I think we have been reasonably successful.

● (1420)

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. When the leader responds, he might explain the term "force majeure"—force majeure made you do it. I know that the cattle producers of Alberta would be interested in that definition. At least we have now finally come to the point where the Liberals did not make you do it. In any event, in posing my question I should like to draw your attention back to July of 1984 when you made the pilgrimage to Prince Albert to herald the P.C. Agenda for Government Policies on Agriculture. The Prime Minister at that time said:

We will impose an effective Fast Track Tariff Policy, so that responsive action can be taken to protect producers by imposing import restrictions when necessary.

When can the producers look forward to this Fast Track Tariff Policy promised to them or is this another broken promise?

Senator Roblin: If I thought my honourable friend did not understand the meaning of "force majeure", I would explain it to him.

Senator Stewart: Isn't it "force manure"?

Senator Flynn: I know something about that!

Senator Roblin: I kind of like the French accent from Prince Albert over there. He has outlined the situation with his usual pungency.

I want to say to my honourable friend that the question of the EEC imports was dealt with in a relatively fast-track method. In other words, it was grappled with right away, and the best answer that was obtainable was produced at that time. I think that that indicates the importance the government places on these things. I should like honourable senators to remember while on this subject, that there are two sides to this coin of agricultural restrictions. We are facing the other side in connection with hog marketing in the United States and maybe with beef sales as well, if we don't watch out. That may well be the case. Therefore, I understand the interest of members representing agricultural interests in this question of trade, but I have to tell him that we are in a very difficult, complex international situation from which there seems to be no easy exit at the present time, and my prediction is that we will continue to have problems which will tax our ingenuity to solve.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what the Leader of the Government is saying is that they have mismanaged the situation up until now and that the consequences of their mismanagement are coming down on the heads of the beef producers in this country. I think he should answer the question: Are you going to put in import rules or are you going to admit that you do not have any control of import rules—the leader is almost admitting that the government does not have that any more—or are you going to do what you promised to protect the industry against these sudden changes in the amount of supply to a limited market?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to ascribe to this government the consequences of the common agriculture policy he is welcome to do so, but everybody knows that it is nonsense. Everybody knows that this situation has not been the result of government mismanagement. This situation has to do with the world agricultural trade, and all that I am trying to point out is that we are in a very difficult situation in the world agricultural trade, and we may consider ourselves lucky if we get out of our problems as well as we have done in this instance.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT CRISIS—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF MINISTERS OF AGRICULTURE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. We now have the admission that you are in a difficult position but you do not know what to do so you have taken it out on the beef producers of Alberta.

I would like to direct the government leader's attention to the farm credit crisis and the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture of Alberta, LeRoy Fjordbotten, when he said:

—new options for farm credit should be a national priority.

He also said that in my province:

—bankruptcies have risen 17 per cent . . . 26 per cent of the 9,000 ADC loans were in arrears.

The Minister of Agriculture in that province asked for a joint meeting of agriculture ministers and that this item be placed high on the agenda.

I wonder if the leader would draw this to the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and ask him to convene an emergency meeting of his provincial counterparts with respect to the farm credit crisis.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend can attribute to me as much as he likes an inability to deal with agricultural problems world-wide, and he would be quite correct because I do not have the ability to deal with those problems. But I do know that the government will deal with those problems as they affect Canada, and, as Canada takes part in that process, it will be with wisdom, judgment and, I hope, success. I do not back down one inch from my defence of Canadian agricultural interests simply because my honourable friend wants to ascribe to me or this government responsibility for a world-wide situation.

Regarding the farm credit crisis, he ought to know that in recent days the government reduced by 1 per cent and more the rates for agricultural credit across this country insofar as the federal agricultural credit situation is concerned.

Senator Olson: The bank rate went down; everybody understands that.

Senator Roblin: That has reduced the rate of interest, and if that does not help farmers in Canada who borrow money, I do not know what will.

With respect to the request that a meeting be convened, my honourable friend can rest assured that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is fully aware of the suggestions he receives from his provincial counterparts. His custom is to respond to those suggestions in an adequate and satisfactory manner.

Senator Hastings: Will the leader assure the Senate that he will bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and ask him to call a meeting of his provincial counterparts to deal with this situation, and see that it is high on the agenda, as the Minister of Agriculture of Alberta has requested?

Would the leader also ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he would also put on that agenda the $50 million cut in agricultural programs contained in the budget?

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can rely on the present Minister of Agriculture to perform the functions of his office properly and efficiently without any prodding from me.

Senator Frith: You are not going to do that? You refuse to talk it over with your colleague?

Senator Walker: You're a bunch of soreheads. You should be ashamed of yourselves.

Senator Frith: Look who's talking!

ONTARIO

TORNADO DAMAGE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government able to tell the Senate what plans the federal government has for the relief of victims of the tornados which went through Barrie and other parts of Ontario recently?

As we are all aware, the Government of Ontario has put in place certain plans, and the funds offered by the public for relief have been centralized into what I believe is called the Central Ontario Disaster Fund. The Barrie municipal authorities have also been very active, as have the Chambers of Commerce, the Rotary Clubs and others. There has also been tremendous help from individuals and from groups such as the Mennonites, but I have not heard what the federal government is going to do to relieve these people who have suffered so greatly. I understand that 600 homes have been severely damaged, with over 200 damaged beyond repair, which has led to great distress.

I should like to know if the government has a plan, and if so, what it is.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that my honourable friend speaks from special knowledge of the situation, so I appreciate the question he has put. I must tell him that he has caught me flat-footed, because while I know that there has been a communication between the federal government and the Government of Ontario respecting the disaster, I do not know what has happened or, indeed, whether any requests were made. I will find that out for him.

THE BUDGET

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—IMPACT OF MEASURES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We have just heard questions respecting the disaster in the west and the disaster in Ontario. I should like to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the Atlantic provinces.

According to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, the Atlantic region, too, has recently suffered a disaster, but it was not an act of God; it might be called an act of Wilson or an act of Mulroney, if you wish.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Was the impact of the budget measures on the diverse regions of the country taken fully into account in the consultations and deliberations which preceded the decision to go ahead with the measures proposed in the budget, or is the leader reluctant to deal with that question on the grounds that those consultations were of a secret nature?

● (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not reluctant to deal with the question, but I have some trouble providing a satisfactory answer, because the discussions which immediately preceded the budget took place within a limited group in the government. I was not a member of that group, so I will have to take the question as notice and see whether the Minister of Finance can provide an answer for my friend.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether any "impact study"—that seems to be an "in" expression these days—has been made to ascertain what the result would be for the various regions. I assume that, if such an impact study has been made, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will inform us about it.

My next question, honourable senators, relates to the meeting of the premiers of the maritime provinces at Roseneath, Prince Edward Island. At the conclusion of that meeting, the three Atlantic premiers expressed dissatisfaction with measures in the budget. The Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Hatfield, said:

The people who come from the more populated parts of the country, and have more votes in Parliament, were listened to more than the people who come from an area like the Maritimes.

He went on to say:

But it's important to understand there is an opportunity to make another case. These things aren't final and they aren't definite.

The Premier of Nova Scotia, the Honourable John Buchanan, said that he had every hope that, in discussions with his federal colleagues in Ottawa, they would be able to achieve success in changing certain budget measures.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring these representations from the maritime premiers to the attention of his colleagues? Can he give us any assurance that the Premier of Nova Scotia is correct when he says that he has grounds for hope that they will be able to achieve success in having some of these budget measures dropped or modified?

Senator Roblin: I think that I can tell my honourable friend that the record of the present administration in dealing with the provinces is a successful one. We have been able to secure agreement on a wide number of economic questions having to do with regional economic development. We have been able to settle matters in connection with the national energy policy of the country. Generally speaking, there has been a cordial atmosphere for negotiations between the two levels of government.

When a new budget is introduced—particularly one that has to deal with the economic questions facing this country—it is only reasonable to expect that there will be a lot of people who feel themselves squeezed. We will no doubt hear more about that in the debates that will take place in this chamber before long. I find it understandable that the premiers of those provinces would be presenting their points of view. I think their principal concern has to do with transfer payments and the policy of the government in that respect.

I know that the government has stated that it will be providing the same percentage of revenue for this purpose as it has done in the past, so we know that those payments will continue to increase in the future. We also know that next year the agreements between the provinces and the federal government respecting transfer payments will be up for renegotiation. My guess, then, would be that the premiers of these provinces—who do not communicate with me and whose views I read in the newspapers, as my honourable friend has done—are probably thinking to themselves that, at the time of those negotiations on federal-provincial fiscal transfers, they will be able to make a good case for their provinces. I suspect that agreement will be reached.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, according to the Canadian Press account, the premiers came out of the meeting united in their opposition to the partial de-indexing of old age pensions as well as being concerned about the possibility of a reduction in transfer payments. I assume that this is one of the issues on which the Premier of Nova Scotia is hoping that changes can be secured. Is there any ground for that hope?

Senator Roblin: I have no licence to interpret the views of the premiers of the various provinces, and I do not intend to do so. If my honourable friend wishes to debate this proposition—as he obviously wishes to do—he can put forward his views in the course of the next few days, and I will listen to him with a great deal of interest and attention.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—PROPOSED EXPORT OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS TO CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, a few moments ago, the Leader of the Government made reference to the increasingly difficult and competitive international trade situation respecting the agriculture industry. I tend to agree with his remarks.

A few weeks ago at Geneva, together with other parliamentarians I met with leaders of the European Economic Community. If there ever was a group intent on playing hardball in the world agricultural markets, it has to be the EEC. Its leaders complained about their vast surpluses in certain commodities, including wine. They said that their wine products are not extended sufficiently free entry into Canada. They suggested, in effect, that they had enough wine to fill all of the world's swimming pools or to float all of the world's warships and merchant fleets. They went on to utter thinly-veiled threats against our beef industry and said that if Canada did not "get into line" they were going to have to take "action" in order to have more EEC beef sold in this country. We must not under-estimate these threats.

On the other hand, some of these EEC representatives admitted, however, that the devaluation of the Swedish kroner had been most unfair to Canada's lumber industry. It was admitted that this devaluation was a highly arbitrary action and that they were not proud of it. "However," they added, "when one's members have strong opinions, one is not always able to prevent economic injury to other nations."

Honourable senators, I think an argument can be made in favour of developing a Canadian counter-offensive against the looming challenge of the EEC, particularly as that challenge relates to the agriculture industry. As honourable senators know, the EEC has massive surpluses of many commodities. In fact, I am sure that honourable senators are aware that the EEC is destroying huge amounts of food. This they freely admitted to us. But they would much rather find markets for those agricultural products in Canada and other world markets.

I do not think that we should be naive about the situation which is developing. While the beef producers are sure to suffer as a result of the pressures brought to bear by the EEC against our country, this could only be the beginning. It is not appropriate for any member to level political charges or to make partisan statements under existing circumstances. The issue transcends our political differences on both the federal and provincial levels.

Perhaps the Senate should suggest a meeting of Ministers of Agriculture in an endeavour to develop a counter-offensive against what could be a serious challenge. This may well be an area of special study for the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I want to say to my honourable friend that I appreciate his proposal respecting an agriculture conference. Others have made similar suggestions, which I by no means rule out. I think we will have to adopt an effective and determined policy in connection with trade, not only with the EEC but, indeed, with the United States. We have been discussing that very subject over the last few days.

I can tell my honourable friend that the Minister for International Trade will visit Washington next week and will be emphasizing the merits of the Canadian position on the beef question as well as he is able to do. I regret that I did not mention this previously, but that was only because it slipped my mind. I know there will be a gathering next week of interested parties—the meat producers, the provincial governments and the federal government—in an endeavour to define a more hard-hitting and effective policy in defence of our agricultural export markets and to clarify our own attitude towards the importation of other kinds of agricultural products into this country. That suggestion was made to me before. I did not respond to it as positively as I should have, but my honourable friend's statement just a few moments ago brought it forcibly to my mind as a prospect. I hope that it will do some good.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that the appropriate minister will be in Washington to discuss the beef question. I wonder whether he also meant to say that the minister would be discussing the pork situation as well.

Senator Roblin: Oh, yes.

Senator Argue: That is the imminent issue. I am all for discussing the beef situation, but surely the pork producers require this intervention by a minister of the Canadian government. It is the pork producers who are under the gun at the present time. I know that all honourable senators wish the minister well. He can take it from us—if we need to say it—that he has the full support of the whole Canadian nation behind him.

• (1440)

An Hon. Senator: What about this government's influence?

Senator Argue: Well, we hope he can demonstrate he has a little influence. Apparently this government has lost whatever influence governments of this country have had with the United States on these trade negotiations, and that has been considerable. We apparently have little influence now on the ITC. We would like an indication of some increase in our influence—namely, some positive results on these questions.

Whether it is about beef or pork, or both, let me say that the minister has our full support in trying to get something accomplished.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is right in saying that pork is on the top line at the moment. The minister's visit to Washington will be concerned with discussing this issue with Administration and Congressional leaders—and the "and Congressional leaders" is important.

The provinces and Canadian industry are being invited to meet with the ministers of the government early next week to examine, on an urgent basis, the next steps in the defence of the countervail investigation and to ensure that everything is being done to open up the mid-western state markets to our live swine exporters.

I think that is the statement that members have been asking for.

Senator Argue: I would not want the minister and his advisers to have too much on their plate for the meeting in Washington, but I am wondering what consideration is being given to making very strong representations to the United States that they "cease and desist" the bogus wheat export program, which has a potential for causing very serious damage to Canada. I think the damage is already under way, and certainly the potential is very, very frightening. This is, of course, another big issue and one which I know the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware of.

Senator Roblin: I am going to take my honourable friend's advice and hope that my colleague will deal with one issue at a time.

Senator Argue: Then, I shall ask a supplementary question. Are there steps being taken today, and for the future, to make Canadian views known on the seriousness of the undertaking by the United States to provide what amounts to a certain proportion of their export wheat sales as a gift?

Senator Roblin: My colleague, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, is very conscious of this situation and is developing policy in the matter.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN PORCELAIN COMPANY—OFFER TO PURCHASE BY EMPLOYEE CO-OPERATIVE—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a question I asked on May 30 last and one which relates to the hope and the initiative of workers in Hamilton to form a co-operative for the purpose of buying out the Canadian Porcelain Company.

The Leader of the Government at that time expressed sympathy but said that he did not think that there was yet a definitive answer available. I know that the member for Hamilton East, Sheila Copps, has taken an interest in this question. It has been big news, as one would expect, in the Hamilton Spectator, and John Flanders, a correspondent in Ottawa, has certainly been instrumental in keeping this issue alive in the Hamilton area.

There was a delegation of those co-operative workers in Ottawa a few days ago, at which time they met—

Hon. David Walker: What is my friend's question? He goes on and makes orations by the hour.

You know that you can only ask a short question, and it has to be appropriate, and then you have to sit down. This isn't the time for a speech—

Senator Olson: Just like Senator Flynn used to make!

Senator Argue: I guess the rules of the Senate apply equally to all senators. I am laying the groundwork; I am painting the background. I am doing what everybody has been doing in this Senate since I came here 18 years ago. I do not expect that they are going to stop doing it because of my honourable friend's intervention now, or in the future.

Senator Walker: Don't be a smart aleck.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Argue: I am not being a smart aleck.

Senator Walker: You have no business making all of these little remarks. You should ask your question, instead of making an oration. We are sick and tired of listening to you people over there.

An Hon. Senator: If you don't like it, get out.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Argue: They don't have to be in office very long before they become really arrogant and "sick and tired" of the parliamentary process of listening to senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Well, I am not sick and tired of listening to my honourable friend. He has the right to interject. He has the right to his points of order—even if they are fallacious.

Senator Walker: This is another oration. Could we, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, have my learned friend from the west keep within the limits? He should ask his question and make it plain, as is absolutely clear in the rules.

Just do it. That is the point of order.

Senator Argue: Well, what we have just heard, honourable senators, certainly was not an oration. But I will not take it up from there. I will go back to painting the background in terms of the importance of this issue, not only to Hamilton, not only to those workers, but to Canadians all across this country in terms of the important principle at stake, namely, whether the government, in respect of something on which it can take action, will take action in the interests of Canadians.

My question is: Has the government, through FIRA or any other process it might wish to use, come down on the side of the workers' co-operative in its efforts to buy out the Canadian Porcelain Company, thus maintaining it as a Canadian company operating in Hamilton in the interests of Canadians?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In the interests of harmony in the Senate, I will make my friend a proposition, and it is that if he gives me a short question, I will give him a short answer.

The short answer to his question is that the situation has not changed: the matter is under consideration.

Senator Argue: In reading the press reports, it is clear to me that the minister in charge, Mr. Sinclair Stevens, holds out very little hope for this employee co-operative. He was questioned at length on it, and he said that while he considered it a good cause and he was in fact on the side of the employees, he didn't hold out very much hope.

Do I take it from the government leader's answer—and I am prepared to so take it—that no decision has been made; that the question is still open and those workers at least have a chance?

Senator Roblin: We will do our very best to decide this issue—which is not yet decided—on the merits of the case, and among the merits, as far as I am concerned, is the fact that this is a group of Canadian workers that has taken a very commendable initiative. Whether it is good enough in this instance, I cannot tell; but I can assure my friend that we will do our best to be fair.

Senator Argue: Well, I want to say—and I hope this will be considered rather non-partisan—that I appreciate that answer. The principle is a very important one. If the government could find it possible—and I hope it can—to come down on the side of the workers, it would be a signal to the labour movement, to the co-operative movement, and to Canadians generally, that we like small business, that we like individual enterprise, that we like personal ownership, and that we like Canadian management.

Senator Roblin: I must tell my honourable friend—

Senator Flynn: You have not always spoken that way. I remember the days when you were a member of the CCF.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend were to pay attention to the measures of the budget—which in some respects has not been well received by my honourable friend—he would find out that that is precisely what we are doing in the budget.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: We are taking the position of the labour unions in the Province of Quebec which, in difficult times, encouraged their members to get involved in their own businesses and for which they have received a special tax concession from the Government of Quebec. A tax concession of a similar nature is provided for in this budget. That deals precisely with a case such as the one in Hamilton.

In any instance where a province wishes to support, by means of tax concessions, these labour-inspired small businesses of the kind my honourable friend speaks about, we have said that we will be glad to co-operate.

Senator Argue: I have listened carefully to what the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said and, in reading between the lines, I think it only fair to come to the conclusion—because of the policy announced in the budget and as interpreted now by the government leader in the Senate—that the decision will be made in favour of the workers' co-operative. I am glad to get that encouragement, and I hope that that favourable decision is made public soon.

Senator Flynn: That is not a question either!

Senator Roblin: I do not mind encouraging my honourable friend, but the principles I enunciated previously are the ones which I am sure will prevail in the matter.

Senator Argue: So, the answer has to be "yes."

Senator Flynn: There was no question.

Senator Argue: Senator Flynn, when you were over here, you did the same thing—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Senator Argue has repeated what was said by Senator Olson a few minutes ago, that being that when I was on that side I carried on in the way that Senator Argue is—

Senator Argue: Not as effectively, but you did try.

Senator Flynn: I challenge you and Senator Olson to point to an occasion when I took more than two minutes in putting a question.

Senator Guay: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: It would have happened only on those occasions when I was interrupted by Senator Guay. On those occasions, you would have to include the time that it took to deal with Senator Guay's interjection. I challenge any one of you to prove that I took more than two minutes on a preamble to a question.

Senator Frith: That is all that Senator Argue took.

An Hon. Senator: In 1979.

Senator Argue: I shall defer to His Honour the Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators that, under rule 20B:

A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

● (1450)

Senator Frith: But—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would also refer to rule 32, which says:

A debate shall not be in order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

We have exercised a little licence this afternoon, but I thought I would point this out to the house.

Senator Walker: For the benefit of those who may not understand, what is the rule, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: Rule 32.

Senator Argue: "Brief explanatory remarks." Everything is perfectly in order.

ence of Thursday, May 2, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Neiman, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to raise both a point of order and a question of privilege, in anticipation of the motion to be presented tomorrow by Senator Frith, which reads as follows:

That, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits, it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.

I submit that the motion raises some very important procedural and constitutional questions, and that it would be appropriate for the Chair, and perhaps even the Senate, to discuss these before debating the motion. My first point is obviously the fact that it is an exclusive prerogative of the House of Commons to move a motion condemning the government. There is no doubt in my mind that this motion is the equivalent of a motion of censure. For instance, in the other place, if an amendment had been moved to the budget motion presented by the Minister of Finance using the same wording as this motion, the very fact of putting the matter before the House of Commons would have constituted a motion of censure, and if the House of Commons had voted affirmatively on the motion, the government would have been forced to resign.

So here we have the Senate censuring the government through this motion and stating that the government does not have its confidence with respect to this particular item of the budget.

My second point is that the motion invites the Senate to decide in advance on a bill that will come before the Senate in any case, in the normal sequence of events. If it does not, very well. But if it does, the Senate will have decided in advance whether it accepts the motion by Senator Frith which is opposed to the bill. It will therefore have voted against the bill before it comes before the Senate. This is very serious, and is, of course, against the rules of procedure. I may refer the Chair and honourable senators to Erskine May, page 380.

My third point is that I would like to refer you to rule 47 of the rules of the Senate, which provides that the same question may not be put twice during the same session. Clearly, if we vote on this motion, we will not be able to vote on the bill. Rule 47 is quite clear on this:

A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

So the Senate will have to make an about-face when the bill is referred to it, which is as much as to say: well, we voted and told the government that we were against the principle of the bill, but now we changed our minds and we have decided to make an about-face.

In my mind, these three points are very important. The role of the Senate is currently the subject of considerable debate. By adopting this motion, the Senate is taking on a responsibility it does not have, which is to censure the government. It is deciding in advance on a matter that will eventually be referred to it. Furthermore, it is putting itself in a position where it will have to change its stance, in view of the provisions of rule 47.

I think the problem is very serious. I do not claim to have a monopoly on the best interpretation of the problem, but I think the matter deserves to be taken into consideration by the Chair. I would invite other senators who have opinions on the matter to take the floor, either today, tomorrow or on some other occasion. But before starting the debate on this matter, I think we must be very sure we are not making a serious blunder as has happened before.

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the three branches of Senator Flynn's point of order. The motion on page vii of the Minutes of the Proceedings, reads:

That, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits,— and these are the important words.

—it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.

The motion cannot be regarded as a vote of blame or a vote of no confidence. It is a vote asking the government to do something. If Senator Flynn is correct in his point on this branch, that it is out of order for the Senate to ask the government to do something, then I will have to agree with him and his point is a serious one. If Your Honour should rule that it is out of order for the Senate to say to the government, "Government, you should do something. In fact, you should rescind that provision of the Budget." Then it is a very serious matter. Certainly, it will seriously limit the activities and powers of the Senate if it is out of order for the Senate to ask the government to do something.

The second branch deals with the propriety of the motion and whether the subject properly constitutes a motion. Rule 5(i) defines a motion. It reads:

“motion” means a proposal made by a senator—

So far I seem to be all right. I am a senator and I have made a proposal.

Senator Flynn: I will not insist on that.

Senator Frith:

—that the Senate—

So far we are all right. It is still the Senate.

—or a committee—

That is not appropriate here.

—thereof do something, order something to be done, or express an opinion concerning some matter;

It would seem to me that according to this definition I have introduced a proper motion falling strictly within our rules.

Senator Flynn's third point dealt with rule 47(1), which reads:

A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

Senator Flynn has suggested that the motion will raise a problem because of rule 47(1). As he points out, at some point it is possible or likely that a bill will come before us dealing with this exact matter. What will the motion have decided? The motion will have decided, if it is carried, that the government should be asked to rescind a provision. The only situation in which this prospective bill can come before us is one where the government has not rescinded the provision. In other words, the bill will not be a bill that raises the question of whether or not the government has rescinded a provision of the budget, but will include a provision for indexing. For example, the bill will not say, “In article iv, the government refuses to rescind a provision of the budget.” There will be nothing in the bill indicating whether the government has agreed or disagreed with an opinion expressed by the Senate.

Therefore, on the three points raised by Senator Flynn, I say, with all due respect, that his point of order fails.

Senator MacEachen: You have convinced me.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to admit that Senator Flynn has proposed what appears to me to be a conundrum, one that requires to be resolved in an appropriate manner. I agree with him that perhaps today or tomorrow when the motion comes before the Senate, if a question as to its being in order is raised, and I guess it will be—

Senator Frith: It is being raised now.

Senator Roblin: It could be raised now, yes.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: For the purposes of this intervention, I consider the motion to have been raised.

Senator Flynn: It is not a motion.

Senator Frith: I mean to say that the point of order is properly raised at this stage, even though the motion is not now before us. At least, I am prepared to consider it as having been so raised and, therefore, available for ruling tomorrow. There is no objection to its being raised today rather than tomorrow. In fact, I think it is very courteous of Senator Flynn to raise his point of order today, so that we can get on with the motion tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: I agree with Senator Flynn that the matter ought to be considered by the Speaker. I am in favour of his dealing with it at his good pleasure.

There is another nuance to this matter that needs some elucidation. That is the question of what will happen if this motion passes. If it were passed and accepted by the government it would, in effect, call for a payment from revenue because it would increase government expenditures. There is no reason why we cannot find proper wording to deal with resolutions calling on the government to spend money. There is a formula available to private members or anybody who wants to propose something that calls for the expenditure of government funds, without contravening the rule that only the government can produce a royal warrant. I am not sure that this resolution is properly worded to accommodate that important technicality. When the Speaker considers this matter, I think he ought to regard also the question of the financial implications of the motion as such, that it would require a different wording in order to be acceptable from a parliamentary point of view.

What is bothering me—and I confess that I am not persuaded by the argument put forth by Senator Frith—is whether or not the question of anticipation is sufficiently important to require us to reconsider this motion. I think that the question of confidence is an important one that ought to be looked into, but I am particularly interested in the problems involved in the question of anticipation. If we make a decision on this matter which favours the resolution, then in all likelihood we can expect to have the same subject introduced at a later date when a bill comes before us. The apparent conflict can be avoided if we content ourselves with having a debate on the bill. However, if we decide to go ahead with the debate at the present time, we must consider the circumstances that could arise should we approve this motion and then find ourselves confronted with a bill which contains the same subject matter.

It is perfectly true that there is a way out. Two thirds of the members present with five days' notice can rescind the previous motion, but that reflects, perhaps, indifferently on the Senate. One could perhaps justify it, but I certainly would not like to propose it because it would indicate a certain capacity on our part to swallow our opinions, which none of us is very keen to do. I agree with Senator Flynn—and I take it that Senator Frith is of the same view—that the matter should be placed before the Speaker and he should be asked to give a ruling on it. It seems to me that it is a matter of some considerable importance. The rule of anticipation has been brought into the Parliamentary system for good and sufficient reason. Unlike any other legislative chamber that I know of, we have a way out if we want to rescind a motion. I am not sure that other parliaments do have that privilege. However, I do not put that forward as a fact. I just give it as an impression that I have at the present time. I should be happy indeed if the Speaker were to give some consideration to the points raised and render his decision.

● (1510)

I do not usually do what I am about to do, but this time I intend to. We have a distinguished parliamentarian in our midst in the person of the Leader of the Opposition who, in his capacity in the other place, established quite a reputation as a parliamentarian. While I do not say that I will commit myself in an act of faith to agreeing to whatever he might have to say on this matter, I am sure it would be of interest to the members and to you, Your Honour, if Honourable Senator MacEachen had an observation to make on the issues involved.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just before Senator MacEachen responds to that invitation, I want to deal simply with the fourth point raised by Senator Roblin. That is the question of whether this is, in fact, in the nature of a money bill or engages the problem of funds, of raising funds and Governor General's warrants. I simply want to say that I do not think it does, but I agree that it should be a part of the point of order that has been raised.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have not spoken on a point of order for quite some time, and certainly not in the Senate. Therefore I am a bit rusty in this area, but I did reflect upon the point made by Senator Flynn yesterday when Senator Frith was considering putting forward his motion.

It is true that the House of Commons and, I presume, the Senate cannot be asked to contradict itself on the same proposition in the same session. I think that is the rule, and it is a particularly relevant rule if the two contradictory propositions appear on the order paper at the same time. In that event, you have a real dilemma.

I would argue, Your Honour and honourable senators, that one must take a procedural attitude, and if you take a procedural attitude on the matter at hand, you must agree that this is a distinct proposition before the Senate, asking the Senate to express its view on a government action. In other words, the Senate is being asked to express a view that the government should rescind now a particular budgetary provision. That is a distinct proposition, and I will return to that in a moment.

A bill may come forward containing a provision to eliminate full indexing on pension benefits. However, if it does come forward, I am sure it will be cast in a form that raises a proposition that is distinct and separate from the one that is raised here. It is obviously the same subject matter; no question about it. However, we can take a look at the ways and means resolutions, which must be available, and they certainly will not be talking about rescinding a particular budget resolution, which is a general proposition, distinct on its own. The bill, if it ever comes, will be a specific alteration in the rules of indexation.

When first I turned my mind to this subject, I said to myself: "Of course, they are on the same subject but they will be distinct propositions, different one from the other so that one could reasonably and intelligently, if one wished, vote for one and treat the other one separately." I think, in reality, it is quite different for the Senate to ask the government—and this is all it would do if this were passed—"Please reconsider your budget provisions."

Senator Flynn: You said "rescind."

Senator MacEachen: Of course, if they are the government, the Senate expresses an opinion. In this motion, if adopted, the Senate would express an opinion that the government should rescind this particular provision.

But what is the next step? The next step is that nothing will happen unless the government accepts this motion. It has no effect. If this motion should pass, the effect would be that the government has the opinion of the Senate and it says either "yes" or "no".

Senator Flynn: And the Senate would not be bound by it.

Senator MacEachen: I say to you, don't say that there is a question of confidence; don't say that there is a condemnation of the government. There is not.

Senator Flynn: Is there, then, praise for the government?

Senator MacEachen: It is far from praise. I must say that it is not fulsome praise, as I am sure the Prime Minister would like.

Senator Frith: And feeds on.

Senator MacEachen: I take the view, as Senator Frith has argued, that the Senate is asked to express an opinion on a matter over which the government has full authority, and will continue to have full authority because, if this motion were carried, not a dime would spring forward in support of the old age pensioners. Therefore, it has no financial effect. Pass it, and it has no financial effect unless the government says, "Yes, we agree with the Senate. The Senate is a very sound body; it is wise and it has reflected and now we agree with it."

I would like to refer now to the rule of anticipation. I do not think that you can raise the rule of anticipation here because, if I remember correctly, in order to raise that rule you must have the two propositions on the order paper; you cannot have one in the distant horizon. We do not know—

Senator Flynn: Why do you say that? Do you not anticipate that it will come to us?

Senator MacEachen: Quite frankly, this is the point I want to make: I do not expect it to come to the Senate. I do not expect this provision ever to reach the Senate. I say that the Prime Minister and the cabinet will buckle under to the national protest and no one will be able to argue the rule of anticipation. Take it from me, honourable senators: Do not get into a state of deep anxiety about the rule of anticipation, because if you do, you will be anticipating for a very long time.

Senator Flynn: I would simply add that the last argument of the Leader of the Opposition is the most convincing one that I could have put forward to show that there is anticipation. He said it will not come, but with that motion, we have to anticipate that it will come. If the Senate approves that motion, it will have said: "It is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the budget immediately."

The bill then comes to us; exactly the same question is involved. There is no doubt about that; not for a moment.

Senator MacEachen: Not at all.

Senator Frith: Not at all.

Senator Flynn: Therefore rule 47 will apply and unless you oppose a proper interpretation—and that has happened on previous occasions—you must first move that the Senate reverse its opinion. In order to do that, two-thirds of the senators will have to say: "We will consider the bill notwithstanding." Otherwise, the Senate will have said: "We are against the bill."

• (1520)

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator Frith: The government refused to rescind and they just did not take our advice.

Senator Flynn: Then will you swallow your opinion that the government should have done that?

Senator Frith: In that this should have been rescinded, but that does not affect what you are saying. There is nothing to swallow.

Senator Flynn: You will say that the government has convinced us that it did not have to rescind.

Senator Frith: There is nothing to swallow.

Senator Flynn: Then you are going to vote against the bill twice.

Senator Argue: Don't anticipate.

Senator Frith: It is a house of cards.

Senator Flynn: How can you not anticipate something which you put there. Where did you get that?

Senator Frith: That is a motion.

Senator Flynn: You got it in the ways and means provision. The Leader of the Opposition was mentioning that. Did you read it somewhere? If it is before Parliament, it may not be here.

Senator MacEachen: Would Senator Flynn permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator MacEachen: Is it not a fact, from a procedural point of view, that the rule of anticipation can only be invoked in the case of items on the order paper? We cannot invoke it with respect to possibilities.

Senator Flynn: It is before Parliament in any event.

Senator MacEachen: It has to be invoked with respect to items that are before the legislative body.

Senator Flynn: Yes. It is before Parliament.

Senator MacEachen: But it is not before the Senate. We do not have any item relating to this provision.

Senator Flynn: Okay.

Senator MacEachen: I would argue from a procedural point of view, and this is a procedural argument—

Senator Flynn: You had better stick strictly to procedure. If you plead only on the strict rule, of course, that applies, but you have to look at the substance of the matter. You would have said something, and then the question will again be put to you and you will say that we have not said anything. You will say, "We have said that, but it does not mean a thing." The substance will already have been decided. The rule of anticipation may very well be interpreted when you have something on the order paper—

Senator Frith: It is not the same substance. That is the point.

Senator Flynn: You know that you are deciding in advance. Let us say, for instance, that you moved a specific motion which said "We are of the opinion that Bill C-31, the Indian Act, should be abandoned by the government." We have not received that bill yet but it will be before us either today or tomorrow. You would vote on a motion like that. Bill C-31 would be before you at a later time and what position would you then be in? I understand Senator Frith's problem because on previous occasions when he wanted to discuss the budget he called the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the budget, and that is normal. There is nothing wrong with drawing the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the budget presented by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on such a date, and more specifically to the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits. If he had done that, it would be in order. He wanted to go a little further and by doing that he is going against the rule of no anticipation in substance and going against rule 47 in practice. That rule 47 will necessarily come into play when the bill reaches us. If it does not come before us, that is another matter, but can you put yourself in the position of being forced to swallow your words? You have done that on previous occasions, but you have done it in a more subtle way than you would have to do it in the present circumstances.

Senator Frith: Watch out for glass houses.

Senator Flynn: I suggest to His Honour that if he consults Beauchesne or any other authority he will never find the equivalent of a motion of that kind which, in my opinion, is a motion of no confidence but this also brings forth clearly the problem of deciding in anticipation.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments on this point of order. When Senator Frith's motion was first brought to my attention I thought that it solved one of the dilemmas that we have in the opposition when we are, in effect, in control of the house. We have two things to decide: Do we approve or disapprove of a particular legislative measure? Secondly, even if we disapprove of it, should we vote against it?

We solved one of the problems at the committee stage many years ago by studying the subject matter of bills. The committee brings in a report and they often recommend to the government amendments to those bills with the hope that the government will propose these amendments to the House of Commons committee or later in that house. The Senate committee in pre-studying and making recommendations as to amendments is doing exactly what is proposed in this motion by Senator Frith. Sometimes the government accepts those recommendations; sometimes they do not. When the actual bill returns to the committee without suggested amendments being approved by the House of Commons, the committee has no problem. The government having rejected a recommendation for amendments, the committee usually has no problem approving the bill without the suggested amendments.

I should also like to draw to the attention of this chamber that it was through an initiative of Senator Bosa in 1979 that rule 49 as to voting was amended. He proposed that honourable senators should be able to abstain from voting without having to give reasons. It took many years before Senator Bosa's suggestion prevailed, but his recommendation is now part of the Rules of the Senate. What this motion permits us to do is to state our opinion if we do not approve of a particular piece of legislation. When it comes before us, then the opposition does not have to vote for or against it but can simply abstain, having already given their opinion of it in the same way that committees do when they pre-study a bill.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I think the motion is clearly in order. Our rules are based on Beauchesne and Bourinot. I think this motion is comparable to a private member's motion—

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Senator Argue: —in the House of Commons. I was present when Stanley Knowles moved a motion that universal old age pensions should be instituted. Soon afterwards the government decided not to agree to that motion. However, a motion such as that is able to pass with a majority vote in the House of Commons, that is, a motion which says that "in the opinion of the House of Commons—" Then the government in exercising its authority presents its policies to the House of Commons and then they ascertain whether or not they have the majority to carry those various bills through Parliament. This example, of course, is in that very category. The words used in the House of Commons are usually, "in the opinion of." In this motion the wording is "in view of," and in order to make it doubly effective the words "in view of" appear twice. Therefore, it would be the view of the Senate. If Your Honour should rule that the Senate does not have this authority, I believe that that would be an improper interpretation. It would mean that we are endeavouring to tie our own hands and that we cannot express an opinion in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: If you say so.

Senator Argue: I take it that the mood in the House of Commons is that private members should have more authority and more scope and that there is a move in that direction. There may well be a new definition of want of confidence. The trend in the House of Commons is to broaden the authority or the scope of private members. It would be foolish to tie the hands of senators. This is a statement of opinion. The government will bring in whatever bill it wishes, and the Senate will deal with that bill at that time. This particular motion is clearly 100 per cent in order.

Senator Flynn: If you say so.

Senator Argue: You can say the opposite.

Senator Flynn: I never used the term "100 per cent".

Senator Argue: If you think your argument was weaker, that is fine. If you are only 49 per cent certain, that is fine.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I want to deal with the question of anticipation. I do not believe that anyone thinks the Senate is capable of voting a motion of confidence. Regardless of how we put the proposition to the Senate, if it carried it would not result in a vote of confidence.

Senator Flynn: Who said that?

Senator Stewart: Similarly, there is no question of a royal recommendation.

Senator Flynn: I didn't say there was.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Roblin did.

Senator Stewart: I say that because if this motion were to carry and if the government were to act on the basis of the recommendation of the Senate, the outflow from the Consolidated Revenue Fund would be no less and no greater than it is now under the prevailing law.

But the question of anticipation is a more important one. In fact, I think, honourable senators, that the anticipation that is relevant is the anticipation that we hear from Senator Flynn. He is anticipating the outcome of the debate.

This is a procedural matter; it is a procedural question, and it has to be strictly dealt with as a procedural question. Honourable senators, the Speaker cannot anticipate the outcome on the substance when dealing with a procedural question.

Senator Flynn: Nor can you!

Senator Stewart: I am not. It may be that this motion will be defeated, or it may carry. If it carries, the government may or may not heed us. That is a matter of conjecture, mere guess. Perhaps Senator Flynn has his crystal ball with him today, I do not, but that is mere conjecture and not relevant to the procedural question now before the Senate. So, it is Senator Flynn who is engaging in gratuitous anticipation.

The motion is in order because there is nothing on our order paper that takes precedence over it. To guess that the eventual outcome of the debate will be such as to raise difficulties later, is simply to guess, and that is irrelevant on a procedural matter.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I must elaborate on the argument put forth by my honourable colleague opposite. The first thing I should like to say, however, is that I do not think anyone in the Senate thinks that we are engaged in an exercise to limit discussion in the Senate, or to prevent any issue, no matter what it is, to be proposed in this house for debate and consideration. We are considering whether this is the best way to develop the arguments in the light of the rules of the Senate in respect of this issue.

I think that if an Inquiry had been submitted, as was suggested by Senator Flynn, it would certainly have cleared up any difficulty. We would have debated that Inquiry. I suspect that one way or another we will debate this resolution. If not, no doubt we will debate a slightly altered one, and I welcome that debate. So, I want to make it quite clear that this is not an attempt to frustrate the Senate.

On the next point, namely the question of anticipation, what Senator Stewart overlooks is that we can anticipate an answer to this proposition. In fact, there are two answers, "Yes" or "No." If he refers to rule 47, he will see that it is clear that that rule does not anticipate a "Yes" answer or a "No" answer, but it anticipates either. If either "Yes" or "No" is recorded in respect of this matter, that prevents the same subject from being discussed again.

Senator Stewart: No, it does not.

Senator Roblin: I think it does.

Senator Argue: Why not read the rule.

Senator Roblin: I am expressing an opinion. I am simply saying that this is one of the things the Speaker can take a look at. If my interpretation is wrong, I will stand corrected; I have no pride of authorship in the matter.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that the question of anticipation is valid and is one of the things that the Speaker has to rule on.

There may be other honourable senators who wish to speak on this matter. I must confess that I have no further advice to give the Speaker on the subject. I only wish him well in arriving at his decision.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, in a sense I want to appreciate the comment made by Senator Flynn, which was that from a strictly procedural point of view, the rule of anticipation does not arise. If one looks at Beauchesne, one will be convinced that in order for the rule of anticipation to apply from a procedural point of view there has to be a proceeding on the order paper. I think we can agree that there is no other proceeding on the order paper other than the one which we are now discussing. In procedural matters, the technical points win the day.

Senator Flynn: Not necessarily. If the substance is raised, you have to decide on the substance.

Senator MacEachen: In order for the substance to be raised there would have to be a further proceeding, and we know what a proceeding is in a legislative assembly. A proceeding begins with a motion. When Beauchesne uses the word "proceeding", it has a distinct meaning. A proceeding begins with a motion, continues with a debate, and then there is a conclusion. That is the end of the proceeding, but we are talking about procedure.

The second point I wish to make is that it is a practical point, and I think it is conclusive that it is a practical point. Having made that point, I am now, in a sense, engaging in the practice of anticipation. It has been forced upon me irregularly; procedurally, I cannot even think about that proceeding because it is not before the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Read rule 47.

Senator MacEachen: When I look at this particular motion I say: If I anticipated a future ways and means resolution of the government giving effect to the elimination of full indexation, then this proposition is different from that future possible proposition. Then I say: "Why do I know that?" Because it is a different proposition. It is different because the effects are totally different. If I voted in support of that motion, I think honourable senators would agree that it would be an expression of opinion which would have no financial effect in itself. The pensioners would not be affected one way or another. It would only have effect if a further action were to take place, namely, that the government accepted, in a sense, the view of the Senate. But that would be dependent upon another action that is not contained in this motion.

So, my vote in support of this motion, if I voted that way—and I would—would have no effect if the motion were carried, unless the government did something.

Senator Flynn: Okay.

Senator MacEachen: So, we agree with that. Let us anticipate irregularly the ways and means motion that will be before the Senate at some future time removing the full indexation of old age pension benefits. If the majority voted against that, then, of course, something would happen—something would very much happen: The effect would be profound, and that would not depend upon another action. The action taken and that vote would be, in a sense, self-contained and conclusive.

• (1540)

I say that the propositions are quite different. At any rate, I did not intend to get into this debate.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator MacEachen: I thought that I had said farewell to Beauchesne a long time ago.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, His Honour is faced with a serious dilemma and with some contradictions, if I may say so, on two points. The first of those points is the matter of anticipation, and the second is the initiation of an action by any honourable senator which could upset the balance of ways and means or, indeed, the fiscal position of the government.

I will deal with this, as Senator MacEachen has suggested, by addressing the point of procedure which is involved. With respect to anticipation, one of the things that we have to accept is that we are acting within a bicameral system. While it may not be on the order paper of the Senate at the moment, we know that any proposal must pass through this chamber as well as the other place in order to become law, although matters dealing with the balance of ways and means must be initiated in the other place and only by a member who has the right to bring in a royal recommendation. That, of course, is a problem here.

When the government introduces a budget, past practices would indicate that a bill dealing with that subject matter is going to come to this chamber and we will be expected to deal with it. When His Honour considers rule 47, if we have already dealt with the subject matter—either positively or negatively—he will have to consider whether it can be placed on the order paper again, having come from the other house. There is no provision that I know of, in Beauchesne, Erskine May or anywhere else, that distinguishes the source of a motion. The rule states that a matter cannot be placed on the order paper when it has already been dealt with—nothing other than that.

The other matter that His Honour will have to consider, and consider very carefully, is that of the balance of ways and means. Are we expressing ourselves on the matter of the removal of full indexation? That is the question. Is that to be the substance of this motion? If so, another question arises: Is it in order to move a motion that upsets or changes the balance of ways and means? His Honour will have to take that into account.

Of course, honourable senators and the members of the other place, excepting those who can bring in a royal recommendation, have no right to move such a motion. There is a number of things which His Honour will have to consider very carefully. I simply wanted to draw them to his attention, because it is important that we bear in mind tradition. We must remember the reason why certain prohibitions were written into the rules of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, with regard to anticipation, I simply want to say that the principle is contained in rule 47. Whether a matter is placed on the order paper or not, it makes no difference. If we decide now, that will have the effect of not allowing us to decide otherwise later on, unless we rescind under rule 47. Even if Senator Argue is 100 per cent certain that he is right, I will say that my memory of his interventions on the rules in the other place were not that convincing—no more convincing than those he expressed here. I remember, on one occasion, I was in favour of the filibustering of the divorce bills by two of his colleagues. He may have forgotten that, but I have not forgotten him.

Senator Argue: I wanted to forget it, but that is all right.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak on the point of order, I shall take it under advisement.

INVESTMENT CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-15, respecting investment in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, before I launch into a fairly brief discussion of Bill C-15, I must comment on how very interesting this afternoon has been. I have stated on two previous occasions how much I feared finding myself speaking after the best orators in the chamber had had their say, and that has happened again today. I cannot promise to maintain that level of oratory. I will, however, do my best.

Bill C-15, the Investment Canada bill, replaces the Foreign Investment Review Act which came into force in 1974. It is my belief that this bill provides a progressive investment policy for this country, and I believe it to be a most appropriate course of action for our government to take at this time.

It is not my intention to deal with this bill in detail, but, rather, to discuss the message it is intended to convey. By encouraging and facilitating investment by Canadians and non-Canadians alike, the Investment Canada bill is intended to draw financial and technological resources to this country—resources we need to develop and expand our industry base and to generate employment for the future. Honourable senators, in my opinion, any action that this government takes now must, above all, take into account the 1.5 million Canadians who are currently out of work. I believe that it is almost time for the government to give the private sector its due—to create a freer and more hospitable climate in which business can operate. I believe that it is time to remove needless government restrictions from the marketplace and that Bill C-15 moves in this direction.

Honourable senators, the Foreign Investment Review Act, 1974 was designed to meet the concern expressed in the early 1970s about the level of foreign control over our economy and, therefore, was framed in a manner designed to slow down foreign investment—if not, indeed, to discourage it. In 1971, approximately 37 per cent of non-financial industries in Canada were under foreign control. By 1981, this figure had dropped to 26 per cent, and the decline in foreign control has been registered in all major sectors of the economy. The point, honourable senators, is that foreign control of business in this country has dropped significantly.

I believe that Canadians today are far less concerned about foreign participation in our economy than they are about the unemployment of 1.5 million people, the need to keep up with rapidly changing technology and the need to expand our industrial base. To meet these new concerns, we must change course, and I believe that the Investment Canada bill sets that new course.

● (1550)

Under this new legislation, Investment Canada, the agency which will replace FIRA, will have a positive pro business, pro investment mandate. It will provide a range of important information and investment services to entrepreneurs, Canadian and non-Canadian. At the same time, Bill C-15 contains appropriate and reasonable safeguards for screening investment proposals, with minimum delay.

Honourable senators, Investment Canada is intended to help us promote this country. We want the world to see us as more than an important source of natural resources. We have a great deal more to contribute—our industrial capability, our banking system, our transportation and communications infrastructure, and, of course, our people.

We also need to remind ourselves how important the rest of the world is to us. Canadian jobs depend upon trade. Approximately 30 per cent of the goods and services that we produce are exported. We cannot expect to maintain and expand our share of world markets if we antagonize our friends by restricting their access to our market through trade or investment policies. We must broaden our economic horizons, and it is hoped that Investment Canada can help us accomplish this.

Bill C-15 sends a positive signal to Canada and to the world. It says that Canada welcomes investment. It says, as the Prime Minister said last December: "Canada is open for business."

This legislation will help us keep alive the good business relationships we already have, as well as those we wish to establish with other countries around the world. In a larger sense, I believe that the Investment Canada bill is totally consistent with the general commitment of the Mulroney government to the principle of working together.

Let me speak briefly of some of the other ways by which this commitment by the government is being implemented. Long-standing energy disputes have been worked out with Newfoundland and with the oil-producing western provinces.

The government has launched a major joint effort with the provinces to resolve other outstanding economic issues, in an attempt to get the Canadian economy moving again.

The government is determined to unite all Canadians in spirit and in purpose. Likewise, it is determined to improve Canada's relationships and Canada's image with other countries, particularly with the United States.

At the so-called Shamrock Summit last March in Quebec City, President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney agreed to explore new ways of reducing or eliminating tariff and non-tariff barriers to trade between the U.S. and Canada.

At the Bonn Summit the Prime Minister stressed that the government's focus would be on promoting investment and creating jobs in the private sector, on removing obstacles to non-inflationary growth, on reducing the deficit and restraining government expenditures.

[Senator Kelly]

These are positive statements and encouraging signals, in my opinion. They represent a new momentum, a new economic consensus.

Honourable senators, the Investment Canada bill is a key element in that new momentum.

Honourable senators, I do not need to remind this chamber of the extensive examination of this bill that was carried out in the other place. They did take a good deal of time and it received a good deal of attention. More important, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce conducted a pre-study of Bill C-15 and reported thereon in this chamber on May 2 last. I recall the date clearly because it coincided with an event which left me somewhat wounded, namely, the provincial election in the province of Ontario, where the lights certainly turned down—though not for long, we hope.

Senator Doody: The tide is out temporarily.

Senator Kelly: Keeping both of these things in mind—the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and the fragile state of my morale—and particularly bearing in mind the fact that the committee made only modest recommendations having to do with four clauses of the bill, I would hope we could count on speedy passage of this bill.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

SUPPLEMENTARY FISCAL EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-39

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-39, intituled: "An Act to provide for the making of supplementary fiscal equalization payments to certain provinces for the period April 1, 1982 to March 31, 1987", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I support this motion.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-26

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Likewise, honourable senators, I support the motion.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-25

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-25, intituled: "An Act to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Ditto, honourable senators. Again, I support the motion.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILLS C-27, C-41, C-44, C-24, AND C-36

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am wondering whether it would be in order for me to suggest that Orders Nos. 7 through 11, all standing in my name, be dealt with en bloc. We support all of those motions for pre-study, and I am wondering whether the record can simply show that there is that support, thereby eliminating the necessity of going through them individually.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Perhaps His Honour could put the question in respect of those motions en bloc.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, perhaps I could make an observation to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate before the Speaker proceeds to follow that suggestion.

In the light of the subject matters of these bills, I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to take into account the consideration that the Rules Committee recently gave to the need to advise the provinces in respect of bills that might affect them directly. In that regard, the committee adopted a new procedure, that being that the provinces shall be so advised. While it is not in our rules, it is a practice that we have accepted in principle.

Certainly the government of my province would be interested in at least considering whether or not it might want to make representations in respect of at least two of these bills.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have absolutely no hesitation in agreeing to do that. I shall have the appropriate notice sent to the committee chairmen. I have no doubt that this is something that they would be doing of their own accord in any event. I shall certainly get a notice out to them reminding them of the recent adoption of that practice.

Senator Frith: Perhaps the Speaker could simply ask whether Orders 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 shall carry.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motions agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF FIFTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates 1985-86), presented in the Senate on 30th May, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Doody.)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Stand.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, would it be in order for me to say a few words on this order?

Senator Doody: By all means.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for having dealt with this topic of the federal financing of post-secondary education. I thought the report was excellent. I should like to tell the committee members that I have already sent copies of the report to various people in our government in British Columbia, and also to people overseas who I thought would be interested in reading it. I thought one of the interesting aspects of this well-presented report was that it does not try to find all the answers to this difficult problem, but rather that it asks significant questions that might otherwise be overlooked. Our country is so diverse, and each part of our country has something coming from its educational system that adds to our total overall wealth. This is so important to our integrity as a country, where the whole is certainly greater than the sum of its individual parts. That point was brought out extremely well.

Reflecting on the importance of questions as much as answers to questions made me think of the former President of the United States, John F. Kennedy, who had to do a lot of travelling with his aides. Honourable senators may have heard this before, but I think it is interesting. There were games they used to play while travelling, and one was to say: "Here is the answer. Now you tell me what the question is." An example was "The answer is nine W. What is the question?"

Senator Frith: I know that.

Senator Bell: Senator Frith says he knows.

Senator Frith: "Do you spell your name with a V, Mr. Wagner?"

Senator Bell: Beautiful. I should like to congratulate the committee, and I look forward to the next step in helping increase the development of post-secondary education in this country.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF SIXTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

On the order:

Consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (A) 1985-86), presented in the Senate on June 11, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly, but I do think it is important, on the committee's report tabled yesterday, that is Tuesday, June 11, in the Senate, following consideration of supplementary estimates (A).

Usually, at the end of the committee's consideration of supplementary estimates, the chairman asks the committee's permission to submit its report.

At their meeting on May 30, committee members expressed the desire to meet again on June 10, which would leave enough time to report on the supplementary estimates before the appropriations bill is referred to the Senate. Unfortunately, some of the witnesses the committee wished to hear were not available for that date. In order to observe the committee's terms of reference, I have presented the preliminary report on the supplementary estimates. We are in fact continuing our common practice which makes it possible for the committee to maintain its order of reference and hear other witnesses.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is still meeting on the supplementary estimates, and that this particular report is an interim report, as Senator Leblanc has said. I know that the subject matter at tomorrow's meeting of the committee will deal with international financial institutions. I expressed the wish, as Senator Flynn recalls, to hear certain witnesses at this meeting. Unfortunately, the witnesses I requested to hear are not available. The witnesses who will appear tomorrow, although eminent and qualified in many respects, are not the witnesses I had in mind. I do not know how to cope with that. However, I make the point so that if I am not as enthusiastic as I might otherwise be, members of the committee will understand why.

That is not why I rose to make some comments on the sixth report, which has been presented by the chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance. The report, in one of its aspects, deals with the infusion of funds into de Havilland Aircraft of Canada. If honourable senators look at the report, it will be revealed to them that there is to be a $110 million investment in equity to de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, and, as the report points out, that comes on top of a similar investment of $150 million to the same company only months earlier under supplementary estimates (C) of 1984-85. Let us be quite clear. Parliament is being asked to provide an additional $110 million to de Havilland Aircraft of Canada on top of, as the committee report states, a preceding $150 million to the same company only months earlier.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): And all the rest before that.

Senator MacEachen: And all the rest before that. I have a reason for talking about de Havilland, as I hope will become clear later.

The Senate report is not enthusiastic about this particular additional infusion of cash into de Havilland. Honourable senators learned, as the report says, that the equity route was being used because the issuing of loans was unsuitable, because they would likely never be repaid.

Senator Roblin: That is right.

Senator MacEachen: This perturbed committee members, and led them to wonder why de Havilland was being kept afloat. The committee goes on to express its surprise that, in spite of this precarious financial condition, de Havilland had purchased a company in the United Kingdom. I must say that I do not intend to oppose the infusion of $260 million into de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, located in the city of Toronto, even though it is not, in the view of the committee, a real winner. In fact, it is precarious and unstable.

Senator Barootes: Like heavy water plants.

Senator MacEachen: Exactly, like heavy water plants. Thank you for the lead-in.

Senator Frith: Are you guys working together?

Senator MacEachen: I attended a meeting on the weekend—

Senator Flynn: We read about it.

Senator MacEachen: —in communities that are now facing almost an economic catastrophe because the government has decided to close out these two heavy water plants. The Honourable Senator Barootes has said, "like the heavy water plants." I agree with, "like the heavy water plants." But de Havilland is not being closed. de Havilland is being kept afloat, as the committee report says, by the infusion of $250 million. Why is not the same treatment possible for these two plants in the province of Nova Scotia on the Island of Cape Breton, where there is the highest unemployment rate in all of Canada, barring Newfoundland.

● (1610)

Senator Doody: A great distinction!

Senator MacEachen: I said at that meeting that it is a difficult decision for the Government of Canada, and it was a difficult decision when the former government resisted and refused the recommendation several years ago of the Board of Directors of AECL to close out those plants. I resisted the closing of those plants, and I would like to tell honourable senators why, and why I felt it was essential that these plants remain open. The reason is really very easy to understand. The closure of those plants would mean a virtual economic catastrophe for the communities in which the plants are located. In Port Hawkesbury on Friday the President of the local Chamber of Commerce said to us that the closing of these plants could, in his words, demolish the fragile economy of Port Hawkesbury and, to use his words again, that 330 families would be forced to leave that community. We heard testimony from the workers at AECL to the effect that they were at their wits end and that no plans were in place to look after the additional unemployment, additional displacement and additional suffering that will result in those communities. Glace Bay, an area that is familiar to Senator Muir, has a very high unemployment rate. And the people there have almost a despairing attitude as a result of this decision, and the same adverse economic impact will be felt. It is for those reasons that I opposed the closing of these plants and succeeded in persuading my colleagues to keep them open.

Not only did I believe that the distress would be profound but I believed there was a possibility that this commodity, which is now in storage, would be marketable. There is no doubt that there is a big inventory of heavy water. But despite a very difficult start, these plants are now good producers. They have a good labour force which is highly skilled and highly trained. No one complains about the labour force or the productivity of the plants. What is lacking is a market for the heavy water and, as a result, it has accumulated. I have always said that there will be a market for the heavy water, that we ought to be patient and that we ought not to permit this distress to happen because the day will arrive when that market will be available and the inventory will clear. I said to the people present in Port Hawkesbury that they will not have to live for very long before that inventory will be cleared, and that when additional new production of heavy water is required it will not come from Nova Scotia but from Ontario.

That is the plan of Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. When they close the plants and when they ultimately clear the inventory, future requirements will be met from the facilities in the province of Ontario. This is not only a question of the closing of two plants; it is a question of the removal of a facility from the province of Nova Scotia to the province of Ontario. I cannot understand why enough vision or enough sympathy was not shown to permit the continued operation of these plants. Yesterday, the Leader of the Government tabled the corporate plan summary for Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. Under the portion outlining their long-term strategy, Atomic Energy of Canada, after a justified tribute to the accomplishments of the nuclear industry in Canada and in light of its future possibilities, talks about its strategy over the long-term perspective. That strategy is focused on its internationally recognized and diversified technological base in nuclear and related sciences. Then in the next sentence the corporate plan says:

The company's key "product" to date and in the future is the CANDU system and its support technology. The further development and evolution of this technological base will provide the essential competitive depth required to keep CANDU in the forefront—

I repeat, "in the forefront" —of a resurgent and power reactor market and will generate commercial spinoffs which will result in new marketable products in the future.

Atomic Energy of Canada says in its corporate plan that there is a resurgent power reactor market. It will take only three or four reactors to clear that inventory in Cape Breton, and I have enough confidence in Candu to believe that those sales will be made.

Just as we were meeting in Cape Breton, the President of AECL was saying that we are pretty close to making a sale to Turkey. I do not know whether he has one now. I think there is a reasonable case, knowing that it is a difficult decision and knowing that the purely economic commercial consideration would recommend a decision to close, for keeping these plants open. The Senate thought that the commercial economic consideration would be to deny de Havilland $250 million. Why was the same commercial economic test that was applied to Cape Breton and the heavy water plants there not applied to de Havilland? Is there a double standard in Canada? Is there one rule for Ontario and another for beleaguered Cape Breton?

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator MacEachen: I am not pushing, because there is nothing solvent about de Havilland, and we are being asked to put another additional $110 million into the plant. As I said, I am not against the aircraft industry or maintaining employment in central Canada, but I do become quite angry at the situation that we face at this particular time.

Atomic Energy of Canada tabled a corporate plan through the minister. What does the corporate plan say under "Corporate Plan Highlights"? The first item in their corporate plan highlights is closure of heavy water plants. Well, it may be a corporate plan but it is one without a heart. There is not a word about the workers. The workers were not told until the night of the budget what their destiny was to be. There has been absolutely no consultation with the communities as to how they will cope. No thought has been given to the educational system; the hospital system; the housing market. There was absolutely no consultation beforehand and no impact study done of the effect of these closures on the communities.

• (1620)

There is little wonder that this particular item attracted my attention: "de Havilland, Toronto—$260 million." When I talked to my cabinet colleagues, I made the arguments about the distress; I made the arguments about the fact that this market will change, because I remember, honourable senators, when the prevailing wisdom was that the coal mines in Cape Breton should be closed. In fact, there was a bill brought before the cabinet of Canada, when Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister, setting up the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The proposal from the economic ministers at that time was to wind down all of these coal mines and to prohibit the corporation from opening any new mines. If that had happened, we would not have anything in Cape Breton today. But thank God, Mr. Pearson agreed with my pleadings—and they were pleadings—and he said: "At least we will give that corporation the opportunity to open new mines if the board of directors wishes to open new mines." If these new mines had not been opened, the 3,000 men now employed in the Cape Breton coal mines would not be there.

Therefore I do not accept the conventional wisdom every time, because if we had accepted the conventional wisdom about the coal industry, we would not have it today. And the conventional wisdom of the board of directors of the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is "Close the plants because there is no immediate market. But we have a plan that, when the markets builds up we will produce the heavy water in Ontario." That is the plan.

I am told that some months ago, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told the community that the plants would not be closed unless there were alternative employment opportunities, and the people believed it. People still believe ministers.

Senator Frith: Not for long.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps it is a big mistake, but they still believe ministers. They believed that, and they were very disappointed that the plants were closed with nothing else in place; no development plan other than a remodelled 50 per cent tax credit which the Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion feels will lead Cape Breton on the road to economic recovery.

[Senator MacEachen.]

That 50 per cent tax credit is not new; it was introduced in 1980 and at that time applied to manufacturing and processing. I admit that some bells and whistles have been put on it in the recent budget and I hope the bells and whistles will produce economic development and bring plants and enterprises to the region, because they are desperately needed. However, what I say is that if the minister, as he stated himself, was confident that this new measure would bring new enterprises, then would it not have been reasonable for the government to wait until something else was in place before the plants were closed, if that were the inevitable direction? And too many people have said it is inevitable. I think politicians are sometimes expected to prevent the inevitable, and they do at times. But not in this case. The plants have closed and there is nothing in place, but we are told that the prospects are very good because of this 50 per cent tax credit.

I believe if there was a risk to be taken, it should have been taken by the Treasury of Canada rather than by the unemployed and by these beleaguered communities in Cape Breton. It would be easier for the treasury to keep those plants open for the year or two required to build up the new industries than it is for the local citizens to bear the burden.

Honourable senators, if I am somewhat tedious on this point, it is because I feel very deeply about what has happened. I put so much emotion into it myself when, at the cabinet table, there were always sound economic reasons to close these plants and people would say, "MacEachen is protecting his seat." I am sure every politician tries to do that, but I never felt that my seat was so precarious that I needed to have two heavy water plants to keep my electors sympathetic towards me. The reason I put a lot of emotion into it is because of the importance to the community life, to the social life and to the economic life of those areas. It is a part of the world that is clinging on to the edge of the national economy and every bit is part of the network of fragility that exists there.

I must say, honourable senators, that I am rather angry that I am confronted with a proposal to put an additional $110 million on top of $150 million into de Havilland, an operation that is not resplendent with economic success and which senators have said is precarious and unstable and so on. If we can give de Havilland a break, why could we not have given a break to these two heavy water plants?

I am making a plea to honourable senators to take some interest in this problem and to see whether something can be done to mitigate what I know will be the hardship to this region. In the words of the President of the Chamber of Commerce: "This action could demolish the fragile economy of these areas." Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. John B. Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on the contrast between the treatment of de Havilland and these two heavy water plants. Somehow, the notion that these two heavy water plants were being maintained entirely for parochial political reasons seems to have been transmitted all across the country so that Senator Barootes reacts negatively almost instinctively as he did this afternoon. That is unfortunate; I think if Senator Barootes had had an opportunity to examine the whole situation, he would have reacted differently.

Economists are the bane of our lives. We hear about "sound economic reasons;" they prescribe for us on the basis of sound economic reasons and projections, and then, of course, within months, we discover that it was all quite arbitrary and unsound.

In Port Hawkesbury, we were told by some of the workers that they were bitterly disappointed when the announcement of the closing of the heavy water plant came in the budget, but that they had come to believe that the eventual closure of the two plants was inevitable. Somehow the idea had become fixed in their minds that these two plants inevitably would be closed. The question I raise is if there is to be no market for heavy water, then should not our whole atomic energy program, the whole Candu program, be put on the same basis and closed down, with that closure being regarded as inevitable? If the fuel for the tank is not needed, then, presumably, the tank is not needed either. It is inevitable, we are told, that the heavy water plants must go, but it is not inevitable that the energy reactor program should terminate as well.

If you go back over the history of the economy of this country, I think you will be surprised how often major decisions have been speculative. The biggest one in the nineteenth century, I suppose, was the decision of Sir John A. Macdonald to go ahead with support for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was purely a speculative decision. The Liberals of that day talked about the sound economic reasons why the railway should be built by private enterprise bit by bit as the population spread westward and provided a market for the services of the railway. John A. Macdonald thought big; he was prepared to make a speculative decision based on his vision of the future of the country. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built; it went into operation 100 years ago this year. If sound economic reasons had prevailed, it would not have been completed in 1885, and the whole history of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia would have been entirely different. Quite conceivably, those provinces would have been states in the United States today. Of course, there were people in those days who said that it was inevitable that the west would become part of the great plains states of the United States. But there were people who were prepared to fight against that kind of mythology. They were prepared to make political decisions, decisions to shape the future of the country according to their own vision and their own aspirations, rather than listen to the small-minded soothsayers of inevitability.

Senator MacEachen has shown that the de Havilland decision, too, is really a speculative one. The hope is that we will be able to maintain an aeronautics industry in this country. I hope that the future bears out that aspiration. Similarly, with regard to the heavy water plants, it is a speculative matter. It is up to government from time to time to make speculative decisions, to move optimistically into the future. I realize that private business often cannot do that because its obligations are different. That is why private business should operate private enterprises, and why government should operate government enterprises. These are quite different matters.

I agree with what Senator MacEachen has said, and I am sure that Senator Muir does also, namely, that we ought not to be confronted, as we are in this bill, with a decision to go ahead speculatively expending large sums of money in the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, one of the regions of Canada, while at the same time we know that two heavy water plants in Nova Scotia are being closed down with very serious impact upon that region of the country.

The country in a sense is a kind of saucer and we are out on the edge. When things dry up, we dry up first but the people in the centre generally have a little moisture even in the driest of times. I am making a plea for a reconsideration of this decision. I am sure that every premier in the maritime provinces, together with the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, will second my plea.

One of the things that comes out clearly is that there have been no impact studies as to the result of these closings in these communities. Perhaps the prospect is so desperately bad that people could not bring themselves to draw together the picture; that probably would be truer in the Glace Bay area than in the Port Hawkesbury area. But surely if this was inevitable there should have been detailed impact studies carried out. There are 2,000 jobs involved when you take the multiplier effect into consideration. Are we going to go ahead with other expenditures in the area which will have been deprived of their viability by reason of this decision? Nobody seems to know. I think there are very good reasons why the government should decide to delay this matter until impact studies have been made and the matter has been considered coolly and imaginatively and beyond the sway of the inevitability mentality.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: I should like to pose a question to the honourable Leader of the Opposition or to Senator Stewart. My question is prefaced with that short two-minute address. I hold no brief for de Havilland Air in Toronto. I have great sympathy for the situation in Cape Breton Island of which each of you has spoken with such emotion and belief. Have you any statistics you might present as to what it costs annually to maintain one worker on the job at the two heavy water plants in Cape Breton Island?

Senator MacEachen: I do not have that statistic. I think the per worker amount would be quite high because of the value of the product which is in inventory. Of course, the annual outlay from the Treasury to purchase heavy water for which there is no current market is considerable. I have said that it is a difficult decision, and one has to take that into account. I have given you my overall view, and taking into account the validity of what is implied in your statement, I still believe that the considerations which I have put forward outweigh that particular factor of the per worker costs.

Senator Barootes: The social value of the industry in the area is not being underestimated but the economic costs of maintaining one worker for one year in the two plants has been estimated at $200,000 per year, which is a very significant amount of money taking into account the inventory store, which you have mentioned, but that includes the cost of storage as well.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate if he has made any comparisons between the economic costs of keeping each de Havilland worker occupied compared to the economic costs on the same basis in Cape Breton.

● (1640)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may take a few minutes of your time to comment on the issue in question. I can certainly sympathize with Senator MacEachen's passion, frustration, anxiety and, indeed, anger. This is a situation with which I am not completely unfamiliar. I have seen plants close down in Newfoundland. In fact, I have had the rather unpleasant duty of going to a small steel mill in my old provincial riding to tell 180 people that the $10 million they were getting was the last of the taxpayers' money they would receive. Several hundred million dollars had gone into that steel mill. It was conceived with great ambition, but its operation was incapable of producing a profit. The mill was built with no raw material to supply it, away from tide water and it was incapable of ever being successful. It was not a pleasant situation.

The social reasons for keeping it open were every bit as valid and as accurate as the reasons the Honourable Senator MacEachen has stated so eloquently apply to the towns of Cape Breton.

We did manage, over time, to place most of the 180 people who worked in that plant. I think that they thought of themselves as being somewhat more productive in their new employment than they had been in their previous employment.

Subsequently, as Minister of Finance in Newfoundland, I inherited the responsibility for Labrador Linerboard Limited, with which some honourable senators might have more than a passing acquaintance. Literally hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money was sunk into that enterprise. That, once again, was built to fill a need. There was a great wood supply available in Labrador, high-density black spruce, which was far more economical to use in the plant than the lower grade of spruce found on the island, but the decision was made to put the plant on the island and to use the wood from Labrador. The port of Goose Bay is closed for at least six months of the year, and probably eight months of the year, so the lumber was cut in Labrador in the winter, floated—which did not work—and eventually barged down to Stephenville for processing in the mill. So, the inventory situation was one which was very expensive and very impractical.

To compound the problem, the product the mill was designed to produce was linerboard, which is the cheapest paper commodity on the market as well as being the least refined. That product was competing with products from mills located in the southern United States, where they grow pine trees in a matter of weeks. It is an entirely different situation down there.

In any event, once again it was my somewhat less than pleasant duty to go to the 800-odd people involved in that particular operation to tell them that there was no possibility of the people of Newfoundland continuing to shoulder that burden. That was probably one of the most unpleasant episodes of my life, but it had to be done.

Subsequently, with the help of the Government of Canada, through the intercession of the then minister from Newfoundland, a person I am proud to call a friend, Don Jamieson, we did manage to work out a deal with Revenue Canada whereby some of the losses of the provincial crown corporation were carried forward to the profits of the new owner. Abitibi-Price subsequently bought the mill and converted it to a pulp and paper mill. It is now operating profitably. The people in Stephenville now have one of the few viable industries in Newfoundland. That is a rather pleasant ending to a rather sad story, unlike the closing of the heavy water plants in Canso and Port Hawkesbury.

I can see the similarities in pouring more and more money into a situation like that. The alternatives in Cape Breton or Newfoundland are not great; the social responsibilities of government are, but there has to come a time somewhere along the line when one has to draw a distinction between what is socially necessary for government and what government can afford to do.

That, in no way, justifies governments'—and I use the plural—continued support of de Havilland. That has been a frustration for me from the time I first came here. I have watched the injections of cash into de Havilland. There have been some exceptions, but most of the supplementary estimates I have seen have had huge infusions of cash earmarked in them for de Havilland and Canadair, but de Havilland is the company at issue now.

We have seen changes in management, changes in game plans, changes in corporate plans, projections, and so forth, all of which end up with the same claim of another $110, $150 or $200 million of infusion to carry them over to the next sale of Dash 7s or Dash 8s. In my opinion, that has to come to an end. I think that that has gone on far too long for what good it has done or what good it will ever do for this country.

Arguments have been made about saving technology; arguments have been made about keeping the asset in place to entice a customer down the road. Those arguments are probably valid, but I do not think they justify the amount of money that Canadian taxpayers have been forced to put into that company.

The thought of closing the heavy water plants in Nova Scotia and moving them to Ontario is one that I find repugnant and abhorrent. I do not know where that idea came from. I think it would be a national disgrace if that were to happen. I sincerely hope that there is no justification for that.

The corporate plan of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, which has been quoted, is short on specifics. I listened carefully, but I heard no firm contracts mentioned, nor did I hear future sales of Candu reactors mentioned. To the best of my knowledge, the only potential sale on the horizon is the sale of a second reactor to New Brunswick. Of course, there are people who question the wisdom of a nuclear reactor in Atlantic Canada because it has an abundance of tidal power, coal and hydro power available, but for some reason—possibly to support industries in Ontario—there is the possibility of putting a second Candu reactor in New Brunswick.

The story is a sad one. There is no way anybody could fail to sympathize with the people who live in those communities. Early in the debate Senator MacEachen gave pride of place to Newfoundland as the leader in unemployment in Canada. That is a very poor claim to glory in the Canadian confederation, but it is one we have been carrying since we entered the union. Newfoundland's place in the per capita income scale is no greater now than it was when it first came into confederation; that is not to say that confederation has not been good for Newfoundland, because I shudder to think what it would be like down there if Newfoundland were not part of Canada.

Honourable senators, I will not take any more of your time. That is all I have to say.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Doody: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: You referred to the difficult decision that had to be taken with respect to the linerboard mill, and seemed to parallel that to the decision to close down the heavy water plants. I am sure that there are similarities with regard to the social impacts, but surely there is a difference when dealing with anything that relates to the whole problem of energy. Energy is an unpredictable field. We are living in an energy situation which changes every year—at least it has been changing every year since 1973.

If suddenly—who can predict?—the international price of oil moves upward again, the whole question of energy reactors will become lively, although I am sure there are people who would regret that. You have said that there comes a time, regardless of social impacts, when hard decisions have to be made. If that is true, why is AECL not being virtually mothballed itself?

Senator Doody: That is a good question.

Senator Stewart: If the heavy water plants are being closed down and dismantled, why is not AECL itself being mothballed?

• (1650)

Senator Doody: To speculate on the energy requirements of the future is obviously part of a decision that somebody has to make. If the people in authority in the boardroom feel that they can afford to put several hundreds of millions of dollars more of their money into the possibility of something happening down the road in the energy field, then that is a decision they have to make. They have elected not to do so—certainly for good and sufficient reason.

With regard to the mothballing of AECL, you will get no argument from me on that. It has sustained heavy layoffs to date, and I expect that there will be more to come. I obviously do not know that. I do not really think that AECL is one of the shining stars in Canada's corporate crown, at any rate. If it were to be mothballed, there wouldn't be very much weeping in the streets of Twillingate. The people in Jerrys Nose, Toogood Arm, Sunday Cove Island, and all of the others would not really be too disturbed about that. They would be much happier to see an infusion of cash into the fishing industry of the area.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, by way of a preamble to my question, I will point out that, while my designation is Halifax, I am a Cape Bretoner. There are a few of us in this chamber, Senator Murray, Senator Muir, Senator John M. Macdonald, Senator Graham—and Senator Marshall who was born there. I don't know who else I may have missed.

Senator Roblin: Senator MacEachen.

Senator MacDonald: Yes, of course; we are all Cape Bretoners, and I think we would want to associate ourselves with some of the remarks of Senator MacEachen.

There were many former distinguished members of Parliament who represented Cape Breton well. My father was a member of Parliament for Cape Breton South in the late twenties and thirties, during which time the economic situation was not really much worse than it is now. I visited Cape Breton a few weeks ago, just before the Honourable Sinclair Stevens came down to make the announcement. I served for some years as the president of Nova Scotia's Industrial Development Corporation and had some experience in trying to attract industry, both in Nova Scotia and in Cape Breton, working with Devco.

I share with Senator MacEachen his skepticism of plans, be they government sponsored or be they expressed with respect to government programs such as DRIE. I have attended the openings of plants and have shared in the joy that went along with the realization that 25, 30, 40 and 50 people were being employed. I have also been there three years later with the receiver. I know a little bit about that. I also know about the stupid way in which we go about preparing a community for a shutdown, without any regard for the social impacts upon the people in the area.

I pray to God that the new task force for Cape Breton will succeed. I think it should have all the help it can get, although I have some strong views as to whether or not it can accomplish all of its work in such a short period of time. If I thought that there was any way in which this inventory could, in a number of years, be utilized—if I thought that there was some realistic hope that the people living in the area could pin their careers on—I would be the first to support the proposition of Senator MacEachen. I am sure that all of us from Cape Breton would join with me in that support.

My question is: Is it realistic to hold out that hope?

Senator MacEachen: I can only answer that question by saying that I think the Candu reactor will become a seller and that that heavy water inventory will be cleared. I cannot prove that. I must say that I was a bit surprised when I read the corporate plan which the Leader of the Government tabled on behalf of Atomic Energy of Canada, in which they were even more optimistic than I could possibly be when they spoke about their long-term strategy. They referred to a resurgent power reactor market—I repeat, a resurgent power reactor market. I suppose my realism is based more on experience than on scientific knowledge of the markets, although I know that there are markets. I also know why we cannot sell to those markets—it is because of our safeguard standards. I know of cases where we could clear quite a lot, but we do take a stand against the proliferation of nuclear materials. We have very strict rules in that regard. Canada would not even sell heavy water to the United States if there were any intimation that it would go into their war machine, to put it broadly. Canada could sell heavy water to India and to Pakistan, as well.

Although I got carried off on that line, I am not saying that that is the solution. However, we have lost markets because of national policy and because of our views on safeguards, and I do not disagree with them. I am not saying that we have changed that. I was Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I knew when AECL made the recommendation to close the plants, and the government refused to accept that recommendation, for the reason stated.

I hope that Senator MacDonald and I will still be quite fresh and lively members of this institution when we can say that this inventory has been cleared. I may be wrong, but that is my belief. I can also tell honourable senators that I am sure there will be additional requirements for heavy water and that AECL is preparing to have the material produced in Ontario.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, a few moments ago Senator Godfrey asked a question. I thought that we might put that question to Senator Barootes, who was diligent in obtaining the cost per worker in the Cape Breton plants. Might I ask him whether he obtained the same information with respect to the aircraft industry?

Senator Flynn: Senator Godfrey's question was put to Senator MacEachen.

Senator McElman: Might I be permitted to ask the question of Senator Barootes?

Senator Flynn: Yes, sure, but I wanted to correct you.

Senator MacEachen: Was that question put to me? I thought Senator Godfrey said "the Leader of the Government."

Senator Roblin: He meant you.

Senator McElman: My point is that Senator Barootes was diligent in finding out the cost per worker in Cape Breton. Has he the figures on the cost per aircraft worker in Ontario and the moneys provided by government?

Senator Barootes: In de Havilland?

Senator McElman: Yes.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Barootes: I do not have those figures and I have not seen any figures on that question, so I am sorry, I cannot answer it.

Senator McElman: Perhaps some maritimers will obtain that figure and place it on the record of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: It is too bad that Senator Austin is not here—he would know.

Senator McElman: As Senator Godfrey indicates, it would be interesting to have that information.

Honourable senators, this last hour has been a very rewarding one for me, as a maritimer. Each of us has great respect for Senator MacEachen's record as a parliamentarian, irrespective of what our partisan views of him may be. We of the Atlantic provinces—particularly the maritimes—have great respect for his diligent efforts on behalf of the region, and I speak not only of Cape Breton, his own seat, but of the entire region. I, for one, am delighted to see him carrying to the Senate his regional interest and expressing it so well, as he has done this afternoon, with the support of others such as Senator Stewart.

● (1700)

I find it quite beyond my comprehension that, in the light of the corporate plan of AECL and what is said therein, there should be a decision made, not just to shut down the two heavy water plants in Cape Breton, but actually to dismantle them in the face of the information that has been put before Parliament by AECL. Since that information has been prepared by that crown corporation, it has been made clear that AECL, in co-operation with the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and the Government of New Brunswick, is now proposing that there should be an expenditure of $1.2 billion for the construction of Lepreau II in the province of New Brunswick, a plant that will require heavy water. I do not believe that there can be enough in inventory now in Cape Breton to look after the "forever" needs of two Candu operations in New Brunswick plus those in Ontario.

I find it inconceivable that the thought of government is not simply to close down or to mothball the two Cape Breton plants but to destroy them.

Having said that, I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators a news release that reached my desk today. It is a news release of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion and is headed: "April 1985 Capital Investment Intentions Survey Released." It is a survey of large firms. Table II attached to that news release is entitled: "Capital Expenditures of Selected Large Companies for 1984 and Plans for 1985 by Province and Region."

For the province of Ontario, where the aircraft industry is being assisted, the plans for 1985 call for an increase of 22.8 per cent. For the Atlantic region, the plans of such industries call for a reduction of 4.9 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator McElman: I call to the attention of honourable senators the fact that the activities and the capital expenditures of major companies within the Atlantic region are already at rock bottom low, and here we find that they are going down by a further 5 per cent, approximately.

For my own province, the province of New Brunswick, the planned capital outlays for 1985 are reduced by 28 per cent.

The region is in trouble. If ever there was a time for the Government of Canada to feel right about assisting a region, rather than closing down these two operations at this point in time, surely it has to be now.

It is my hope that all honourable senators, and particularly those on the government side of the house, many of whom have their roots in Nova Scotia and perhaps still representing that province, will join forces with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate in trying to impress upon the government that this is not just a subsidy; that there is some hope of a market for the heavy water produced, and in any event, if it is finally decided that these plants must be closed down, that they not be dismantled, leaving the future market in heavy water for the province of Ontario, a province that is certainly not in need of assistance to the same level as are Cape Breton and the maritime provinces.

Let me just add a word or two about what Senator Doody has said in relation to the output of Lepreau II going to other provinces. Much of the production of Lepreau I now goes into New England pursuant to long term contracts. One of the reasons that the plans for Lepreau II were shelved for a time was the softness of the market due to the economic conditions in New England. That market appears now to be firming, with the result that Lepreau II is very much on the front burner. Probably within months from today, AECL and the Government of New Brunswick will be proposing to the Government of Canada that Lepreau II be proceeded with, involving an expenditure of $1.2 billion. That plant, once in operation, will require large quantities of heavy water into the foreseeable future.

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. No doubt he will find me incredibly naive. My question is: How will this debate end? Will it end with the adoption of the report of the committee?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In our procedures, the report of a committee is not always adopted. The motion that we have before us now is the result of a decision taken yesterday to have this matter taken into consideration today. We do not yet have a motion to have it approved. But the usual result of a report from the National Finance Committee on estimates is that that report is taken as the committee's view on the appropriation bill once it comes forward, because each of the items appearing in the report of the committee will appear as schedules to the appropriation bill.

Appropriation bills are not usually referred to the National Finance Committee, the reason being that the committee has already reported on the estimates. It is quite possible, however, that this subject might be raised again when the appropriation bill is debated.

Senator Le Moynes: That is not my point. I am wondering whether it would be possible to end this debate by having a formal motion respecting these two heavy water plants.

Senator Frith: If a motion were put dealing with this report, it would have to be to the effect that the report be not adopted, for these reasons. I suppose that that is possible. It had not occurred to me. If it is the wish of the Senate that this money should not be granted to de Havilland, the action to be taken would be to defeat the appropriation bill.

Senator Doody: That bill will come in anyway.

Senator Frith: I am not inviting anyone to do that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would not want to leave the impression in the mind of Senator Le Moynes that that would constitute a sound course to follow.

Senator Frith: I wouldn't either.

Senator Roblin: I would like to make it clear that that is not my view, and I suspect that it is no longer the view, if it ever was, of honourable senators sitting opposite. It is generally accepted, regardless of what we think about regular legislation, that the Senate does not take unto itself, although it might constitutionally do so, any right to amend or to defeat money bills, and that would be the substance of the motion that is before us now, although it could be argued that it really isn't strictly—

Senator Frith: It is stronger than that. It is refusing supply.

Senator Flynn: That is on the bill. This is not a bill. It is not even a motion.

Senator Roblin: It is just to take it under consideration. However, I think the impression might have been left with Senator Le Moynes that it would be possible, in dealing with this motion, to somehow point the finger at the heavy water problem. I suppose it is possible to do that if the wording of the committee report does so. However, in terms of the effective results it is merely an expression of our opinion at that stage. If it is desired to underline it, I guess an inquiry will be introduced, under which one could review the whole matter again, if it is thought advisable to do so.

● (1710)

This underlines what I believe to be the role of the Senate these days, until we are reformed in one way or another. Basically, we are an advisory body. We are entitled to, and indeed should, express our opinions on matters of this sort, and I think there is no reason why other parties in the legislature may not be acquainted with what takes place in the Senate from our Hansard. However, it is my view, which is perhaps heretical and not entirely agreed to by everybody here, that we would be well advised at this stage in our constitutional development to recognize the essential advisory function that we perform, rather than thinking that we should take it upon ourselves to modify financial legislation.

Senator Frith: I could always move a motion that the government should rescind its provision.

Senator Le Moyné: I thank the Leader of the Government. I now understand that motions can be dangerous. It was for me a matter of being able to give formal vent to an expression of empathy with the fate of an important part of our country.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with much of what has been said by honourable senators already in this discussion. However, I am not at all as sanguine or optimistic as some honourable senators seem to be about the future of Candu. It may well be, as Senator McElman has suggested, that markets for power in the New England states are improving to an extent that would justify the construction of a second unit at Point Lepreau. I hope that is the case. We may be able to sell them some power. I doubt very much that we will ever be able to sell them a Candu, because the activities of the environmentalists and other anti-nuclear groups in the United States are such that the process of getting approval for and constructing a nuclear plant anywhere in that country is unbelievably complicated and prolonged. This, of course, is probably the reason why there may be a market in the New England states now for our power.

I was in New Brunswick, working for the government there, at the time the first unit at Lepreau was constructed, with the help of a loan equal to half of the cost from the Government of Canada. I must say that the projections of power demand in that province that the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and the government were tossing around at that time have proven to be excessively optimistic.

The province of Nova Scotia had an opportunity to participate in the construction of Lepreau I, as it had an opportunity to participate in the construction of Lepreau II. Notwithstanding the fact that the power produced by that plant was cheaper power, Nova Scotia decided, for reasons that will be obvious to honourable senators, to put its money into coal-fired power plants. The province of Prince Edward Island went so far as to refuse to import power from the province of New Brunswick that they thought might have been produced by the nuclear plant, because apparently they thought it would be contaminated in some way. That is the kind of mentality that we are up against even in our own country with regard to the Candu.

At the time the first unit at Lepreau was being built, I recall being told by the authorities at the New Brunswick Power Commission, who came to Ottawa and talked to the Government of Canada, that they could import heavy water from outside the country 30 per cent cheaper than they could buy it from AECL, and threatened to do so. AECL, speaking as a crown agency, made it very clear to them that they could arrange to deny the Government of New Brunswick the necessary import permit to bring in that heavy water at any cost, and eventually a price was negotiated. I do not know whether Canada's competitiveness in the production of heavy water has improved since that time, but in listening to the discussion today, the situation of ten or more years ago, when it appeared to me that the heavy water we were producing was not competitive with heavy water produced elsewhere, came back to my mind very clearly.

There is a possibility of markets opening up in the New England states, and so a possibility of a second unit at Lepreau. Where else? The Leader of the Opposition pointed out that the authorities at AECL had indicated that they might possibly have a sale in Turkey. We have heard that before. We have heard it before about Turkey, about Korea and, I think, about Japan. However, the prospects do not seem at all bright for Candu at this point, notwithstanding the optimism expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and by the authorities at AECL. The prospects do not appear to be at all bright, and I must say that on the basis of the facts as we understand them I am not at all as sanguine or as optimistic as some honourable senators seem to be about the future of that technology.

Senator Frith: Are you optimistic about de Havilland?

Senator Murray: I do not know whether I should be optimistic about de Havilland at all.

Senator Frith: That is the point, is it not?

Senator Murray: I quite understand and, as I indicated, sympathize entirely with the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. We had some pretty encouraging interpretations and assurances about de Havilland from Senator Austin when he was the responsible minister on this side of the house. These are matters that I hope we can have a further discussion on, perhaps in the course of another debate before too long.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this order is considered as having been debated.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs (Report of Commissioner—1984), which was presented on Wednesday, May 29, 1985.

Hon. Dalia Wood, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, moved adoption of the report.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I am correct, this motion is one that evokes a new principle that we are trying to operate under, which is that if a motion for committee activity includes the expenditure of funds for travel and assistance from personnel and professional services—unless it is an order for the reference of a bill, for example, and does not ask for any additional powers—but if it is one that will involve the expenditure of additional funds, the person proposing the motion will let us have a general figure for the budget that is envisaged. There are two matters before us which engage that principle now—first the motion by Senator Murray to refer Madam McDougall's paper and now this one. I am not suggesting that this motion should be defeated but I think that before senators are asked to vote upon it they should have that figure.

● (1720)

Senator Wood: Honourable senators, the total budget will be $250,000 representing a cost of $75,000 to the Senate because it is a joint committee. A budget will be submitted to the Internal Economy Committee this week.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to say a word or two about that budgetary figure. We in the Internal Economy Committee have been trying to, as Senator Frith has said, get a handle on the budgeting process within our committees, and I think we can manage that very nicely. However, we are faced with a different situation with regard to this committee and a new joint committee to review Canada's external affairs, which, I understand, is in the process of being formed. That estimated amount is a figure that comes from the House of Commons, and we have carried it in the flow. I am not suggesting that we should not go with the flow—quite the contrary, I think we have to. However, somewhere along the line we have to find a way of getting control of our input into these committees. I would like to adjourn the debate now and discuss the matter at the Internal Economy Committee meeting to be held later today. Perhaps we can deal with this matter and report back to the Senate in the matter of a day or so.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, when the committee hearings for today were scheduled, it was anticipated that we would be adjourning at an earlier hour and, therefore, that the Internal Economy Committee would meet at an earlier hour. A meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is scheduled for 5.30 p.m. in Room 256-S to consider Bill C-27 and Bill S-2. The Internal Economy Committee will meet, as planned, in Room 356-S.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Right now?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

ESTONIAN, LATVIAN, LITHUANIAN AND UKRAINIAN COMMUNITIES OF OTTAWA

THIRTEENTH ECUMENICAL MEMORIAL SERVICE AND CONCERT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to bring to your attention an event which will take place in our capital city later today. This evening at 7.30 at Notre Dame Basilica will take place the thirteenth ecumenical memorial service and concert sponsored by the Estonian, Latvian, Lithuanian and Ukrainian communities of Ottawa, commemorating their holocausts and the continued violations of human rights in contravention of the Helsinki Final Act and other international human rights conventions. The ecumenical service will be followed by a march and later a gathering at the National War Memorial. As the human rights experts meeting, scheduled to close on June 17, is now bogged down with disagreements over the proposals for a concluding document, I would urge honourable senators to show our solidarity with this peaceful rally calling for respect for human rights and re-affirming our support for agreements contained in the Helsinki Final Act to which Canada and 34 other signatory states committed themselves ten years ago.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(d), that the message be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE HERBERT O. SPARROW

FELICITATIONS ON UNITED NATIONS AWARD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could have leave to interrupt our proceedings for a moment to make reference to a very happy event that took place in New York City on June 5, when our colleague, Senator Sparrow, was awarded a medal by the United Nations Environmental Organization to commemorate, in an appreciative way, his leadership as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, which is its present name, which prepared a report called "Soil at Risk."

"Soil at Risk" has been one of the best sellers when it comes to reports issued by committees of the Senate. It has had a very wide circulation, and we all have every hope that it will have an equally wide and pervasive influence on those who, either on the farm itself or in positions of technical or political responsibility, have an opportunity to digest and appreciate the work of that committee.

I know that Senator Sparrow would like me to include in this reference the names of the others of his colleagues who are members of that committee, and I will certainly do so with pleasure now. They comprise: Senator Bielish, Senator Hays, Senator Le Moynes, Senator McGrand, Senator Perrault, Senator Phillips, Senator Robertson, Senator Thériault, Senator Thompson and Senator Watt, and Senator MacEachen and I have the privilege of joining the committee as and when we can.

Senator Marshall: And Senator Marshall!

Senator Roblin: Senator Marshall, you have good cause for complaint, because your name does not appear on this list of members of the committee, so I crave your indulgence.

I have to add that I think we would all agree that Senator Sparrow, as the chairman of the committee, has been the moving force in the close attention the committee has given to the subject matter before them. While he would not claim to be the sole author, I think I could safely describe him as being the principal author of the volume, "Soil at Risk," which the committee produced.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Senator Sparrow, your efforts reflect credit not only to yourself but to the Senate, and to all of us here, and in the name of us all I am happy to congratulate you on this important and splendid recognition that you received from the United Nations.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate in congratulating Senator Sparrow on receiving this United Nations medal. As we know, the medal was bestowed upon him on the day chosen to commemorate World Environment Day. I believe it is noteworthy that the United Nations itself took notice of the work of Senator Sparrow, as chairman of this committee, which has done so much to improve Canadian understanding of the necessity of soil conservation.

The United Nations has had a very deep interest in environmental questions, and I am personally pleased that it is pursuing that interest by drawing attention to the work of individuals like Senator Sparrow. It may be of interest to honourable senators to know that a number of other institutions and individuals were honoured on the same occasion because of their work. For example, David Suzuki of Canada was honoured for his efforts in educating the public on environmental issues. Among the youth oriented organizations honoured were the California Conservation Corps and Katimavik of Canada. I think that the other institutions and individuals recognized on that day add additional significance to the importance of the event and additional lustre to the medal which Senator Sparrow has so richly deserved.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, perhaps some of you might be a bit surprised to see me rise on this issue, but I think I am the only senator in this chamber who can write the letters "P.Ag." after his or her name, which means that I am a member of the Agricultural Institute of Canada and the British Columbia Institute of Agrologists which in short terms means that I am entitled to claim that I am a professional agriculturalist.

I want to say to Senator Sparrow that I have had occasion to meet a number of my professional colleagues in the science of agriculture over the last little while and the praise for your work is widespread. I want to add a word of thanks and congratulations on behalf of those professionals as well for the good work that you and your committee did on this grave and serious problem relating to the soil of Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and others in expressing congratulations and recognition of the honour that Senator Sparrow has so fittingly been awarded recently. The reason I do so is that about six months ago I had the privilege, with some other parliamentarians from Canada, to attend a conference on the United Nations Environmental Program which has its headquarters in Nairobi, Kenya. At that time there was a great deal of attention given to the problems associated with conserving and rehabilitating the soil in a number of countries in Africa where they have had so much difficulty in the past few years. The publication "Soil at Risk" was very much in the forefront of the leading documentation respecting the consideration given to the risk of our soils. It was also recognized again that of all the assets that nations have, soil is the greatest.

One other factor that came up at that time is that North America about 50 years ago went through a period of drought when there was a great deal of damage done to the soil in the central part of North America, both in Canada and the United States. Senator Sparrow and his committee did draw to some extent upon the experience and the rehabilitation that followed when the weather changed a little, and they did this in such an important way that the publication "Soil at Risk" is a highly regarded reference work on this subject all over the world.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I too should like to join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition and others in extending congratulations to our colleague from Saskatchewan, Senator Sparrow, for the great honour that has been bestowed upon him—an honour that is richly deserved.

As has already been said by others, our soil is one of our greatest assets. Conservation is something that we need to work at all the time.

The work envisaged in the report "Soil at Risk" will continue. I believe even today there is continued work in the Senate Committee on Agriculture on this very question.

The danger of losing our topsoil was brought home vividly to many of us last week when, for two or three days, the soils on the prairies were in motion—in many particular aspects. When the soil is on the move, it is on the move because individual fields on individual farms are blowing and drifting. It seems to me that bringing knowledge, advice and resources to deal with those individual fields and the individual areas that are drifting or in danger of drifting is really what this report is all about. I expect that it is a report that will lead to action all across this country in dealing with what is currently a very serious problem.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I want to thank honourable senators for their very kind remarks. I want you to know that I am very happy to be able to share those tributes with the members of the committee that Senator Roblin mentioned, as well as with the staff of that committee, who played a very valuable part in carrying out the study and in writing the report. As well, I want to share your congratulatory remarks with all conservation-minded citizens in all of Canada.

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-31, to amend the Indian Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE WITHIN CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, June 18, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate, on Wednesday, December 12, 1984, to review and update the recommendations contained in the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on 20th October, 1981, and to enquire into any matter related thereto, or any Sub-Committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such consideration.

Under the new rule, honourable senators, the amount of the budget is $19,968.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise at this time to move the adjournment motion, which proposes, in this instance, that the Senate meet on Monday next, June 17, at 8 o'clock in the evening. As honourable senators are aware, our work load is increasing. There is currently before the committees a number of bills for pre-study. There are several other bills, including Bill C-15, currently on the order paper. Bill C-31, to amend the Indian Act, also has to be dealt with. I understand that an appropriations bill will come to the House of Commons today, and, of course, it is imperative to deal with borrowing bills expeditiously.

We may have to deal with other legislation of which I am not yet aware, but in anticipation of keeping ahead of the work load, and not wanting to ask my colleagues to return in July, I would suggest that we try to complete all of our work in the time available.

To that end, honourable senators, I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 17th June, 1985, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSION BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am seeking from the Leader of the Government an authoritative statement on the proposal to eliminate the full indexation of pension benefits. The honourable leader may have noticed the headlines in the various newspapers this morning on this question: "We may scrap de-indexation, Mulroney hints"; "Govt. back-pedals on pensions"; "Pension cuts a 'proposal,' PM asserts."

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether there has been a shift in government policy and that it is now the intention, as the newspapers say, to backpedal?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend knows as well as I do that it is not customary for representatives of the government to deal with newspaper reports of this kind, particularly headlines. I really have no information that I can give him that would either confirm or deny what he has read in the newspapers. If any changes are to be made to any aspect of the government's financial program, they will be announced in due course when the government is able to make such a statement. I have no indication at all that any such statements are forthcoming.

Senator MacEachen: Yesterday, in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister stated, in reply to a question:

The reason this particular measure—namely, the pension measure—was not implemented on budget night was because of our apprehension in regard to the possible impact. That strikes me as being legitimate. We wanted to monitor the situation as closely as possible so as to minimize whatever effects there were on the elderly.

I would like to know from the Leader of the Government in what way the government could have implemented this measure on budget night. The Prime Minister has said that this measure could have been implemented on budget night if he had not been concerned and apprehensive about its possible impact.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could also tell me whether or not there is any provision in any of the budget papers that would lead to the implementation of this particular measure.

Senator Roblin: I think I can confirm to my honourable friend that the date on which the partial de-indexing of old age pensions will apply is after the first quarter of next year, that is, after April 1986. That is the policy of the government at the present time and that is the date the government has decided to set for the implementation of this measure. Other dates may indeed be possible, but I must confess that the one that concerns me is the one that has actually been accepted.

Senator MacEachen: The honourable Leader of the Government has not answered my question as to how it would have been possible for the government to implement this measure on budget night. I do not see how it could have possibly been implemented.

Senator Flynn: He didn't say that.

Senator Frith: Yes, he did. What did he mean when he said he was refraining from doing it?

Senator MacEachen: The Prime Minister stated that this particular measure was not implemented on budget night because the government was apprehensive. I assert to the Leader of the Government that in my view there is no way that this measure could have been implemented on budget night; it would require an amendment to the Old Age Security Act and that the amendment has not even been introduced yet. I have searched the budget papers—

Senator Flynn: Search your mind, that would be much better.

Senator MacEachen: —the ways-and-means motions—

Senator Frith: Slow down.

Senator MacEachen: —and there is no reference whatsoever in the budget papers—

Senator Frith: I hope you are laughing at the Prime Minister.

Senator MacEachen: —to this particular measure.

Senator Flynn: I am laughing at your leader.

Senator MacEachen: I would like to know how, in the mind of the government, this measure could have been implemented on budget night. Is there a way?

Senator Flynn: As if you knew nothing about the process!

Senator Roblin: I think that my responsibility here is not to answer hypothetical questions such as the one raised by my honourable friend but to try to deal with the policy the government has adopted. The policy the government has adopted and the timetable attached thereto is part of the budget statement, and that is the position on which I must take my stand.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask this question: Can the Leader of the Government tell us that the proposal or the measure referred to in the budget speech by Mr. Wilson with respect to the elimination of full indexation is still the firm policy of the government?

Senator Roblin: It has never been the firm policy of the government to eliminate indexing.

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Roblin: The firm policy of the government is that partial indexing will be—

Senator Frith: The firm policy of the government is that it does not have a firm policy.

Senator Roblin: Would you like to answer the question?

Senator Frith: I sure would, and a lot of old age pensioners—

Senator Roblin: You wouldn't be able to.

Senator Frith: —would like to hear the answer, too.

Senator Roblin: The question of indexing is certainly under active public discussion. Indexing on the GIS continues. Partial indexing on old age security is to be altered when the budget measures come before Parliament, and they still have to be approved by Parliament. Unless one wants to carry my friend's interpretation of the rule of anticipation as far as that, one would not normally anticipate that it would be altered. However, that is the policy of the government at the present time, and it is to that policy that I must speak.

● (1420)

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate confirming that it is still the policy of the Government of Canada to eliminate full indexation of pension benefits, or, as he puts it, to institute a form of partial indexation for pension benefits? I think that the Leader of the Government adds to the confusion that we are all experiencing in knowing—

Senator Flynn: In exploiting.

Senator Frith: You would never do that, would you?

Senator MacEachen: —what the government really has in mind, because the Prime Minister himself is showing every indication of uncertainty and hesitation.

Yesterday, in the other place, in reply to a question, the Prime Minister said:

I can say without the slightest hesitation that, as far as this particular measure is concerned, we were somewhat hesitant, the proof being the statement in the Budget that we are going to monitor the situation on a regular basis.

The Prime Minister says he is hesitant—

Senator Frith: Without hesitation, he says it.

Senator MacEachen: The Prime Minister said:

I can say without the slightest hesitation that, as far as this particular measure is concerned, we were somewhat hesitant—

Senator Flynn: We were; we are not now; we were hesitant.

Senator Frith: That is what we are trying to find out. Senator Flynn says he is not hesitant now.

Senator Flynn: Now there is no problem.

Senator MacEachen: I would only await the word of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, rather than the word of Senator Flynn, that while there was hesitation before budget night, there is no hesitation today. Can the Leader of the Government say that that is the case?

Senator Roblin: When one enters into discussion about hesitation, when one enters into discussion about sober second thoughts; when one enters into discussion about changes in budgets, there is no person who is more expert in this field than my honourable colleague, Senator MacEachen. A few years ago, he brought in a budget for this country, and if there was one measure in that budget that was not changed, it escaped my notice. Possibly there were some, but I can say that over the following six to twelve months after that budget had been produced, every important, salient factor in it was subject to change.

Senator Flynn: And the minister also was changed.

Senator Roblin: I should modify that statement: I say "every"; it is always dangerous to make an absolute statement, because human beings are usually better off if they are not quite so positive. However, I would say that many of the proposals were changed, and for good and sufficient reason, and I do not think that my honourable friend regards himself as a disgrace because that happened. I do not think he felt that he had been abandoned or that he had betrayed his trust because he made some changes.

Senator Flynn: We were all in sympathy.

Senator Roblin: The fact that he had his whole budget thrown out—there I go again making these sweeping statements—but again, the fact that he had his whole budget thrown out perhaps did not please him but he did not regard himself as a failed public servant on that account. I suggest that when we discuss matters of budgetary alterations or budgetary reviews, we should realize that there is room in every budget—as, indeed, there was in his—to reconsider matters that have been put forward.

I would not like my honourable friend to stand up immediately and say, "What matters are you reconsidering?" because that is a question I am quite unable to answer at the present time. I can say, however, that in the budget papers themselves, in connection with this particular measure, it was made clear that there was concern and that it would be monitored. That is what the Prime Minister is saying in the other place, and I, for one, hope that that is the policy that we will follow. There may be improvements that can be made, and if there are such improvements, not only in this aspect of the budget but in others as well, as we debate them, I would not like to be one who says that I never change my mind or that nothing can ever be improved upon, because I think it can be. I tell my honourable friend that it is useless for him to try to sow—is it confusion? Well, I think so.

Senator Flynn: Exploit the confusion.

Senator Frith: Right on!

Senator Roblin: He has been doing that very successfully.

Senator Flynn: Exploiting the confusion in the mind of the public.

Senator Roblin: If there is confusion in the mind of the public, my honourable friend has some responsibility for that. I do not ascribe to him full responsibility for that, but he has to take some responsibility for it.

I am simply telling him that the Prime Minister's statement in the other place stands on its own feet; it speaks for itself. He knows perfectly well that I am not in a position to amend or comment on that statement, and even if I were, I would not do so.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is very hesitant. He certainly does not have the confidence Senator Flynn has, who said that they were hesitant before budget night but today they are not hesitant. The Leader of the Government has shown an indication of hesitation because he is sowing the seeds for possible change in that rather defensive answer.

I thank him for his solicitude about my experiences, which I always find challenging, but I never find it possible to operate and speak "without the slightest hesitation" while at the same time saying that I am "hesitant." That is what the Prime Minister did yesterday.

Perhaps the leader would reflect upon a further statement made by the Prime Minister. Anybody who has any doubt about the intention of the government will have that doubt removed as a result of this statement by the Prime Minister, because the Prime Minister now has put the Minister of Finance in complete uncertainty by his statement on this particular measure. That statement is found at page 5676 of House of Commons Debates, and reads as follows:

The Budget proposals on limiting indexation are not in effect at this time and will not come into effect until January 1 of next year—

But listen to this, honourable senators:

—and if we do proceed with this measure, the initial effects thereof could not be felt until April, 1986.

Senator Frith: Bye-bye Michael Wilson!

Senator MacEachen: Will the Leader of the Government now confirm that the government may not proceed with this measure at all, that the hesitation that prevailed before the budget is still threatening the government, still making the government nervous? Will the Leader of the Government now say that the government will go ahead with this de-indexation measure? Can he say that?

Senator Flynn: Idle words.

Senator Roblin: I wonder whether, when he [the then Mr. MacEachen] presented his budget in the other place, he was asked if he intended to proceed with his measures.

Senator Frith: Why have an inquiry into Senator MacEachen's budget? Why not talk about this budget?

Senator Roblin: I would like to profit from Senator MacEachen's experience.

Senator Frith: But you will get to the question eventually.

Senator Roblin: I cannot recall a Minister of Finance in my time, with the exception of Walter Gordon, who had more trouble with budgets than did Senator MacEachen. So, when he—

Senator Frith: Just take a look at Michael Wilson's.

Senator Roblin: —asks questions about changing policy or changing my mind, I am only one of 39, and I am certainly not going to enunciate government policy on this matter in the Senate, because I have no right or authority to do so.

Senator Frith: You are talking about everything but the subject.

Senator Roblin: I have to point out to my honourable friend that his experience is illustrative, and we hope we will not make as many mistakes as he did.

Senator MacEachen: Unfortunately, while the Leader of the Government is not obliged to talk about past policies; he is obliged to talk about present policies. He is so uncertain about those that he cannot stay on that ground; he has to go back four years and talk about past experience.

I am asking the leader if he is able to tell us today that this measure will proceed. Can he tell us that, clearly and simply? Can he give us a "yes" or "no" answer to that?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend answered questions relating to his budget he did not answer categorical questions of that sort, when there had been a plain statement by the Prime Minister that the matter was under review.

The matter is under review, and those are the exact words that were used, the right words. We will develop our policy as we think the situation requires. We have a proposition before the Canadian people. That, at the present time, is the policy of the government. If the government decides to change that policy my friend will be informed in due course. Speaking at the present time, and speaking as I know the situation, I say that this is the policy of the government, that we will bring these measures in, but we will not do so in a blind, insensitive and—

● (1430)

Senator Frith: Confusing.

Senator Roblin: We will deal with it in a good, calm—

Senator Frith: Uncertain, hesitant. We are just trying to give the honourable senator some extra words.

Senator Roblin: When I have to borrow words from the honourable senator, that will be a hard day as far as I am concerned.

Senator Frith: I am just offering them; they do not have to be accepted.

Senator Roblin: My vocabulary is as good as the honourable senators, and much more to the point and sensible, so I advise my honourable friend to keep out of this discussion, because it is not his question. If he wants to answer a question, he can stand on his feet and do so and no doubt he will.

Senator Frith: Ask me one.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to ask the honourable senator a question—

Senator Frith: Make up your mind.

Senator Roblin: —because I would not get an answer that would be worth two cents, so I won't pay any attention to him. I say to my honourable friend that the position of the government is quite clear, and he can indulge in all the oratory or all the play on words he wishes to, but it does not alter the situation.

Senator Frith: The confusing situation.

Senator Roblin: You are the confused one.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has stated that the government will bring in this measure. Those were his words, that it "will bring in this measure." He has added to the difficulty, because yesterday the Prime Minister said, "If we do proceed with this measure". So the Prime Minister has left the door completely open for the government not to proceed with the measure, and I would be satisfied if the Leader of the Government in the Senate were to say, "I agree with the Prime Minister. We are now in a state of mind that we may not proceed at all with the measure." I think that would be fair, because that is the meaning I read into the Prime Minister's words. However, it is clear that the Leader of the Government really does not want to say, because he does not know, and it would be better for him to admit it, or to rely on the words of the Prime Minister.

I am not going to complain any further, because if I wanted to produce additional evidence I would quote the Press Secretary of the Prime Minister, who said very clearly, "We may not proceed at all with this measure." That is all I have been asking. The Leader of the Government says, "Yes, we will proceed," and the Prime Minister says, "We may not proceed."

Senator Roblin: I do not think the Press Secretary is an authority on which I would care to rely. They are usually well informed, but they do not state government policy. The Prime Minister states government policy. The Prime Minister has not stated that he will not proceed with this measure. He has used the words my honourable friend has quoted, and I take my stand on precisely the same words.

Senator Flynn: He does not understand.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that, because he has modified his previous statement—

Senator Roblin: I don't think so.

Senator MacEachen: —which was that the government would bring in this measure. He has modified that, and I think he is now consistent with what the Prime Minister has stated, which is that we may never see this measure. So much for the rule of anticipation.

Senator Flynn: Boring!

Senator Roblin: I advise my honourable friend to watch the development of events closely. I think he will see that the measures the government will provide will be consistent with the budget that we have presented, and at the same time will take into account difficulties that will arise. This is not the only subject on which I expect we will see some considerable discussion, not because I particularly want to hear it, but I am perfectly sure that after we get through with the bills that come before this house with respect to taxation measures, if we do not get 199 different opinions, we will certainly get two sets of opinions as to what is good and what is bad with this budget.

If anyone thinks that the government is going to be able to proceed with this measure without a very interesting and, I hope, fruitful debate, in which different opinions will be expressed on the measures, I will be disappointed. I want to hear that debate. I have never made a claim that a government with which I have been associated is perfect. I am sure this government is not perfect. My own government in Manitoba was not perfect. We made lots of mistakes. We tried to get at least 51 per cent of our decisions right. However, I am never one to stand in my place and say that we are perfect and won't listen to sound advice, because we will. Some advice we do not take, but there is some advice that we will take.

Senator Frith: Like vocabulary.

Senator MacEachen: If one wanted to give advice, that would be one thing, but we have not reached the stage of giving advice.

Senator Flynn: You certainly haven't. That is quite obvious.

Senator MacEachen: All we are doing is trying to find out is where the government stands, and I think that is a legitimate purpose in Question Period, to know what government policy is. The Leader of the Government has confirmed what the Prime Minister stated yesterday that the government may not proceed with this measure on de-indexation. It may not proceed. So, it is not firm government policy; it is backpedalling, and we will see more of it.

Senator Roblin: I think that if changes are made in this matter my friend will perceive that they are not back-peddalling. I think he will perceive, if he is fair, that they are improvements, and that I think we can look forward to.

Senator MacEachen: We hope so.

IMPACT OF MEASURES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday I asked him if an impact study had been made showing what the results would be for the various regions of the country of the measures included in the budget. He did not answer that question. That was not really his fault, because I went on to ask another question, and he was so busy answering that one that we both forgot the first question.

I read in the Globe and Mail today that prior to the budget being presented last month the Minister of Finance was given figures by his department which showed that the tax increases would hit low-income and middle-income earners harder than high-income earners.

Am I correct in assuming that if that kind of impact study was made by officials in the Department of Finance, they made a comparable impact study with regard to the way the budget measures would influence people in the different regions of the country?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The government makes studies of many kinds and sorts, and I am sure that a great many were made in connection with the budget. Whether or not those studies will be made public, of course, is the matter my honourable friend is referring to, and I can give no undertaking that that will be the case. I can tell him, however, I have seen certain figures in newspapers that attracted my notice, and which I do not believe match the figures provided by the government on the same subject, and I intend in the course of time to make a review of those figures to do what I can to reconcile the differences.

Senator Stewart: The Leader of the Government has indicated that he will correct this kind of information if correction is in order. Will he make available to honourable senators any study showing the impact of the budget measures on the different regions of the country? Or is it the situation that no such impact study was made?

Senator Roblin: As I think I told my honourable friend yesterday, I am not in the impact study business. It is the part of other people to undertake that if they wish to do so. I can say that I have no authority at present to say that those studies will be provided to my honourable friend.

Senator Stewart: I did not expect that the Leader of the Government himself would make an impact study, but I am sure that he, as a member of the government, knows whether or not such studies were made, and the question is: Are those impact studies available to senators, as they seem to be available to the correspondents of the Globe and Mail?

Senator Roblin: A lot of things become available to the correspondents of the Globe and Mail. As a matter of fact, if one wants to be philosophical about it—and I think I probably do at this moment—I take the view that there are no secrets in government, in the sense that sooner or later all the facts, whether they should or should not, become part of the public domain. It is, nevertheless, my firm opinion—and I think I am probably at odds with the Auditor General on this point—that documents which can properly be classified as cabinet documents ought not to be made public, or else the principle of cabinet solidarity is not capable of being sustained in a parliamentary democracy. If the documents my honourable friend talks about come within that range of documents—and I include budgetary considerations in that range—I doubt that they will be made available to him.

Senator Stewart: If they are not, will they be made available?

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Stewart: They will not, even if they are outside the ambit of cabinet documents?

Senator Roblin: If they are within the ambit of those documents that we now make available to the public, they will be produced. My honourable friend understands that there is extensive legislation on secrecy and the availability of documents to the general public. Such documents as come within those categories, my honourable friend can read for himself.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I must assume the Department of Finance orders impact studies on the various proposals contained in the Budget.

If my assumption is correct, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to ask his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to publish these papers?

This is not, of course, a matter of State secrets or matters affecting the country's security.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that question is the same as the one that was just asked by Senator Stewart, and I give the same answer.

Senator De Bané: Would the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us by what rationale the documents that could support what Mr. Wilson said a few months ago that the budget would be tough but fair will not be made public?

Senator Frith: Because they can't find the fair ones.

Senator De Bané: The leader knows that there are only one or two reasons why documents cannot be made public—either they are cabinet secrets or they relate to the security of the state. Obviously, the impact of a budget on the taxpayers is of public interest. His government has promised an open government and I cannot understand why those documents are not being made public.

Senator Roblin: It is my impression that the documents that make up the budget are, indeed, cabinet papers, because that is the basis on which the cabinet makes its budget decisions and, therefore, are clearly covered by the conventions of this country.

Now that we are on the point, I would like to see a change in the way we prepare our budgets. I am opposed to budget secrecy in the way in which that principle is applied in this country these days. I do not think it is necessary and I think it would be helpful to governments if a different system were adopted. However, that is not the case, and as matters stand at the present time I do not think that those documents could be regarded as those which come under the legislation respecting the publication of government documents.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Would he kindly take under consideration and eventually give me an answer as to whether or not the measures announced in the budget will cost pensioners $1.6 billion a year by the year 1990-91?

Senator Roblin: On that subject, I can give my friend no information other than that which is contained in the budget papers. That is the information that I have and it is available to him now.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government confirm the figures given by the National Council of Welfare or if he cannot confirm them now, would he have them studied by his able staff, and let us know if it is true that a single pensioner now receives $7,310 a year and that this single pensioner between now and 1991—

Senator Flynn: The year 2050.

Senator Gigantès: —will lose $1,604 of purchasing power from this sum, and from what these pensioners are expected to cut these sums?

Senator Flynn: That is stupid.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have seen several calculations as to the effects on old age pensioners and all of them are different. I have no intention of confirming or denying the figures given by my honourable friend. They are the responsibility of the organization that put them together, and he can speak to them about their validity.

Senator Frith: You wouldn't want to clarify the conclusion anyway.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government care to comment on the anxiety expressed by maritime premiers and by the Premier of Quebec and by the National Assembly of Quebec about the very adverse impact of the budgetary measures not only on pensioners but also on everybody else with an annual income of $30,000 and under?

Senator Roblin: The views of the premiers was the subject of a question raised yesterday. I answered it yesterday and I think that that answer should stand.

Senator Gigantès: Would the Leader of the Government care to comment on recommendations by various business associations, including the Business Council on National Issues, that money that is going to be taken away from the pensioners by the government could be found elsewhere? Could he inform us whether these business councils, in making these recommendations to a government they support, have volunteered to give up some of the tax advantages they have received in this budget for the sake of the poor?

Senator Flynn: Oh, my God!

Senator Roblin: I know my honourable friend does not expect me to comment on newspaper reports of that kind. However, I must say that I find his last suggestion one of considerable interest.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government kindly undertake to inquire of his colleagues in the cabinet whether they are prepared to reduce the allowable RRSP deductions given to people who can afford such deductions in order to compensate at least the poor among pensioners for the amount of money that the Treasury is raiding from their incomes between now and 1991?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: Of course, I do not agree with the premise of the question at all because it is a subject for debate. We have been advised by one of our colleagues here to try to shorten our proceedings and I will give you a short answer: No.

Senator Gigantès: Will the honourable Leader of the Government kindly inquire of his colleagues whether there has been any offer by the multinational oil companies to give up one-tenth of the windfalls they are receiving in tax cuts, since this one-tenth would cover the $860 million that Mr. Epp says it would cost to double index the Guaranteed Income Supplement for those pensioners who do receive it?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to debate the National Energy Policy all over again, he is welcome to do so. If that is the essence of his question, I decline to make any further answer to it.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government let us know whether, among the other considerations that are being hinted at everywhere, the restoration of the cut of $100 federal tax deduction—

Senator Flynn: You're boring!

Senator Gigantès: —for people receiving $30,000 or less is going to be reconsidered by his cabinet or is being discussed at all?

Senator Roblin: If it were being discussed by the cabinet, I would not be in a position to tell my honourable friend about it until some decision had been reached.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government tell us that in view—

Senator Flynn: You're boring!

Senator Frith: Then leave, if you're bored. We'll let you know when Senator Gigantès has finished asking his questions.

Senator Flynn: That is what I am going to do right now. Your Honour, I'm sorry but I'm leaving because I'm bored.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen.

Senator Flynn: And you're going to be bored, too!

Senator Frith: It's a pretty hot kitchen. You had better get out.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I wish to tell Senator Flynn as he is leaving the chamber that I have for him as much esteem as he has for me. I will not go so far as to say that I have as much esteem for him as the Prime Minister has for this chamber and its members, even those he has recently appointed himself.

Senator Frith: One down and twenty-four to go.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable leader, in view of the general outcry at the $500,000 capital gains tax exemption, undertake to express to his cabinet colleagues the concern of many honourable senators that this tax exemption is not going to help the Government of Canada because it is given in such a way that it can be used to collect foreign coins, or foreign art or to buy condominiums in Florida?

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to debate the issue of the capital gains allowance, I invite him to submit an inquiry, and we will talk about it.

Senator Argue: Even a motion.

Senator Gigantès: I thank the Leader of the Government for his suggestion, and I will follow it.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question about the suggestion by the Minister of Finance that bonds might be indexed, which is an excellent suggestion. If bonds held by the rich are going to be indexed, is the Minister of Finance going to consider indexing the pensions of the poor?

Senator Roblin: When the government's ways-and-means motions and other bills connected with the budget are presented, my honourable friend will have an adequate opportunity to debate that issue. This is not the time to do so. This procedure of his of offering a succession of questions—which certainly goes beyond the usual limits of tolerance of this house—is counterproductive.

Senator Gigantès: I acquired my habit of asking questions by observing the Honourable the Leader of the Government and his colleagues when they were sitting on the other side of the house asking questions that were very much in the same spirit as mine, and I remember, too, the great tolerance with which the then Leader of the Government, Senator Olson, and the then Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Frith, treated them.

Senator Frith: Carry on.

Senator Gigantès: Will the Honourable the Leader of the Government do me the favour of asking his able staff to examine an article appearing in the Globe and Mail today reporting that the Canadian Council on Social Development has made calculations—which appear accurate to me—on the impact of the budget on various families, showing that the budget will take money from people of modest means and the poor and give it to the rich?

Senator Roblin: I want to join in the tribute that Senator Gigantès has paid to Senator Olson. It is true that we had a vigorous Question Period when Senator Olson was in this chair—and with good reason; there were four cabinet ministers, each of whom held a portfolio, and he, Senator Olson, was the chairman of the cabinet committee that dealt with economic matters generally.

Senator Doody: He was in charge of large projects.

Senator Roblin: And, as far as I could understand, did it very well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: And that is the reason why he was the target of a good many questions from me, and from others—and I think he did a good job in dealing with those questions.

The situation today is not the same. I do not know how many times I have to point out to my honourable friend that I am not a portfolio minister. For him to favour the house with this series of budgetary questions—which indeed should be part of a speech—really does not conform with the tradition of Question Period in this place.

Senator Frith: Oh, certainly it does. You have to try to get the answers.

Senator Roblin: I do my best to get the answers. When I get a good question, I will give a good answer.

Senator Frith: But that doesn't make his question out of order.

Senator Roblin: No one has said that the question is out of order. We know perfectly well that we have no order in this house when it comes to Question Period. None whatsoever. One can ask as many questions as one likes and as often as one likes, and we do not quit until people get tired of asking questions. There isn't even a time limit here.

Senator Frith: Exactly. Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: We have one man who accepts the responsibility of doing what he can to answer questions, and I do not think I have ever backed away from that.

Senator Frith: Well—?

Senator Roblin: But I think the rule of reason has some place in the Senate and ought to be considered by members of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Gigantès: I would appreciate it if the Honourable Leader of the Government took my questions under consideration and provided me with answers. Otherwise, in my humble opinion, honourable senators, we are in a very difficult situation, because the one minister we have says that he cannot answer the questions because he is not a portfolio minister, and he says he has not been given a portfolio, whereas—

An Hon. Senator: Get yourself elected to the House of Commons.

Senator Gigantès: —whereas senators from the Liberal Party, in a previous government, had portfolios.

It is not the fault of the members of this house that he does not hold a portfolio. Because the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not informed on matters to the point that he can give us answers to our questions, or because he himself is not willing to provide us with answers, is not to say that we do not have the right to ask questions.

Since we do have the right to ask questions, I should like the Leader of the Government to ask the officials of the government to consider the impact that Mr. Reagan's tax reform proposals—proposals which go in the opposite direction to ours—will have if adopted in conjunction with the proposals to be adopted in Canada.

Senator Roblin: I have to agree with my honourable friend that the fact that there is only one minister on this side of the house is not the fault of this house. It is the fault of the electorate of Canada. The reason we had so many ministers on this side of the house in the former government is that that government had no representation in three of our provinces. Therefore, it was a reasonable proposition, and one which I supported, that there be cabinet representation in the Senate, thus taking care of that deficiency.

But the electorate of Canada has taken care of that. We are now back to the usual position in the Senate where the number of cabinet ministers is limited. In fact, there have been occasions when there has been none in the Senate. But it is considered advisable that there be at least one.

I do not take kindly to my honourable friend's suggestion that I do not answer questions. I answer questions where I have information. Where I do not have information and it is an important matter—and I think I must be allowed to look at it from that point of view—I get the information.

But when I am presented with non-parliamentary questions—and most of my honourable friend's questions this afternoon have been, to the extent that he has asked me to confirm information or figures provided by outside bodies, or comment on what someone else outside Parliament has said—it is not part of my job to answer those questions. That is not part of my job; it is not part of Question Period.

My honourable friend, I think, is intelligent enough and sufficiently au fait with the workings of Parliament to know that that is the case.

I would hope that he and I could leave our discussion at this point, because I assure him that he is not going to get much further with me.

I see that one other friend of mine across the way, Senator Stollery, who asked me an interesting question the other day—a question which I could not answer at that time—seems to want to rise to put a question. It may even be the same question, and this time I have the answer.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Stollery—

Senator Gigantès: Would the Honourable Leader of the Government please at least answer those questions where I asked him to ask officials of the government to obtain information on certain issues, issues that are being touched upon and discussed publicly, and on which we, the members in this house, even if it is only me, want some answers?

Senator Frith: That is quite legitimate.

TIMING OF IMPLEMENTATION OF BUDGETARY PROVISIONS

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the budget. I am not going to ask the Leader of the Government for specific information.

From listening to the Minister of National Health and Welfare speaking in the other place, there would appear to be two budgets: there is the budget that comes into effect on the night that the budget was put before Parliament, the immediate budgetary effects; and then there are the effects which are the result of bills to be put before Parliament at a later date. I had not understood that in fact there are two quite separate budgets.

Given the rules of secrecy and given the tradition of putting budgets before Parliament, have we got to the situation now where we have, in effect, two quite separate financial presentations being made to Parliament?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have not heard the statement of my colleague in the other house, so it is difficult to comment on it. As far as I am concerned, as a matter of principle, there is one budget.

Senator Stollery: There are a number of measures which will require parliamentary approval, with that approval coming by way of approval of bills, and those bills we will be seeing some time in the fall.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Given his indication in answers given earlier today that the question of the partial de-indexing of old age pensions is an issue that has not yet been quite decided, may that principle also be applied to the various other measures put before Parliament under the name of the budget on budget day? In other words, may we also anticipate changes in the government's attitude to the capital gains provision and many of the other measures which, presumably, we will see before us in a series of bills?

● (1500)

Senator Roblin: There are no changes in those respects that I am aware of at the present time, but I would point out to my honourable friend that sometimes the budgetary process has been a lengthy one, indeed. In fact, during the previous administration, I can recall instances where budgetary legislation was not produced, and certainly not acted upon, until 12 or 18 months after the original budget, and that we were in another financial year altogether before the budgetary measures were dealt with by Parliament. In the course of that 12 to 18 months, very considerable changes—in fact, dramatic changes—were made in the nature of the legislation.

I am not saying that that is going to happen this time, because I have no information that it is. I simply tell my honourable friend that that is the way the thing has been done in the past. It illustrates the nature of the parliamentary process.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—IMPACT OF MEASURES

Hon Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As he is probably aware, the Council of Maritime Premiers has been meeting in Prince Edward Island this week. Premier Lee is the chairman and spokesman of the Council at this time.

On Tuesday, June 11, it was reported in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John that, in reference to the budget of the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Michael Wilson, Premier Lee said:

—there's no question the region got the short end of the stick.

The Atlantic Provinces did get short-circuited in this budget, there's no two ways about it. A number of things will have a drastic impact on Atlantic Canada and this is why I say the federal government has to be educated to the fact that there is a need to address our special needs much differently than they have in this budget.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether, as part of that process of education, the Council of Maritime Premiers has made a direct representation to the government for changes in this budget.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I respect the right of Premier Lee to represent the interests of his province in the best light possible. There is no question about that. That applies, of course, to any other province in this country.

Honourable senators, this general subject matter was dealt with yesterday, and I gave an answer. My friend, however, has asked a specific question: Has the Council of Maritime Premiers made any representation to the government? I will find out.

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary question, if I may. At the same time, Premier Lee—I assume that he was speaking as chairman of the Council of Maritime Premiers—said:

The premiers are also unhappy about Ottawa's decision to de-index old age security pensions—

I remind honourable senators that he is speaking on behalf of P.E.I., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—on behalf of premiers who are not unfriendly, in normal circumstances, to the administration. With reference to de-indexation, Premier Lee went on to say that "the move is completely unacceptable."

Would the Leader of the Government also inquire whether the Council of Maritime Premiers has made this view of de-indexation known to the Government of Canada?

Senator Roblin: I would just like to take issue with the premise of my honourable friend's question; namely, that if a party in power in a province is of the same political stripe as the party in power in Ottawa, there is some special electricity between them. Perhaps that is so, but I want to tell him that, as my honourable friend seated next to me says, it is high voltage electricity. Speaking as one in the business, I never found myself at any loss for inspiration or for words when I was a Progressive Conservative premier dealing with the Progressive Conservative government in Ottawa. In fact, I sometimes thought that other governments were just as easy to get along with.

Senator Olson: Perhaps you were better off with the Liberals.

Senator Roblin: At any rate, I will include the second part of my honourable friend's question in the inquiry that I make.

Senator McElman: In light of the comments of the Leader of the Government, perhaps I could assist him with respect to the attitude of the Council of Maritime Premiers by quoting to him further from this same issue of the Telegraph-Journal:

Buchanan—

Of course, that is referring to Premier Buchanan.

—admitted before the premiers' meeting he would have raised cain had the former federal Liberal government tried to de-index old age pensions.

Senator Roblin: I am under the impression that he is raising cain with this one.

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSION BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have been simmering on the back bench—

Senator Marshall: The back burner.

Senator Fairbairn: —listening to Question Period this afternoon. I say to honourable senators that, unlike Senator Flynn, I am not bored—I am angered by the exchanges that have taken place in this chamber, in the other place and in the country over the past several days. We are talking about a segment of our society that is the most vulnerable of all segments and that suffers the most from daily insecurity and anxiety. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he and his colleagues could go to their caucus this weekend and ask the Prime Minister if he could not withdraw his measure concerning de-indexation before Parliament adjourns at the end of this month.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend knows that I am a member of the cabinet and that I am bound by cabinet solidarity.

Senator Frith: That was no answer. She asked whether the question could be raised with the Prime Minister.

Senator Roblin: What I do in the cabinet is something that I am not at liberty to discuss with my friend—

Senator Frith: It was caucus she asked about.

Senator Roblin: —and I am not going to.

Senator Frith: You are not going to raise it?

Senator Roblin: I am going to respect cabinet confidence and I am also going to respect caucus confidence. My honourable friend can fume over there all he likes, but he is not going to get a rise out of me.

Senator Frith: The things you take shelter in are unbelievable.

Senator Roblin: If you ever have a chance to do the job I am doing—which I think is quite unlikely—you may find it an interesting occupation.

Senator Frith: More interesting, I hope.

Senator Roblin: If you cannot do a better job than I am doing, you cannot be much good; that is all I can say.

Senator Frith: Senator Fairbairn asked a simple, straightforward question.

Senator Roblin: Simple, straightforward questions will get simple, straightforward answers, but when they are based on propositions which I cannot accept, it is understandable that I have some difficulty in answering.

Senator Frith: That question had nothing at all to do with cabinet solidarity—I just hear the pitter-patter of feet running for cover.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Roblin: Thank you, Your Honour.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am glad to advise the chamber that I have some delayed answers to questions.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

FAILURE OF PIONEER TRUST—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions raised in the Senate by Senator Steuart on May 14 and May 16 regarding the Pioneer Trust Company.

With regard to the responsibilities of the liquidator, the liquidator is answerable to the Court, and not to the Government. His duties, obligations and responsibilities are determined by the terms of the Pioneer winding-up order issued by the Court and the provisions of the Winding-Up Act. The liquidator's authority extends only to Pioneer Trust, and therefore has no authority to look into the activities of Pioneer Management Limited or any of its subsidiaries apart from Pioneer Trust. A number of the transactions mentioned in the recent television program did not involve Pioneer Trust.

The Winding-Up Act deems certain types of transactions to be fraudulent preferences and the Court has the power to set aside these transactions. For example, if any of the senior officers had substantial amounts of money on deposit with Pioneer Trust and knowing that Pioneer Trust was unable to meet its obligations, withdrew the money just prior to the issuance of the winding-up order, the liquidator would have the right to recover that money. The liquidator's prime responsibility is to maximize the return to creditors. With the objective of trying to see whether there is any possibility of recovery that would benefit Pioneer Trust's creditors, the liquidator will be carrying out investigations to see if there were transactions made by Pioneer Trust in which there was fraud, theft, breach of trust by officers, employees or directors of the company.

[Senator Roblin.]

The liquidator will take legal action to try to overturn transactions, recover monies or seek damages if he believes that the benefits are likely to exceed the cost of taking the actions.

Regarding Senator Steuart's questions arising from the CBC program "Fifth Estate," the main problem with the program was that no distinction was made between the activities of Pioneer Management and its subsidiaries which are not regulated federally and the activities of the two companies over which the federal government does have jurisdiction, namely, Pioneer Trust and Pioneer Life. Pioneer Management owns Life of the Northwest, a U.S. company, Canadian Pioneer Securities and some companies involved in real estate and oil and gas. Many of the transactions referred to in the program relate to the management company and the subsidiaries which are not federally regulated companies. The directors of Pioneer Management and its subsidiaries were virtually the same.

Regarding non-arm's length transactions, the provisions of the federal trust legislation prohibited the Trust Company from making direct loans to significant shareholders and officers. The federal insurance legislation contains similar provisions. The Department of Insurance is satisfied that neither the Trust Company nor Life Company made any direct loans to its officers. Many of the non-arm's length transactions referred to in the program involve Pioneer Management and its subsidiary over which we have no jurisdiction. For example, the $500,000 of reduced rate loans to senior officer referred to in the program came from Pioneer Management and the financing of Mr. Klein's Phoenix Villa came from Life of the Northwest.

Senior officers and directors of the Pioneer Group authorized loans that while not in direct contravention of the prohibition against non-arm's length transactions, clearly violated the spirit of that legislation. For example, Pioneer Trust made loans to some of Pioneer Life's officers and Pioneer Trust made mortgage loans to a real estate development partnership in which some of the directors and officers held units. These transactions were reported to the Minister in 1983 and were referred to legal advisers who advised that they were not prohibited by the legislation. The Department of Insurance is looking into the involvement, if any, of Pioneer Trust and Pioneer Life in the various real estate projects mentioned in the program and will be making a full report.

Regarding the charges that Pioneer's management was poor and that bad decisions were made, that was the reason for placing the company on a monthly licence and limiting the level of borrowing. In many cases, the regulators had no authority to intervene in the investment decisions made within the authority of the existing legislation. Pioneer Trust was closely monitored and the restrictions that were placed on its operations were with a view to limiting its growth and preserving existing assets. In addition, the Company was under a directive to improve its capital and surplus position within a specific time frame when it closed its doors. No legislation will prevent bad business decisions from being made; however, the proposals in the discussion paper on financial institutions relating the self-dealing and increased powers for regulators will stop repetition of many of the concerns raised surrounding this issue.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—DECLARATION ON INTERNATIONAL SECURITY—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 20, 1985, by Senator Thériault regarding the summit meeting in Quebec City.

Seventeen out of 24 radar stations are scheduled to be phased out over a three-year period. Of the seven that will not close during this phase-out, four of these are in the maritimes: Goose Bay, Gander, Newfoundland; Barrington, Sydney, Nova Scotia. The only other maritime CADIN/Pinetree radar station, St. Margaret's, New Brunswick, is scheduled to close in 1988 as part of the third phase, and involves 60 current civilian jobs.

Due to the proximity of St. Margaret's to CFB Chatham and the upcoming need for personnel at that base, the prognosis is good and anticipated employment loss should be minimal.

In addition, should any individuals not be assumed by CFB Chatham, offers of employment elsewhere within DND should be possible.

BROADCASTING

THREATENED JAMMING OF U.S. RADIO STATION BY CUBA—POSSIBLE INTERFERENCE WITH RADIO STATION CFRB, TORONTO

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on May 29, 1985, by Senator Stollery regarding threatened jamming of a U.S. radio station by Cuba.

Both the U.S. and Cuba have been advised that Canada would not wish to see a "radio war" develop and urged both governments to resolve the dispute over Radio Marti through negotiations.

Canada received formal assurances from Cuban authorities that should they choose to retaliate by operating high power transmitters, they would contact us to explain their action and to resolve any difficulties caused to Canadian stations.

We expect that if Cuba decides to retaliate against the Radio Marti programming, they will choose frequencies which would primarily affect U.S. broadcasting with minimal impact on the broadcasting service in Canada or any other country with which Cuba intends to maintain good relations.

The officials in my department and staff at the Canadian embassies in Washington and Havana are monitoring the issue closely.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a further delayed answer to questions raised in the Senate on March 27, 1985, by Senators Muir, Graham and MacEachen, regarding the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the appointment of a president.

(The answer follows:)

Mr. Derek Rance is 48 years of age and has an MBA from the University of Western Ontario—1963. He also has a B.Sc. (Mining Engineering) from the University of Witwatersrand, South Africa, 1959.

He was most recently employed by Phillips, Barratt, Kaiser Engineering Limited of Vancouver, B.C. and was under contract with Sodimiza Copper Mines in Zaire as Directeur Général Adjoint.

He was appointed on March 22. His appointment took effect on April 2 and runs for a three-year term.

The terms of reference of this position are, as stated in the act to establish the Corporation:

6. (1) The President is the Chief executive officer of the Corporation and has on behalf of the Board the direction and control of the business of the Corporation with authority to act in the conduct of the business of the Corporation in all matters that are not by this Act or by the by-laws of the Corporation specifically reserved to be done by the Board.

TORONTO HARBOURFRONT

PUBLIC ACCESS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on May 8, 1985, by Senator Davey regarding the Toronto Harbourfront.

(The answer follows:)

Admission to Harbourfront has been and will continue to be free. The public's access to the Harbourfront site shall not be restricted.

As in the past, certain special events offered on the site such as concerts, plays, dance performances, et cetera, require the purchase of tickets at reasonable prices. This is not to be confused with a "gate admission" fee which does not exist and is not proposed.

The Harbourfront Quay Club should be more accurately referred to as the "Group of Harbourfront Friends."

Basically, this group represents one facet of Harbourfront's fund-raising arm. All donations received from donors are used to ensure the existence and continuation of those seniors' and children's programs which do not enjoy the sponsorship of corporate firms.

A request by Harbourfront was made to the public for donations and it was noted that the following minor privileges would be extended to those who donated a sum of or exceeding $1,000;

- free parking at Harbourfront;
- tax receipt for income tax purposes;
- one free introductory lesson at the Harbourfront Computer Centre;
- free subscription to the bulletin, "Happenings at Harbourfront;"
- opportunity to attend opening night of Harbourfront Children's Festival;
- invitation to a party in the fall to be held at Harbourfront (all services will be privately donated to the party).

The above minor privileges are extended to donors in appreciation of their contributions and do not constitute membership in an elite, inner circle at Harbourfront.

It should be stressed that:

(i) the Government of Canada has not nor does it propose to cut back on its commitment to Harbourfront. The Crown Corporation will be self-sufficient in 1986, as was agreed to by the Liberal government when Harbourfront was created. No diversions from the Crown Corporation's financial plan have occurred.

(ii) with respect to Harbourfront's kaleidoscope of programs, the number of programs offered at Harbourfront this year is double that of last year. Of those programs, 45 per cent are free.

INVESTMENT CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the second reading of the Bill C-15, intitled: "An Act respecting investment in Canada".—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, after listening to the exchanges that took place here earlier today, I am sure that everybody is vitally interested in the questions of investment. They are on the front burner and they are not complicated to solve like some of the other matters that were raised. Let me draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that if you wish to look at investment in Canada you have to start from a historical perspective.

From its earliest history Canada has relied on foreign investment. It has had an open door for investment. The reason for that is that domestic savings, including savings from personal, business and government sectors, have not been large enough to finance Canada's investment requirements. Accordingly, investment from abroad was essential to Canadian development, and it was forthcoming. It was forthcoming because of three factors that are absolutely essential for investment from foreign countries. There has to be a stable environment in the country receiving the investment, the investment has to serve a remunerative market and, third, there has to be the ability to take profits out.

Such investment in Canada has taken the form of long-term capital inflows, and they have been made up of two factors which are very different. The first one is portfolio investment and the second one is direct foreign investment. In our early days in Canada, foreign investment came largely from Europe. In accordance with the traditions of that place, that investment was largely of the portfolio type. In latter years, the investment has come from the United States and the predominant factor has been that it was direct foreign investment. If we go back in history to the time of Sir John A. Macdonald and to understand the economic flow of his policies, honourable senators will recall his national policy which by tariffs and protection built up a demand for a movement into Canada of foreign companies and the beginning of the branch plant syndrome. This branch plant syndrome was not only the result of federal policies but also of provincial and municipal policies which by bonuses and tax exemptions influenced the introduction of the branch plant philosophy that has continued in some industries in this country up to the present time.

It was not only businessmen and governments who took an interest in foreign investment in Canada. The public in general did. At one time they took an interest in it by encouraging it. Another time they were concerned over it and afraid of it and yet at other times the attitude could only be described as lackadaisical. If you look at the literature and at the studies in regard to foreign investment in this country, you will be struck by one important fact, and that is that it took economists and others interested in foreign investment a very long time before they started to take a look at the different impacts that came from portfolio investment and direct foreign investment. It took a long time for the different effects of these two types of investment to be really understood.

There are some among us, as there are in every country, who believe that foreign investment per se is a beneficial thing. This approach is based on the economic view that the country that is receiving the investment should address, not the question of foreign ownership or control but, rather, the direction and inter-relationship of an industrial policy. Honourable senators, thoughtful Canadians, I am sure, will not accept that tenet without reservation, and those who do accept it with reservation recognize that you have to include exceptions. Once you start to include exceptions, you are in the position of imposing and dealing with sectoral limitation on foreign investment. We have found that in Canada.

Public policy as reflected in legislation has responded in a number of ways. For example, sectoral limitation on foreign investment, limitation on schedule A banks, limitation on investment in transportation, whether it be by rail or air, and limitation on foreign ownership in certain media such as broadcasting. At different times in our look at foreign investment, we look upon portfolio investment as affecting balance of payments and many of us do not really think that that is a difficult problem to control. On the other hand, direct foreign investment as it involves necessarily control by foreign nationals is one that does concern many people. If you look at the history of the development of Canada, particularly in the 1950s and 1960s, you will find that there were those who were becoming more and more concerned. They looked upon direct foreign investment as challenging our national autonomy, and there grew throughout the land a movement for government action and government restraint. It was believed by the people in this movement that the effect of direct foreign investment, as we were experiencing it, was resulting in a truncation of the economic activities in this country.

I am quick to see changes in the public attitude as the question of unemployment and the question of jobs reach a higher place on the priority ladder. There is no question that the need for jobs in Canada and the concern that brings to many people has given it a pre-eminent position, indeed, over some of the concerns with direct foreign investment. However, having said that, I think we must also be cognizant of the fact that the Science Council of Canada has continued to claim that the low levels of productivity in Canadian manufacturing have been due primarily to the high degree of foreign ownership. I know that there is much evidence to suggest that the "branch plant" syndrome that I have referred to limits Canadian organizations and limits Canadian industry in its competitiveness, in its use of technology and in its meeting of foreign market demands.

Honourable senators, if you look at the figures, you will find that the dominance of foreign investment in mining, in oil and gas, in transportation equipment, in chemicals and in electrical products was of such a degree that it constituted a target for aroused feelings of economic nationalism. It surprised me that when the minister, the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, appeared before our Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, he was quick to acknowledge the necessity for limitation of foreign ownership in our banks, in the Canadian interest. However, he was not, apparently, able to see the need for limitation in the ownership and control of those companies that search for and produce fossil fuels. I cannot help but wonder whether his sanguine attitude reflects the realism of the future demands for fossil fuels and the necessity to maintain equal productivity, availability and pricing. I question whether those can be left to foreign control of companies who are involved in that business, without any control by the government of the country in which they are operating.

Again, looking at the figures, that economic nationalism that I spoke about earlier, that aroused feeling of national concern, really resulted from the very quick growth in foreign investment in Canada following World War II. Foreign investment in Canada more than doubled in a very short period of time. Another thing that concerned Canadians was the shift in that foreign investment. Before the war, there was a significant amount of European foreign investment—and particularly United Kingdom foreign investment. That fell off very rapidly in the 1950s to approximately 15 per cent, and the largest amount of foreign investment in this country became investment from the United States.

There is no question about the benefit that some of the investment did bring to this country. It opened up many of our natural resources. However, having done so, it raised the question of what kinds of controls should be exercised over companies that control natural resources, particularly those that are finite. As a result of this development, and after analysis and hearings, the Liberal government of the day enacted legislation to establish the Foreign Investment Review Agency in 1974. In doing so, they were following a trend that is found in many other countries, and some honourable senators who have been in business, and particularly in a multinational or trans-national sense, recognize that severe limitations are put upon foreign investment in other countries such as Australia, the United States, Mexico, Spain and other countries in Europe. The FIRA bill, taken in that context, was not such a great inroad into the area of freedom of investment. It was less stringent than the legislation in many other countries.

Regardless of that fact, from the outset this bill received from the opposition parties, and particularly the Tories, a great deal of opposition. They mounted criticism and their rhetoric, if I may say so, honourable senators, in some cases was strident. I am not saying that in all cases it was, but from time to time it seemed to me that some politicians tended to be somewhat strident and, in this case, there is evidence of that.

Needless to say, they found some people who urged them on; people in the United States; people who perhaps should have known better, in view of their office, who spoke out rather firmly and rather actively in regard to the laws of another country. However, to a businessman who has larceny in his soul, why would he object if he could get someone who said: "Let them in; do not look at anything." Why would he object? I am not saying that all businessmen have larceny in their soul. Of course not, but there are a few.

Senator Doody: Perish the thought!

Senator Sinclair: In any event, I ask honourable senators to remember one thing and that is that FIRA gained a reputation of being unduly complicated and slow in action. It was claimed that FIRA was a real impediment to investment, with the alleged result that capital and jobs were being denied to Canadians. Honourable senators, there is no question that the FIRA bill, when it was first introduced, and the agencies which it controlled, operated at a very slow pace and its workings were complicated. However, this criticism, which was no doubt justified, resulted in changes to the statute.

• (1530)

After a few years of operating under the Foreign Investment Review Act, businesses with assets totalling $5 million or less were given the short form of review. The attitude of the agency changed, and in latter years, particularly under the aegis of the former minister, the Honourable Ed Lumley, and under the direction of Commissioner Richardson, a significant acceleration in the handling of the applications took place, with few being refused.

Honourable senators, any look at the statute establishing the Foreign Investment Review Agency will indicate that the concept that was being espoused by the Tories and special interest groups that FIRA was in place to reject investment will be shown to have been wrong. The facts clearly show that it placed in the hands of the government a bargaining power which enabled it to secure from foreign investors concessions on jobs, on sourcing, on technology, on introduction into foreign markets, even though they resulted in competition with the parent company.

From 1974 to 1984 there was, as Senator Kelly has mentioned, significant change in the amount of control that foreign investment had over Canadian industries. The numbers show that there was a drop of 8 percentage points. That went from just over 33 per cent to just over 25 per cent. In some industries the fall was rather remarkable. In the oil and gas industry, it dropped from well above 90 per cent to below 50 per cent. Transportation equipment, while it did fall, it is still, unfortunately, around 70 per cent foreign-controlled.

Senator Frith: Does that relate mostly to automobiles?

Senator Sinclair: Automobiles and diesel locomotives.

[Senator Sinclair.]

Chemicals and chemical products are still mostly foreign-controlled. They have only come down slightly, from 80 per cent to 75 per cent.

I ask honourable senators to remember that those industries—particularly the oil and gas industry—are very critical industries. In contrast to a 10-per cent foreign ownership allowance in the case of a Schedule A bank, we have the oil and gas industry at 45 to 50 per cent. Remember always that in contrast to Canada, where foreign investment now controls about 25-26 per cent of the industrial base, the comparable figure in the United States is only 2 per cent.

Honourable senators, if you look at the bill you will see that it has a nice title: "Investment Canada" is beautiful. But honourable senators must look at the contents of the bill. The purpose of the bill is stated as follows:

Recognizing that increased capital and technology would benefit Canada, the purpose of this Act is to encourage investment in Canada by Canadians and non-Canadians that contributes to economic growth and employment opportunities and to provide for the review of significant investments in Canada by non-Canadians in order to ensure such benefit to Canada.

That is a laudable purpose, but I ask honourable senators, would that not be improved if there were only a slight addition, and that addition incorporated into the Purpose of the Act the following: A review of control arising from direct investment? That, I think, would improve the bill.

Honourable senators, under FIRA, all new investments were subject to review. All direct acquisitions were subject to review, a short review for businesses having assets totalling $5 million or less, and all indirect acquisitions were subject to review. Under Bill C-15, new investments are not reviewable at all. Indirect investments are only reviewable if they exceed $50 million in assets, and direct investments are reviewable only if they exceed $5 million in assets, subject to sensitive areas, such as our cultural heritage and our national identity.

Honourable senators, how those terms are interpreted will depend on how many cases are really reviewed. What does affect the national identity? I am not sure. Does the fact that a business grows and controls and dominates in an essential area, such as transportation equipment, affect the national identity? I do not know. Those are fancy words.

Cultural heritage is a little easier to interpret, but is not easy either.

Honourable senators, the purpose of FIRA, as I have indicated, was not to discourage investment, but to direct advantages arising from investment. Criteria were established for the review. Those criteria were dependent upon a finding of "significant benefit" to Canada arising from the review on stipulated factors. Under the Investment Canada bill, the stipulated factors are exactly the same, but the basis of the review now is on the criterion of those factors arriving at "net benefit."

In another place people have said that "net benefit" gives a more open door than does "significant benefit". Although I have tried to understand it, that distinction has escaped me in a legal analysis. It is just as easy to argue that "net benefit" is more restrictive than "significant benefit" as it is to argue the opposite. In any event, all of the factors that arise in the analysis to get the result are subjective; they are exactly the same as I have indicated, with one addition, and that addition is found in clause 20(f), which provides something that was already in section 2(a) of the Foreign Investment Review Act. In other words, what has been done by the draftsmen is to take something that was implicit and make it explicit, but it does not add to it at all. There is no change.

● (1540)

Under FIRA, provinces affected by foreign investment proposals were to be consulted; other departments of government were to be consulted. The Honourable Sinclair Stevens said in the committee that this would continue under the Investment Canada bill, and I must say, looking at it, it seems to so indicate. The cabinet, under the Investment Canada bill, would look at sensitive cases. Now, honourable senators, I ask you to cogitate for a moment or two on what is a sensitive case. Who decides what is a sensitive case? I guess it is the minister, because he seems to make the decisions under this bill; the minister seems to be the person who makes them all. In this there is a marked change, because under the FIRA act those decisions as to what was of significant benefit to Canada, following the review and following the analysis, was a matter for the cabinet. What this bill has done is to raise the Honourable Sinclair Stevens to make him the conscience of national concern in regard to foreign investment. I say to honourable senators that that is a pretty thin reed to rely on. I hope honourable senators will agree with me that we could have somebody with a little stronger view than the Honourable Sinclair Stevens as a matter of conscience.

Why did they make the change? What was the purpose of it? It was not to relieve the cabinet of the work load. That had already been done by changing the threshold. It certainly was not by making the minister the sole decider, lifting the decision making process out of the political realm, because, no matter what one may think of the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, nobody would ever suggest that he would approach a problem in a judicial or quasi-judicial manner. Why should he? That is not his function.

The Investment Canada bill does shorten the time frame in which a review takes place. The rules for determining who is a foreign investor have been simplified. The penalties that existed under FIRA in the criminal impact sanction have been moved to the civil jurisdiction. These changes are not objectionable because they are largely procedural.

The Prime Minister and the Honourable Sinclair Stevens and other ministers have made a great point of saying that this bill indicates that Canada is open for business. I say to honourable senators that Canada never was closed for business. The Prime Minister said that this bill brought about a marked change. I think I have demonstrated that the change is not that marked. After all, the criterion of threshold must take into effect the elapsed time between 1974 and 1985. However, if there has been a change as a result of this bill, what is the price that is being paid for the change, and how will Canadians be able to determine what price they have paid?

Accordingly, I would suggest that this bill could be improved by strengthening the basis upon which these things are looked at, and by providing that the minister shall arrange to carry out and report to Parliament for a period of, say, two or three years in small cases and a considerably longer period in larger cases, an audit of the actual impact upon Canada. This would be an audit which would be before Parliament to see, understand and question.

Some people have said that perception is as important in matters of investment as fact. I find that very difficult to accept, because if you are going to make investments you had better have the facts, and if you are just working on a little bit of "feel" you are in real trouble.

There is a perception, though, that the rhetoric has brought about which I think is most important; that is that standing there at the border are hundreds of millions, indeed billions, of dollars wishing to rush into this country from foreign investment sources. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The whole question of foreign investment is one of great competition, and, honourable senators, it is intense. Having had some experience, I recognize, as I am sure honourable senators who have had this experience will recognize, that investment is turned off not by review, not by analysis, but by taxation. Taxation on corporations has the most restrictive effect on investment that there is.

What this bill means and what should disturb all Canadians—and I am sure it will disturb honourable senators—is that Canada has given up something by this bill. It has given up a bargaining position. It has given up a position of requiring people to recognize that they owe something to us besides their money when they come in and take over part of our industrial life.

What can honourable senators do? I have been wondering about this, particularly with respect to what would be appropriate, and having in mind that the Prime Minister of Canada has described people in this honourable chamber as "hacks," "has beens" and "bagmen." The Minister of Justice has referred to people on this side of the chamber as "a coterie," a select group of society, and he has also referred to us as "a cabal." Shame on him!

What really stung me, and I am sure a lot of other honourable senators, was the Honourable Sinclair Stevens' remark that anybody who disagreed with him and the gloriousness of this bill was part of the socialist axis. I am prepared to be part of a cabal; I am prepared to be a has been; but I am not prepared to be part of the socialist axis.

In view of what they think of us in the other place, how can we go forward in a meaningful way? I have a suggestion. I was going to put the suggestion to the honourable senator who introduced the bill, Senator Kelly, but he is not in the chamber. What I was going to suggest to him was that he or one of his associates should move amendments to the purpose of the bill to improve it, move an amendment to clause 5 to enable the audit to take place, and move an amendment to clause 14 that would require review of any person introducing a business in the fossil fuel area, and as long as that business was more than, say, 15 per cent foreign-controlled, it would be subject to review. I do not know if I am naive, but I was certainly impressed and heartened by the remarks of the government leader today when he said "I want all the people in this chamber to know that our government is not perfect."

• (1550)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Sinclair: "We are willing to take action on sound suggestions and proposals. We are interested in improving legislation."

Honourable senators, I feel that the suggestions that I have made will improve the bill. It is worthy of Senator Kelly's giving it some thought. And if he were to tie a couple of those little blue ribbons around the suggestions I have made when we send the bill back, I, in turn, would suggest to all my friends on this side that they abstain from voting and allow the Conservatives to carry these amendments to that other place unanimously so that no "bagmen," no "has beens," no people who are part of "the Socialist axis" are in any way trammelled into this thing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems to me that honourable senators opposite have had many years to come up with reasonable amendments to the Foreign Investment Review Agency and they were not forthcoming. It seems unlikely that they would be presenting them now in any spirit of comradeship and good fellowship. Nevertheless, I certainly will pass the message on to Senator Kelly, and if he wants to help Senator Sinclair remove himself from the Socialist axis, I am sure that he will be delighted to do so. I can certainly understand his chagrin at the stigma because it is not a description that I would like to have referred to me and it is not one that I would would accept willingly. The "cabal" bit I will take and the "coterie."

Senator Steuart: What about "has beens?"

Senator Doody: I missed that remark and I don't want to miss one single word that the honourable gentleman says because we hear them so rarely. Please, for the record repeat it. No? Another first for the Senate—Senator Steuart is shy.

Honourable senators, this has been a very interesting day. This morning I had the benefit of sitting in on a meeting of the National Finance Committee and I listened to Senator MacEachen questioning witnesses on the Bretton Woods Agreements and all the various agencies that the Government of Canada uses as foreign aid vehicles. It was an intriguing experience. He told us that it would be tedious, but it certainly was not. It was most informative. Now we have another expert in his own particular field advising us this afternoon on Bill C-15 respecting investment in Canada, and that in itself was a learning experience in some areas and perhaps not so erudite in others.

I was very interested in the branch plant reference made by Senator Sinclair. It sounds like branch plants are peculiar to Canada or are exclusively Canadian and I do not think that is the case. I think that you will find them competing with each other all over the United States and, indeed, all over the world. Wherever there is a major international company, you are going to have branch plants in one place or another. In any event, I have been told that the branch plant is a declining phenomenon wherever it previously existed and now foreign-controlled companies are seeking and going for world product mandates. I have been told that this is happening in Canada as well in other parts of the world.

Now these branch plants, as they were called, do not have to rely on the rather limited Canadian market for their product but will be seeking a larger worldwide market, which makes good sense. They did serve a purpose in their time and in some areas are continuing to do so. If they produce products which now have to be imported into Canada and in doing so provide jobs for Canadians, then surely branch plants are not to be sneered at.

I should like to mention one other item before I get into my own personal theme, which is FIRA and its application to my particular region, namely, Senator Sinclair's problem with the shift of decision making from cabinet to the minister. The fact that it is the Honourable Sinclair Stevens at this point is probably irrelevant since it will be applicable no matter who the minister happens to be. I look upon that as a very favourable change. One of the problems with the previous act was that decisions would be lost in cabinet secrecy. A firm that was applying for an opportunity to become active in Canada never could find out the reason for its rejection and, in many cases, there was no rejection, but the application was lost in the foggy bottom of the bureaucracy. Now the minister is accountable and the minister will have to say why he is not acting on the application either positively or negatively. In any event, as he probably inferred from the comments that I made to date, I take great pleasure in seeing the changes in that FIRA bill. It was one of the great bugaboos of federal-provincial relations particularly as it related to my province. One of the major discouragements, barriers and disincentives to investment in my part of the world was the FIRA legislation or, at least, the unfortunate piece of legislation that created the Foreign Investment Review Agency. I do not think there is any doubt at all that the review mechanism was a major deterrent. It can truthfully be said, and I agree, that the objectives of the FIRA legislation and of the agency itself were laudable. I do not think that anybody would object to Canadians controlling their own economy and restricting investment in Canada to Canadians. It sounds great to all of us to say that Canadians should be able to direct their investment flows within our own country and do our own thing in our own way. It sounds great, but I am afraid that as far as my part of the world is concerned, it is a Utopian dream. It does not recognize the realities of investment in this country. The major objective of any sound economic development plan should not be aimed at restricting the free flow of capital but rather should be aimed at the creation of wealth-producing jobs.

We, in Canada, do not object to major Canadian investments abroad. As a matter of fact, I think we would probably be very disturbed if the Americans, the Germans, the French or the Australians started to restrict our investments. It is true that there are countries that have restrictions on investments from foreign countries, but none of them has anything that comes close to being as blatant and as odious as the Foreign Investment Review Agency in Canada. There are restrictions in every country but most of them are far more subtle and far more sensitive than the FIRA operation was in our country.

In my province, the economic development of Newfoundland has had, sadly, very little support from Canadian investors. The sort of risk capital necessary for natural resource development has not been forthcoming from Canadian investors for whatever reason. Perhaps the capital is not available in sufficient quantities to justify risking long-term investment in mining or pulp and paper or in the fishing industry, or in related resource developments of whatever type. Our business people in Canada seem happier with large commercial real estate developments, office buildings, shopping centres, big-profit fast-return oil ventures with major government support. This is the sort of thing that seems to attract Canadian investors.

If they cannot see the investment from the window of their office on Bay Street, if they cannot count the cans before turning off the lights at night, they are not going to get involved. Or at least that has been our experience in the "far east," in Newfoundland.

Most of us would very much prefer to be all Canadian—all Canadian investment, all Canadian controlled. Without foreign investment, we would have no pulp and paper industry in Newfoundland. As Senator Sinclair has pointed out, the trend of British overseas offshore development changed in the 1950s, and there was a much larger influx of American capital for the iron mines in Labrador and various other projects, including the Churchill Falls development, which was British and American financed. By and large, there has been a relatively minor import of Canadian capital to our province. As a result, we have had to look to overseas investors.

When FIRA became involved, the complaint was invariably the same. We could point out that in practically all cases a FIRA application meant FIRA approval. It sometimes took an interminable amount of time, but in most cases approval was granted. Very rarely did FIRA reject an application. It was the mechanism itself that was very often the problem. Business people did not like baring their corporate souls to Ottawa, or, I suppose, to any bureaucracy. They did not like the idea of exposing all of their trade secrets, their business practices, their balance sheets, their history, their operating modes and manners to an unsympathetic and unknown bureaucracy.

In order to file for permission to invest in Canada, the businessman had to bare all of his corporate secrets to people he neither knew nor trusted. All of his secrets, all of his books—everything—had to be laid bare before the public service. And the process was a lengthy one, with no time limit. The original application could be extended at FIRA's request, and beyond the first extension there was no time limit. That, mercifully, will be changed under the proposed legislation.

Nor was it necessary for the bureaucracy to give a reason for an ultimate rejection or for an indefinite delay—which was, in effect, a rejection.

The decisions were made eventually, on the advice of the bureaucracy, by order in council. Since these were cabinet decisions, the reasoning behind them was very often not made known to the applicants.

The investor could be called back time and time again for explanation and for further information. And the further away from Ottawa, of course, the more difficult it was to deal with this rather amorphous body known as the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

I have to say up front that in many cases this impact was a psychological one. The rumour that FIRA was opposed to foreign investment was a strong one, and it grew stronger and stronger and stronger.

During the time that I occupied that ministry in Newfoundland, my counterpart in Ottawa was Alastair Gillespie, and at no time did he ever offer anything but encouragement. He assured us time and time again, with complete sincerity, that FIRA was not designed to discourage investment in places like Newfoundland. Any time that we ran into a problem, we were to contact him, and he would help to explain the workings of it.

But the sad story was that, even with the best intentions in the world, the business community was reluctant to keep coming to the public service to go through the process I have described.

So, the problem is not only the mechanism itself, but the psychology that surrounds the process. The message that went out, inadvertently or otherwise, was: "You can come in to Canada; you can invest. But you are not really welcome. You have to go through this process, and eventually, if your patience and your understanding of how government works is strong enough, you will probably get your application through."

FIRA was a deterrent to investment in Canada. I do not share the belief of Senator Sinclair that there are hundreds of millions, thousands of billions of dollars lined up across the Gulf of St. Lawrence waiting to be poured into Newfoundland. I am delighted to see that some of the barriers, whether real or psychological, have at least been diminished.

The name "Investment Canada" is far more attractive and positive than "Foreign Investment Review Agency," which really sounds a little bit iron-curtainish in some respects, if I can be delicate enough in expressing it in that way.

My God, I have mellowed since coming to Ottawa.

Senator Frith: Well, by admitting that that was indelicate, yes.

Senator Doody: In any event, in those disadvantaged areas where the need for capital is the greatest, the negative impact of FIRA was the greatest. If Canadian capital were available, perhaps the system could be justified. But apparently that is not the case. Canadian capital is not available. Canada desperately needs jobs; Newfoundland more than desperately needs jobs.

We had a heart-breaking debate in this chamber yesterday during which the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate described the plight of his friends and constituents in Cape Breton.

I feel reasonably certain that the people who are being displaced in Port Hawkesbury and in Canso would not be too concerned about where the investment to create jobs came from. The idea of prospective investors having to beat their way through the Foreign Investment Review Agency would not be too happily accepted by them. The idea of a more positive approach is desperately needed in Canada generally, and in eastern Canada in particular.

I can say with complete sincerity that I am very pleased with the changes proposed in this bill. I have absolutely no hesitation in endorsing the bill. I think it is a great step forward.

While it certainly isn't the complete answer to the unemployment problem in Canada, it is a big step forward in creating the kind of atmosphere that will attract the business community and thus lead to jobs. I, for one, am very pleased to endorse it.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on this very important legislation. In my view, some changes to the existing Foreign Investment Review Agency legislation would have been inevitable regardless of the government in power.

As we all know, FIRA, for whatever reason, had acquired an image abroad as a symbol of hostility to foreign investment. This image was, I believe, sometimes exaggerated, sometimes blown out of proportion. In many cases, it was an image that was not deserved. But there is no denying that it was an image that did exist and constituted a problem which would have to be addressed.

Former DRIE minister Ed Lumley had suggested last spring that, as a start, the agency's name should indeed be changed to Investment Canada, as Bill C-15 proposes to do.

Eleven years of experience with the Foreign Investment Review Act had revealed deficiencies and shortcomings which needed to be remedied. Such an outcome is to be expected with any pioneering legislation.

It is impossible, of course, to anticipate all situations that might arise with a new legislative framework, but there is no question that changes are in order.

The amendments proposed in Bill C-15 speak to many of the problems that have emerged with the screening mechanism that has been in place over the past 11 years; but they also leave much unaddressed, in my opinion. Some of the proposals provide grounds for serious concern.

Some of these issues I shall take up later. Before doing so, perhaps a brief review of FIRA's operation and performance to date will help place the proposals contained in Bill C-15 in proper perspective.

Under the Foreign Investment Review Act, virtually all takeovers of Canadian businesses by foreign controlled companies, as well as the establishment of new businesses in Canada by non-Canadians, are subject to review. Only those investments which are assessed or judged by the review process to be of significant benefit to Canada are allowed to proceed.

FIRA sets out five criteria to be considered in assessing whether an investment proposal is likely to result in significant benefits. Those include the effect of the investment on economic activity, efficiency and competition, the degree and the significance of Canadian participation in the proposed investment, and the compatibility of the proposed investment with domestic industrial and economic policies.

All decisions on whether to accept or reject an investment are made by the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. In making his assessment, the minister is advised by the Foreign Investment Review Agency which was established by the act for this very purpose. As a matter of practice, I am assured that FIRA has always consulted with those provinces affected by an investment proposal prior to tendering its advice to the minister.

In the early 1970s when adoption of a foreign investment screening mechanism was being discussed, as mentioned by Senator Kelly and, I believe, alluded to by Senator Sinclair earlier today, more than one third of all business activity was carried out by foreign controlled enterprises. Since then foreign control of Canadian industry has declined to about one quarter of the total business sector. But even at this much lower level, the extent of foreign ownership in Canada remains among the highest in the industrialized world. No one is going to argue with the suggestion that foreign investment is beneficial and even necessary to healthy economic development. Senator Doody has made reference to his own province of Newfoundland. I make reference to the province of Nova Scotia and, indeed, to the entire Atlantic area and other disadvantaged areas of Canada. It can improve access to scarce capital, and capital is very scarce in our region of Canada. It can improve access to entrepreneurship, to managerial skills and to new technology.

However, it has costs and it has risks as well. Beyond the income flows that accrue to foreign investors, foreign investment has the potential to stifle indigenous skills and, indeed, entrepreneurship. All too frequently, foreign subsidiaries amount to little more than assembly operations in Canada with severe self-imposed restrictions on what they can produce and where they can export. The most significant corporate activities such as planning research and development is done by the parent firm or in the firm's home country, and I believe that this is something that has to be addressed. As a result the capacities of the host country in these areas are reduced and, indeed, stunted. There is also the danger that high levels of foreign ownership and control with the attendant decision making centres abroad can impede a country's ability to pursue policies suited to its domestic needs or in accord with its own national priorities.

The recognition that foreign investment is generally beneficial but that it also carries costs and risks which on occasion may outweigh the benefits, has provided the inducement for the adoption of a screening mechanism giving the government the power to examine investment proposals on a case-by-case basis to ensure that they are compatible with Canada's interests. Senator Sinclair made reference this afternoon to statements made by the Prime Minister and, indeed, by other members of his cabinet that Canada is now open for business. Senator Sinclair justifiably and properly said that Canada was never closed for business.

Senator Doody: Only parts of it.

Senator Graham: FIRA, despite widespread impressions to the contrary, was never meant to block or discourage foreign investment in Canada but, rather, to ensure that whatever investment took place was in Canada's interests. On the basis of its performance, when you carefully examine the facts, it is difficult to make the case that FIRA was a significant deterrent or major stumbling block to foreign investors. Of the 7,053 investment applications resolved from the time of the act's proclamation on April 9, 1974 to March 31, 1985, some 5,981 were allowed, 435 were disallowed and 637 were withdrawn by the applicant before a decision had been rendered. Thus in more than four out of five cases foreign investment proposals have been approved and only one in twenty has been rejected.

I acknowledge that these statistics in themselves do not prove that FIRA has not been an irritant to foreign investors. But they do suggest that it has not been the significant negative factor that it has so often been made out to be. Besides, the act applies only to a relatively small proportion of all foreign and direct investment in Canada, because more than 80 per cent consists of non-reviewable investments for modernization or expansion of foreign firms already established in Canada. Of course, many more factors in the screening mechanism alone bear upon one's decision of where to invest one's capital. So taking the proposals together those who fear that paring down the screening mechanism along the lines proposed in Bill C-15 would lead to a sell-out of Canada are perhaps being unduly alarmed, and those who anticipate a huge inflow of new investment to result from the Bill C-15 proposals, I believe, are being excessively optimistic. I hope that I will be proven wrong—

Senator Doody: Me too.

Senator Phillips: It won't be the first time.

Senator Graham: —in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and all the other disadvantaged areas of the country.

As already noted, Bill C-15 will institute a number of positive changes in the existing investment screening mechanism, but it contains a number of shortcomings as well. In light of the generally negative perception that foreign investors have of FIRA, a conscious attempt has obviously been made with Bill C-15 to convey the message that Canada welcomes foreign investment. Thus in addition to the screening process and the screening purpose which alone animates the Foreign Investment Review Act, Bill C-15 also stresses in clause 2 the aim, "to encourage investment in Canada by Canadians and non-Canadians that contributes to economic growth and employment opportunities." Paragraph 5(1)(a) says that to this end it enjoins the minister to, "encourage business investment by such means and in such manner as the Minister deems appropriate."

The intent expressed here is really not unusual. By all accounts Canada, a resource rich and economically young country, will continue to rely on foreign capital for much of its investment needs in the years ahead. Beyond the general statement already quoted, however, the bill is very silent on how the government proposes to do this. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill could describe to us the role of Investment Canada in this regard. What form of federal-provincial collaboration is envisaged? What, if any, special consideration will be given to Canada's economically depressed regions? Without any details the new mandate embodied in the bill has left little more than a tantalizing promise, and we have had evidence in the past couple of weeks of how valid and how solid promises made by this government might be at the present time.

Honourable senators, a distinct lack of precision also characterizes some of the bill's provisions setting out the classes of investment that would be subject to review. I believe that this is unfortunate since the general thrust of the bill toward a less comprehensive definition of reviewable investments has on the whole been welcomed and has been greeted with favour. One can quibble about the actual level of the take-over thresholds chosen. Some think them too high; others think them not high enough, but there is little argument with the principle that some of the smallest and least significant investments should be exempted from review. The alternative damages Canada's image as a hospitable place in which to invest; it clutters up the review process needlessly and absorbs scarce resources for which better uses can be found elsewhere. The exemption from review of most new businesses is also justifiable, generally speaking. The establishment of a new business is most likely to enhance investment, employment and consumer choice.

• (1620)

As a precaution against small but significant investment escaping review, the bill provides the government with the reserve power to review any investment, regardless of size, if it falls within a business activity that, and I quote from clause 15 of the bill:

—is related to Canada's cultural heritage or national identity;

However, it fails to specify what business activities fall within the rubric of "cultural heritage or national identity." This lapse or oversight was cited by several witnesses appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Regional Development, which reviewed the bill. A more precise definition of the scope of this reserve power would reduce the sphere for cabinet discretion in this regard, and provide potential investors with greater certainty about what constitutes a reviewable transaction. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill could also provide some clarification on this point.

Suggestions have also been made that other areas of the economy should be included in what is known as the reserve review power set out in the bill. In particular, I am thinking of the high technology sector which has been widely favoured as an area for inclusion. Technology is vital to Canada's growth and development. As Science Council chairman, Dr. Stuart Smith, forcefully argued before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Regional Development, the most innovative companies in fields of advanced technology are often relatively small but their small size does not mean that they lack economic significance. Therefore the review thresholds proposed in Bill C-15 would not by themselves ensure that takeovers of significance to the innovative capacity of the Canadian economy would be captured by the screening process.

However, honourable senators, perhaps my biggest concern of all is that Bill C-15, by transferring decision making authority from the full cabinet to a single minister, would leave that minister with too much discretion and arbitrary power without right of appeal. It would substitute the judgment of one minister for the collective judgment of cabinet, and remove as well a formal channel—and I want to underline and emphasize this point—it removes a formal channel through which regional ministers are able to participate in investment decisions and to insert regional concerns into the review process. The reason given for the proposed change is that full cabinet review constitutes a cumbersome and time-consuming process. A compromise suggested by former FIRA commissioner, Gorse Howarth, would be to place decision making power with a cabinet committee specifically formed for that purpose. Given the record size of the present cabinet, I would think that it would not be too difficult to find five ministers, for instance, to sit on a committee to encourage, and indeed enforce, the intent of this very important legislation.

In addition to the advantage of collective judgment and regional input, such an arrangement would also result in greater continuity and consistency in decisions under the new act.

As you know, ministers sometimes change portfolios and, with all of that power vested in one minister, when a new minister is brought into that particular portfolio, for example, that new minister, quite properly, would wish to put his or her own stamp upon the direction that this particular legislation was to take. Therefore the direction established by one minister might be altered significantly by his successor, thus providing for a lack of consistency and continuity. I am not saying that new directions and new ideas should be ruled out, but I do believe that a group of ministers, acting together, might help to avoid any resulting confusion.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to make the point again that Canada needs and welcomes foreign investment to help it in its economic development and growth. Bill C-15 is intended to emphasize this fact, while simultaneously making provisions for reviewing significant new investment by non-Canadians to ensure that they are of benefit to Canada. Compared to the existing screening mechanism under the Foreign Investment Review Act, Bill C-15 would reduce substantially the number of investment transactions that are subject to review, and would expedite considerably the review process involved. These changes should make the regulatory process a lesser impediment to inflows of foreign investment. These are the bill's beneficial effects.

On the other side, I am seriously concerned that the bill risks exempting significant investments from review, thereby reducing the government's ability to influence its quality and its direction. It also tends to make the review process less sensitive to regional concerns, and lacks precision in some of its provisions. I hope that the sponsor of the bill, in his wisdom, will be able to address the concerns that I have expressed and, indeed, that the government, as usual, will take very careful note of my recommendations.

I thank honourable senators for their kind attention.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, perhaps I should preface my remarks with a piece of information. Approximately ten weeks ago, in anticipation of this very afternoon, I acquired laryngitis and it will not easily go away until this afternoon's work is done. However, laryngitis does produce brevity and it does avoid what Senator Sinclair described as a tendency to be strident. It is very difficult to be strident when your voice will not even rise with the syllables.

I was impressed that both Senators Graham and Sinclair made reference to what I might perhaps call a slogan, that "Canada is open for business." However, I had not read that slogan in the same context as they had. I had read it and included it right on the first page of my notes because, from a variety of correspondence abroad, I had understood that to be the consensus of people who were in the investment industry in Britain, in the United States, in Japan and in other countries and who might have a dollar or two to drop down to meet some Canadian opportunity or some Canadian challenge.

"Open for business." Not a bad slogan, in a world where the investment business is going through hard times. It is not a question any more of how rigid one can be; it is not a question of how open one can be; it is a question of being there and trying for what is legitimate, right and useful to the Canadian process.

• (1630)

Being open for business alone will not be enough to meet our needs for new and venturesome investment. The Conference Board of Canada has taken note of the hazards ahead which do not mean "it is not possible to attract investment, but it isn't the 1950s or the 1960s any more."

When the minister introduced the bill last December, he emphasized:

The Investment Canada Bill is one measure among many this Government intends to take to dismantle needless barriers to enterprise in this country.

The government's intentions to respond to international expectations are to be seen in the budget and will be evident wherever we have the opportunity to clarify or enhance our reputation as reasonable and eager partners.

But do not let us, in this debate, in any way detract from the singular importance of Investment Canada. Its replacement of the Foreign Investment Review Agency does so much to demolish the petty, bureaucratic and often inane pretensions of the 1974 legislation that it stands on its own as a forward and positive response to Canadian needs.

It exempts all new businesses from review. It limits review of direct acquisition by non-Canadians to businesses with assets of $5 million or more and indirect acquisitions, resulting from the acquisition of parent companies outside Canada, where the Canadian subsidiary acquired has assets of $50 million or more.

In terms of actual cases, both take overs and new investments, the new agency will screen only 10 per cent of what it does now. The government reserves rights in the culturally sensitive sectors, including publishing, film production and distribution.

Of immense importance is the fact that the bill provides for a specific mandate to encourage investment for growth and jobs. It provides information services and advises businesses and investors on opportunities and contacts. A somersault over the negativism of the previous government with its agency designed exclusively to find out what was wrong with attempts made from abroad to join in Canadian development.

In the lifetime of most of us in this chamber, Canada was a place that could take pride or whatever satisfaction seemed suitable for calling a spade a spade. In my town we had a rickety old building called the House of Refuge and, not a few blocks away, another monument to social conscience called the Home of the Friendless. Not far away, in Toronto, we prided ourselves on the existence of the Hospital for Incurable Children. However sympathetic those institutions might have been, they invited those who passed through their portals to abandon all hope. The Foreign Investment Review Agency—by its very name, and particularly by its acronym, FIRA—invited would-be investors or partners in the Canadian process to enter with little hope of refuge, fear of treatment as the friendless or identification as outfits incurably hostile to Canadian nationalism.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators opposite will argue that none of these dreadful doubts should have been raised about FIRA, that the agency never cost us an industry worth having or delayed an application for approval to the point where eagerness turned to despair and the good people concerned simply went home.

Whatever it was, FIRA earned itself the best international reputation since Mata Hari, even before the estimable industry minister of the day threatened to strengthen the agency's powers and sharpen its appetites. Not even the minister's government would swallow that.

When the Investment Canada Bill was introduced, Keith Dixon, President of the Canadian Importers' Association, expressed delight. He said: "Anything is an improvement over FIRA." He went on to say:

I've just come back from a trip to the United States and FIRA is regarded like a mad dog down there.

Well, perhaps not a mad dog, but an ill-conceived agency that brought us no good.

The government has done something about that.

On motion of Senator Frith, on behalf of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF FIFTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates 1985-86), presented in the Senate on 30th May, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take a few minutes of your time to respond to the speech made on Tuesday last by the Honourable Senator Leblanc. First of all, I should like to congratulate Senator Leblanc, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, for an excellent speech and report. That is not unusual from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It has a long tradition of excellent reports and excellent chairmen.

Senator Frith: Don't push!

Senator Doody: The Senate agreed long before I arrived that the proper function of the Senate Committee on National Finance in looking at the estimates would be to have it take a particular item and deal with it as best it could. That tradition has resulted in excellent results.

In studying this particular set of estimates, the committee held hearings on the aspects of post-secondary education. Of the five hearings which were held, I had the good fortune to be able to attend four. As was the chairman, I was struck by the complexity of the problem and the extent of the questions that kept surfacing every time we tried to examine an issue. That is not an easy area to understand. It seems like there were wheels travelling within wheels.

Despite my previous somewhat biased impression, it is clear that the Government of Canada has a clear and substantial role to play in the post-secondary education system. The federal government, in 1985-86, plans to spend $2.3 billion in cash and another $2.2 billion in tax transfers under the Extended Programs Financing. I do not need to remind honourable senators that those transfers to the provinces are unconditional in this particular area. I would think that the Parliament of Canada does have some responsibilities in this regard in looking for some accountability on the spending of that money. After all, $4.5 billion is quite a lot of money, and increases in that amount would be made, I suspect, grudgingly from the public treasury, in light of so many calls on it at this time.

● (1640)

For this reason, somehow, somewhere, somebody, and why not the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, should take up this issue, as proposed by Mr. Johnson, who prepared a report for the Secretary of State. He indicated that he felt the object of simultaneously meeting the objective of equality of access to universities and the objective of internationally renowned excellence may not be possible. That is an interesting concept, and I think it is one that should be looked at.

Another point that struck me was the issue of research in our post-secondary institutions. There seems to be common agreement that some research is necessary, and that more research is better. How much more, I do not know. Senator Marsden spoke to that issue quite eloquently a little while ago. I have been doing a little research in that respect, and I hope to speak about it at a later time. It is an important question, and one that needs to be looked at.

The federal government supports research at universities through the Medical Research Council, the Social Science and Humanity Research Council, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and through countless special programs which individual departments operate. Surely, this makes involvement in post-secondary education a federal concern. But still, post-secondary education, and education generally, is quite clearly spelled out in the Constitution as the concern of the provinces, and it is a concern of the provinces, not simply the educational aspect, but there are provinces that have traditions and cultures of their own which are intertwined with the educational system, and they very jealously, and quite properly, protect these areas of interest to these particular provinces. There is a great fear of federal government encroachment in this area.

Some of the provinces can see a single approach, one national strategy, for post-secondary education which gives them cause for concern, so there is a need for funding from the federal government and a need for economy in the provinces. They are not compatible. The danger is that perhaps the federal government does not have the experience or the knowledge to handle these programs or this policy, or the strategy, as well as the provinces with their experience. Certainly the record of federal governments to date in post-secondary educational efforts for our aboriginal people, for whom they have responsibility, does not strike me as a very great success record compared with what some of the provinces have accomplished.

In any event, honourable senators, for these and for a number of other reasons I very strongly support Senator Leblanc's request that the committee look at post-secondary education and the various aspects and concerns attached to it. He already has a reference from the Senate, so a further reference is not necessary at all. I simply wanted to add my voice in endorsement of his request.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this order is considered as have been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 17, 1985, at 8 p.m.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Perhaps he could inform this chamber of the average age of the people in Calgary who have petitioned the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REPLY TO PETITIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would respect the ancient and undoubted right of the senior citizens of Calgary and area to have a reply to the petitions that have just been presented and that, when that reply is prepared and ready, he will bring it to this chamber.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly look into that matter. I am not familiar with the procedure in this particular house as it relates to petitions. I know that the system in my own legislature was a time-honoured and respected one, and we were hammered on a daily basis by the opposition in that chamber. I can see no reason why the same thing should not happen here, and if it is part of the procedure in this chamber, I shall certainly see to it that the appropriate reply is returned to the chamber.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I would advise the Acting Leader of the Government that it is a question of following the matter up and making sure that there is a reply, in order that all of these petitions do not just simply disappear into the system. That is the commitment I was really asking of the Acting Leader of the Government.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman has far more experience of things disappearing into the system than I have, and I will, therefore, profit from his advice in this matter.

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Indian Act.

He said: Honourable senators, at third reading of this bill in the other place the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said that the passage of the bill was an historic moment, and I must say that I fully agree with him. Consideration of this bill marks the first time since 1951 that Parliament has made substantial revisions to the Indian Act.

● (2020)

In our work on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and certainly in my own work on the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I have had some exposure to the workings of the act. Particularly those of us who took part in a pre-study of this bill in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have had some graphic evidence of the effects on Indian people and their communities. It takes no great insight into the situation of Indian people in Canada to state that these proposed changes are long overdue.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, during its pre-study hearings on the subject, heard from many witnesses representing what, I suggest, would be pretty well every point of view that there could be on the bill. One thing that struck me above all is the complexity of issues dealt with in and affected by this legislative proposal.

I think the minister is to be commended for piloting this bill over terrain which many previous ministers have feared to tread. I have watched closely the progress of the bill in the other place and its committee, and I believe that it constitutes a fair and reasonable approach to an extremely difficult set of issues.

The bill does not solve all of the problems of the Indian Act. It is not intended to. Much remains to be done. As I was taught during my five years' experience in this chamber by the then Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Frith, who used always to say that one should be happy with half a loaf, for many this will, indeed, be half a loaf. There are many people who advocate further change or more extensive change, but I am suggesting to honourable senators that at this point in time, having regard to what I think are reasonably complex issues, this is a compromise worth accepting, and that it will serve the needs of Indian peoples.

The bill deals with two specific problems, and I suggest that it does so in a commendable way. The minister, in presenting the bill for second reading in the other place, said that the purpose of the bill was to correct two historic wrongs in Canada's legislation governing Indian people. He described these wrongs as, first, discriminatory treatment based on sex, and second, the control by the government of membership in Indian communities. He went on to describe these two issues in their historic context, and I should like to quote briefly from his comments because they illustrate eloquently the nature of the problem that this bill, hopefully, resolves.

Senator Frith: That is a good use of the word "hopefully."

Senator Nurgitz: He said:

In the early days of Confederation Canada consisted only of the Maritime Provinces, parts of Ontario and parts of Quebec. The balance of the great land was the territory of the aboriginal peoples. At that time the Parliament of Canada took upon itself to define through the Indian Act who it would recognize as having Indian status. As Canada took over those Indian lands, hundreds of thousands of people and their descendants fell unknowingly into a category of people whose lives would become dominated almost totally by the federal Government.

The legal definition of who was an Indian reflected the nature of Canadian society at the time. A woman followed her husband's status. He alone had civil and political rights and he alone could pass them to his children. This 19th century view was reflected throughout the Indian Act. An Indian woman would, parliamentarians of the day reasoned, be taken care of by her white man and therefore would no longer need to be an Indian. She was enfranchised to use the terminology of the act.

I will come back to that question because some of you may wonder where the term "enfranchised" comes into play. To continue the quotation:

For her, the price of marriage was her status as an Indian.

It is sad to say that these legal definitions continue to the present day. The result is a lengthy list of hotly debated issues. These include questions like who is an Indian, who determines who belongs to a band, who should be registered as having Indian status, what should be done with people who lost status unfairly and with their children, and what is enfranchisement and why do we still have it? All of these issues mean little to most Canadians but they are critical, urgent and important questions to Indian people. That is why federal governments have been under pressure from many fronts for many years, both in and out of Parliament to remove sexual discrimination from the Indian Act.

When one speaks of the kinds of pressures that we undergo just on that point alone, I am sure honourable senators will recall the Sandra Lovelace case which was the case of an Indian girl who made an application to the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations alleging that the operation of section 12(1)(b)—and that is a section in the existing act that says that if an Indian female marries a non-Indian she loses her status—was in breach of Article XXVII of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights of which our country is a signatory.

In 1981 the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations deemed Canada to be in breach of Article XXVII of the covenant.

The minister then went on to discuss how this question looks from an Indian point of view. He said:

Indian people have consistently objected to the federal government intruding into the governing of their communities and nations. What greater intrusion can there be than the arrogance of assuming the right to tell another people of another culture and tradition who is and who is not a member of their community and who can and cannot live on their own lands?

The resolution to the two historic wrongs, referred to by the minister, is based on three principles which form the very heart of this bill: one, removal of discrimination; two, band control of membership; and three, as a result of those two the third point, restoration of rights.

Dealing with the first point, the bill eliminates all forms of sexual discrimination in the act. No longer will a woman's or a child's entitlement to be registered as an Indian be determined by the status of their husband or their father. All persons will be treated equally. Implementation of this principle will bring the Indian Act into accord with section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which recently came into effect.

The second principle, band control of membership, ensures that for the first time since Confederation Indian First Nations will be recognized by the federal government as being able to assume meaningful control over the determination of their band membership.

● (2030)

The third basic principle incorporated in the bill is restoration of rights. This bill ensures that all persons who lost rights directly as a result of sexual discrimination in the Indian Act will be entitled to have their rights restored.

To those uninitiated in the intricacies of Indian life in Canada, these three principles may seem simple and easy to implement. Let me assure you, this is not the case. Most observers will readily agree that all three principles are valid and, taken by themselves, appear to be quite reasonable, but there is, unfortunately, the potential for deep-rooted and serious conflict among these principles.

Is it possible to eliminate discrimination and restore rights, yet still respect the right of bands to control membership? If membership is returned as a matter of right to a large number of people, has the power of the band to control membership been diluted? On the other hand, is it reasonable to give bands membership powers which might prevent some people from regaining rights lost as a result of discrimination?

These were the kinds of issues faced by the minister in drafting the bill. In my view, the solution he has devised constitutes a careful and a fair balance among the three basic principles I have outlined. For one of the basic principles to be predominant could only be done at the expense of the others. This bill avoids such extremes.

Having said that, no one gets 100 per cent of what they sought, but each group gets something important. There is no other fair path, I suggest, that we can follow.

I should like to take a moment to underline the key elements of this bill. First, the bill removes sexual discrimination from the Indian Act for the future. Under the present Indian Act, Indian status and band membership generally depends on one's husband or father. The most notorious form of discrimination is found in section 12(1)(b), to which I referred, which provides that an Indian woman marrying a non-Indian loses all her rights; conversely, her brother loses nothing by marrying a non-Indian, indeed, her sister-in-law becomes an Indian, as do all her brother's children. Bill C-31 abolishes this blatant inequity. In the future Indian men and women will have exactly the same rights. No one will gain or lose their rights as Indians through marriage. Children of mixed Indian/non-Indian marriages will inherit Indian status in the same way, whether their Indian parent is their mother or their father.

Other provisions relating to inheritance, desertion and the definition of a child will eliminate unequal treatment based on sex or whether a person was born in or out of wedlock. For the future, the Indian Act will be stripped of what has been termed "sexist orientation."

Second, I shall describe how bands may assume, once again, control of their own membership. Before the Europeans came to this continent and long afterwards, Indians themselves defined who their people were. Most Indians assert that they never gave up this central aspect of nationhood. The fact remains, however, that over 100 years ago, in 1876, the Government of Canada passed an Indian Act which made the definition of "bands" a matter of federal law. That regime has persisted with little change to this very day. Bill C-31 will change all this. For the first time in over a century the federal government will recognize the right of bands to determine who are their members.

The transfer involves meeting only three criteria: (a) the majority of band electors must consent to assuming control and to specific membership rules; (b) appropriate notice must be given before band electors are asked to make these decisions; and (c) the acquired rights of existing band members and those to be restored to band membership must be respected.

If these conditions are met, the minister will be required to shift control of the band list to the band itself.

Third, there will be a program to restore rights lost unfairly through sexual discrimination or otherwise. Most importantly in this regard, the 16,000 women who lost their rights as a result of marrying a non-Indian, will regain both Indian status and band membership.

Three other groups totalling about 2,000 people will also regain status and band membership. Included in this group of 2,000 there are: children who had band membership and lost it when their mothers married non-Indians; illegitimate children of female Indians who lost band membership when non-Indian paternity was determined; and children whose mothers and maternal grandmothers were non-Indians and who lost their band membership at the age of 21. In addition, those people who enfranchised voluntarily under subsection 109(1)—that is, those who themselves applied to give up their rights, as well as their wives and children who were enfranchised with them—will be entitled to regain registration under the act. Band membership for this group, which numbers about 8,000, will be decided according to band membership rules.

The first generation descendants of all of these people, both the victims of sexual discrimination and the families that enfranchised voluntarily, will be eligible for first-time registration as status Indians under the Indian Act. This group of descendants is estimated to number about 50,000. Again, band membership for this group will be a matter for the bands to decide.

If a band does not act within two years of Royal Assent to Bill C-31 to assume control of its own membership, then band membership for that band will be administered by the federal government. In such cases, Indian status will confer band membership, as has been the long-standing federal policy. People granted status under this bill would be among those gaining band membership in those circumstances. The government expects, however, that most bands will act within the two years to assume control of their own memberships.

The final key element that I would like to mention is the abolition of this term "enfranchisement." This curious term is used in the present act in just about the reverse of what people would assume it to mean. It is used to describe the process of giving up Indian status. It dates from a time when the only way Indians could obtain the vote—that is, to become "enfranchised," according to the meaning we might give the term—would be to renounce their "Indian-ness." This assimilationist policy has been an anachronism since 1961, when the Diefenbaker government gave Indians the right to vote in federal elections. I am pleased to confirm that Bill C-31 eliminates this offensive concept from the act.

The principal elements of Bill C-31, then, are: the removal of sexual discrimination for the future, band control of band membership, restoration of rights for those who lost them through sexual discrimination and elimination of the concept of enfranchisement.

Major changes have been made to the original Bill C-31 by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The elements I have just described to honourable senators were, for the most part, contained in the original version of Bill C-31. Members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will be familiar with these points. I have gone over this in some detail for the benefit of all honourable senators, and I would now like to summarize the major amendments made to the bill during the course of its consideration in the House of Commons.

I have already dealt with one such change relating to those who were enfranchised under subsection 109(1). In the bill, as it was tabled in the House of Commons, only certain cateries of those so enfranchised were defined as "unfair," examples of which included including persons enfranchised as a result of joining the Canadian Armed Forces, as absurd as that may sound, or those enfranchised in order to obtain or maintain employment. During the hearings of the House of Commons committee, it became clear that the distinction between fair and unfair enfranchisement was tenuous. Accordingly, the minister moved to amend the bill as I described earlier. All those enfranchised under subsection 109(1) of the former Indian Act will regain Indian status if they so wish. On the other hand, to restore band membership directly for this group will intrude too far on the principle of band control, so the amendments also provided for band rules to determine whether those enfranchised regained band membership. This change has been well received by most observers and by both opposition parties in the House of Commons.

• (2040)

Amendments led to a further strengthening of band control. The original bill provided for an explicit bylaw power pursuant to which bands would regulate residence on reserves. One amendment gives bands the power to prohibit intoxicants or regulate their use on the reserve. The provision was included in the bill to plug a gap created by a series of cases in the courts, and in particular two cases that were heard in my home province of Manitoba, one being The Queen vs. Edwin Bear, which was a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba, and the second being The Queen vs. Hayden, which was a decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in October of 1983.

Both cases concerned individuals apprehended with intoxicants on a reserve, and the court held, in both cases, that the section of the Indian Act which prohibits intoxicants on reserves is in violation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. To apply its provisions is to discriminate on the basis of race.

That was section 97 of the former act. There was an Alberta case as well.

I should mention, also, that, in respect of the judgment of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, the federal Department of Justice attempted to obtain leave of the Supreme Court of Canada to have the matter heard by that court, and leave was not granted. I assume, therefore, that there is some ground to believe that the court, in hearing the application for leave, either found the judgment of the Manitoba Court of Appeal to be sound, or saw no reason why it would reverse such a finding—

Senator Frith: Or that it had no pan-Canadian significance. However, I would not think that would be a good ground for refusing the application in this case.

Senator Nurgitz: I think not. In any event, section 97, which deals with the possession of intoxicants on reserves, has been removed. In essence, the changes made through these amendments provide for something akin to municipal bylaws in this respect. I am sure all honourable senators are familiar with the fact that there are municipalities in our country that are still "dry," prohibiting the sale of alcohol and spirits within their bounds. This would be a similar provision, pursuant to which an Indian band could regulate the availability of alcohol on reserves.

An amendment to section 81 strengthens the means to enforce band by-laws. In brief, it takes the penalty of $100 as set in 1950 and, applying an indexation factor, brings it up to $1,000—a more realistic level in 1985.

Some amendments serve to provide better protection for bands. For example, after Royal Assent has been given to Bill C-31 a full two years will be available for bands to adopt their own membership rules, rather than two years from April 17, 1985, the effective date of the Charter. The original bill said that it would be two years from the date that the Charter came into effect. With the amendment, it will be two years from the date on which the bill receives Royal Assent.

Another amendment ensures that subsection 11(2) will not come into effect inadvertently—and subsection 11(2) is the subsection which would give band membership to first generation descendants of what are referred as section 12(1)(b) women—if a band does not adopt its own rules within two years.

The fear was that a band might develop and submit its rules in good faith and on time, but there could be some delay in approval, allowing subsection 11(2) to come into effect, notwithstanding the band's intentions. The amendment in subclause 10(7) states that membership rules will be effective from the date that notice is given to the minister by the band, rather than from the date of approval.

A third amendment requires the minister to report to Parliament in detail within two years on the implementation of this bill. This provision will keep the pressure on the government to live up to its commitment to make sure that bands will not become worse off as a result of the passage of Bill C-31. Further, section 64.1 is expanded to permit bands to restrict access to programs financed by the band's own money in the case of persons restored to band membership who received large pay-outs of band funds when they lost their membership. Although this provision will only affect, perhaps, a dozen bands, it will ensure that those who received large pay-outs cannot benefit a second time. If an individual has left the band and asked for and received his or her distributive share, if you like, that individual cannot now rejoin without repaying the moneys received. And on that, so that it is not reduced to trivial matters, the first $1,000 of such a pay-out would not have to be repaid, thereby removing trivial cases from the rolls.

Still other amendments will encourage fairness in various other ways. For example, appropriate notice is now required prior to band votes on proposed membership rules.

Another change related to a reduction in the age of majority in the Indian Act from age 21 to age 18, to conform with general federal practice. Also, the definition of "adopted child" has been broadened to include children adopted in accordance with Indian custom and not only those adopted according to provincial laws dealing with adoption.

The standing committee of the House of Commons also deleted clause 14.4 as it appeared in the original version of Bill C-31. This clause provided for the right to remove one's name from the Indian Register on a band list maintained in the department. Many witnesses criticized this provision as a holdover of the enfranchisement concept. They fear that people might once again be induced to give up their rights. After considerable debate, all parties in the Commons agreed to delete that clause.

There was a lengthy debate, as well, in the House of Commons dealing with the so-called high impact bands. The point was made that some bands might be affected disproportionately on the average number of people entitled to regain band membership. We heard evidence in our committee of bands as small as 38 members. If 50 people were returning to that band as a result of Bill C-31, that 50 would control, in essence, the band. There are rules providing for percentages only to be allowed back in—and that runs over a seven-year period—to ease the pressure on what are referred to as "high impact" bands.

One proposal before the standing committee of the other place called for a transitional list for those who would otherwise be entitled to regain band membership under Bill C-31. Such a proposal would leave to the band decisions on band membership for everyone in cases where band membership was projected to increase by 20 per cent or more. The committee rejected that proposal, since some of those normally entitled to regain membership under the bill might remain on the transitional list indefinitely. This would undermine the principle of restoration of rights which is central to this bill. For that reason, the 10 per cent rule was brought in to deal with that kind of problem.

The government is confident that the provisions already in Bill C-31, and particularly those related to band control of membership and bylaw power on residence, should provide ample protection if there are problems which have not been foreseen. Such problems could be dealt with when Parliament reviews the implementation of Bill C-31. As honourable senators will note, this review will take place in two years' time.

And, finally, in discussing the handling of Bill C-31 in the House of Commons, I should like to comment briefly on the issue of broadening access to Indian status and band membership to more people.

Various amendments to this effect were proposed by the opposition. The government in fact, as I have noted, did expand access to status to all of those enfranchised under subsection 109(1). The government is not prepared at this time to go further. The bands, of course, will be able to accept whomever they wish as band members. No doubt many descendants of those regaining membership under Bill C-31 will themselves become band members under band rules. But to impose on the bands membership for persons who were never band members would make the principle of band control meaningless.

● (2050)

On the question of the scope of those gaining Indian status under the bill, I should point out that up to 70,000 people will be eligible for status and band membership under the provisions of Bill C-31.

To include just one more generation—that is, to go from mother to child to grandchild—would add anywhere from 40,000 to 70,000 more; and from reading the committee proceedings and the debates of the house, one will see that the minister thought that that would mean going further than he was prepared to go at this time with this bill.

Honourable senators, it is impossible to undo all of the residue of past discrimination. Nevertheless, the government is convinced that Bill C-31, as passed by the House of Commons, provides a generous and virtually unprecedented measure of redress for past wrongs under the Indian Act.

There were also a number of technical clarifications and improvements adopted in the bill, which I need not go into.

It would be naive for me to suggest that large increases in the current number of status Indians that would result from this bill would not have significant financial implications for the government. The government is fully aware of the need to ensure that the bill will be implemented in a fair way and that adequate funding is provided. To that end the minister has given an assurance that, in fact, there will be no shortage of funds to provide for full implementation of this bill.

The objective of the government is to ensure that people restored to status can enjoy the full range of programs and services to which they, as status Indians, are entitled. That will be accomplished without altering the current situation in which individual Indians and their communities find themselves.

The minister has pointed out that he is aware of the need to implement this legislation as quickly as possible. Many individuals and communities are anxiously awaiting passage of this bill, and I suggest, honourable senators, that there is some urgency.

The bill came into effect, in essence, on April 17, when section 12(1)(b), even without judgment of a court, would obviously be ineffective. To all intents and purposes the discriminatory section can hardly be said to be in effect, because of the effective date of April 17.

The longer the gap between that date and the date of Royal Assent, the greater the danger of legal complications arising from conflicts between the provisions of this proposed bill, Bill C-31, and those of the Indian Act.

Immediately following Royal Assent being given to the bill, the government is prepared to begin the implementation process. Individuals eligible for restoration will be made aware of how to apply to regain their rights. Bands will be assisted in assuming control over their own membership. Steps will be taken to ensure that bands are able to cope effectively with their new band members.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

The problems dealt with by this bill have created wounds in some Indian communities which will take time to heal. But I believe that, in time, most individual Indians and bands touched by the legislation will agree that it constitutes an important and necessary step forward.

I use the word "step" advisedly, because this legislation is only a beginning. What lies ahead for us is to deal with the other critical issues facing Canada's Indian people.

Foremost among issues to be resolved is that of Indian self-government. That is the course to which many wish to dedicate themselves following passage of this bill.

I urge all honourable senators to support the bill. I look forward to hearing the comments of honourable senators, and I trust that the bill will be considered further by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Nurgitz: Certainly.

Senator Godfrey: I gather that this bill was pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Did it make any recommendations either officially or unofficially, and, if so, which recommendations were accepted and which were rejected?

Senator Nurgitz: In reply to Senator Godfrey, the committee had six or seven meetings at which it heard representations from a wide range of Indian groups, pressing us, I must confess, on every conceivable issue and on every side of every issue. The committee made no recommendations whatsoever.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I rise with some considerable reluctance to speak on Bill C-31, which deals with amendments to the Indian Act primarily in the area of discrimination and band citizenship. It is rather like being party to a break and entry. We are intruding ourselves into somebody else's home. We are meddling with their family life and then leaving them to sort out the pieces.

All of us are caught in a process which would be intolerable should it happen to most of us. The fact that it is happening to one of our colleagues in this chamber, Senator Marchand, adds to my own feeling of inadequacy.

The only justification for our action is that this latest intrusion into the lives of Indian people is necessary to try to end a much greater injustice which Canadian governments introduced many years ago with the passage of the Indian Act.

I should like to say a few words about my colleague, Senator Nurgitz. I wish to thank him, and the committee—and most particularly the chairman, Senator Neiman—for the courtesy and encouragement given me in permitting me to join in the pre-study discussion of this bill. I appreciate the encouragement given to me, as a new senator, in undertaking for the first time the pre-study of an important and controversial bill.

I listened to Senator Nurgitz with interest and great respect. He gave an excellent review of the provisions of the bill and the process of amendment which led to its introduction in this chamber.

In the course of my remarks, I may approach the subject from a different direction, namely, from the direction of those whose views I heard during the long weeks of pre-study.

I believe that my honourable friend, and other members of the committee, would agree that we can take no joy in this bill. There are no real winners here, not in politics, not in government, not in Parliament, nor among the Indian people themselves.

The minister, the Honourable David Crombie, in his speech on third reading of the bill in the other place, acknowledged the pain of imperfect compromise. He noted that dissatisfaction will greet the effort to balance what he called two "just causes:" that of women's rights, on the one hand, and of Indian self-government on the other. He urged that a spirit of generosity and reconciliation prevail among those who will have to make the personal adjustments in adapting to the new law, if this bill passes. All of us must join him in that plea.

Who exactly are we dealing with in this bill? At the latest count we are dealing with 581 bands which are comprised of 332,000 status Indians, 235,000 of whom are living presently on reserves. We are dealing with some 18,000 persons who will have their status and band membership reinstated as a result of the repeal of the sexual discrimination provisions in the Indian Act. We are dealing with some 50,000 children of these persons who will gain Indian status but not automatic band membership. And, finally, we are dealing with some 8,000 other Indian people who lost status because of other provisions of the act, such as joining the clergy, finishing university, accepting veterans' benefits, voting in federal elections, joining the armed forces, going away to work, and so on. It seems incredible that we have had a law on the books which prevented an Indian from being an Indian as a result of participating in these routine and often patriotic acts.

There is a great deal of hope for the future in this bill. However, one of the difficulties surrounding it from the beginning and for the present is that it deals at the same time with principles which are volatile and incompatible. First, it removes the sexual discrimination from the Indian Act in the infamous clause 12(1)(b) under which Indian women who marry non-Indian men lost their status and were struck off the band list. That status would now be restored along with band membership. Second, the bill moves toward government recognition of the rights of Indian band control over their own membership; rights which, as Senator Nurgitz pointed out, the Indians themselves have never relinquished. This, too, is a step toward self-government which itself is currently at a stalemate at the level of the Constitutional Conference.

Taken separately, one would have difficulty arguing against either of these principles. But place them together in the context of Bill C-31 and it is like mixing oil and water. In the first instance we see that sexual discrimination is not stamped out after all. In the words of one of our witnesses, the bill is transmitting the discrimination from the women to their children. The women, as I said before, who have lost their status through marriage to non-Indians will have it restored along with membership in their band. But their children gain status only, and from age 18 must rely on the decision of the band as to whether or not they will be accepted as members. This contrasts with the case of an Indian man who has married a non-Indian woman—the wife becomes a status Indian, as do the children, and all of them are band members. What initially was hailed as the end of sexual discrimination was quickly seen as only half a step, which could result, depending on the will or the economic circumstances of the band, in dividing family units, rather than bringing them back together in the community. The bill also does not end immediately discrimination against these "12(1)(b) women" as they are called in terms of their ability to transmit their status directly beyond first generation children.

Amendments have also been rejected which would have guaranteed that re-instated women could participate in the process of establishing band membership that would ultimately affect the membership of their children. I have listened carefully to the arguments of the minister and I understand that while a major step has been achieved in the removal of discrimination against these women, imposing their children on the band membership would offend the principle of control for band councils.

The war against discrimination has been fought for many years, often in lonely battle, by Indian women—people who appeared before us such as Mary Two Axe Early and Sandra Lovelace. Was it simply a selfish fight for their own individual interests which motivated them? I shall let Gale Stacey-Moore of the Quebec Native Women's Association answer that question. She told our committee:

The fundamental reason for the movement by native women to change the discriminatory sections in the Indian Act is for the benefit of our children, who are our future.

Wally MacKay, Ontario Regional Chief of the Assembly of First Nations—which places the right of self-government at the very top of its list—told us that the Assembly of First Nations Chiefs fully supports the removal of sex discrimination from the Indian Act, but noted Bill C-31, "splits the families. It victimizes the children in that regard." He went on to say:

When we look at it (the bill) as a transitional process, once we achieve that recognition of citizenship, we will set the house in order the way it is supposed to be set in order.

There is pain in the testimony of Indian women on this issue. For some, this bill has become a hollow gesture because they do not want to risk re-establishing themselves on a reserve with children who may have an uncertain future in terms of band membership. Women like Muriel Sasakamoose, Executive Director of British Columbia's Native Women's Society, maintain that reinstatement for women and their children and grandchildren into band membership must precede the question of self-government. She contends, as do others, that this part of the bill violates the Charter of Rights. Yes, there is pain; there is anger and there is resolve to fight again, if necessary, in the courts for family reinstatement.

In the case of the second principle in this bill—the right of the bands to control their own membership—it has come under equally heavy criticism for arbitrarily imposing a potential of many thousands of persons back into the bands. I think it is fair to say that a majority of the witnesses attacked this provision on many grounds. It was contrary to basic treaty rights. It threatened the already precarious economic survival of the bands. It offended the whole concept of self-government. It threatened the cultural and spiritual roots of community living which individual groups have struggled to maintain against incredible odds. In some cases the bands simply did not want the women and their children back at all, as they had chosen to marry out and that was that.

In terms of Bill C-31, the Constitution and the Charter, many reject totally any attempt by the federal government to interfere with the right of Indians to determine their citizenship and their right of residence on Indian land. Indeed, the very first group to appear before us, headed by Mr. Eric Robinson, Co-ordinator of the Manitoba Brotherhood of Indian Nations, who was speaking for the Coalition of First Nations, stated bluntly:

If the Government of Canada is adamant in its pursuit of this legislation, we can only inform you that your government and our First Nations governments who make up the coalition, are on a collision course, a course that will lead not only to defiance on the part of the people and the governments of the Coalition of First Nations, but to possible conflict if this legislation is passed.

From the Treaty Six Chiefs Alliance, Chief Gordon Gadwa told us:

We will not accept legislation which will impose people upon our communities without our consent.

He added:

We see indigenous peoples as a people indentifying with a particular culture, a particular community and a particular value system. For us, people left our community by choice. They may racially look like Indians, but are they Indians?

• (2110)

The so-called “high impact” bands also have a deep concern. These are bands which have a small population and area which could, in their view, be overwhelmed by even a small number of reinstated members. In Alberta, I have heard people scoff at some of these bands. These are bands which have had the good fortune to have a resource base discovered on their land. There is a tendency to say either that they can easily afford newcomers, or that they want to restrict newcomers in order to avoid additional claims on band revenue. Surely bands which have prospered, thanks to good management and resource discovery, have no less a desire to maintain the way of life and customs which they have built up in their communities. To quote Catherine Twinn, Counsel to the Treaty 8 Bands of Alberta:

[Senator Fairbairn.]

In its rush to correct past injustices, Parliament must ensure that its actions will not jeopardize the survival of any Indian community.

Honourable senators, I have gone on at some length about the views expressed to our committee, because a number of them are not reflected in Bill C-31.

The government has addressed difficult issues in what Mr. Crombie believes is the fairest way to reach specific and limited objectives. He acknowledges that the result does not satisfy any of the constituent groups. Indeed, he suggested that, if it did, he would have failed to achieve the limited balance he had been seeking.

We must also acknowledge the tremendous amount of time, effort and thought which Indians across this country have brought to this debate. Their presentations to committees, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, were outstanding and really reached far beyond this single bill to the larger issue of self-government which will dominate future discussions in this country.

I know that the government will not be moved on the basic principles contained in this bill. That has been made very clear to us. Nonetheless, even at this late date, there are still avenues to explore when we meet the minister in committee, as I hope we will.

One which I have not touched upon, but which is of vital concern, is the question of financial assistance to the Indians bands. The minister, thus far, has not wished to put a price tag on his principles, but I ask him to give us and the Indians a clear picture of the range of the government's commitment before the bill goes to third reading.

Time and again, witnesses demanded that the bill contain a guarantee that necessary resources would be forthcoming. Indeed, the negative attitude of some towards reinstatement might have been somewhat muted by such a guarantee. For some, the desperate conditions on their reserves gave them no option but to oppose.

With respect, the Indian people are not about to accept with blind faith assurances from the minister that they will be no worse off as a result of this bill, and why should they? I, personally, find it difficult, especially after we had a peek at the leaked documents from Deputy Prime Minister Erik Nielsen's Task Force on cost-cutting, which recommended substantial cuts in native programs over the next three years. To be fair, the minister and the Prime Minister denied that the document represented government policy. However, its very existence and the attitude expressed in it indicates a way of thinking within government departments that justifies concern, if not cynicism.

We are in a period of restraint, of deficit cutting, of pulling back and of shifting from government to the private sector. Let us be perfectly clear that none of that philosophy must—indeed none of it can—apply to the Indian people, either in terms of regular government financial assistance or certainly as a consequence of this bill.

It is not enough to tell the Indian people that the status quo will be maintained. In many cases, the status quo is utterly intolerable by any standards used for the rest of Canadian society. Let us not forget that, for the Indian people at this moment, there is no real private sector. There is the government and themselves.

We must make a clear commitment that those currently living under great difficulty will have those difficulties addressed as a priority of this government, completely separate from the obvious assistance required for reinstatement under this bill. It would be tragic, honourable senators, if we in this Parliament endorsed one more measure which placed an additional burden on some of our most disadvantaged Canadians.

There is another avenue that we should also probe. A number of serious questions have been raised concerning the constitutionality of Bill C-31, particularly in terms of section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provides, as you know, that every individual is equal before and under the law, and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination. The government maintains it is confident the bill meets the test of the Charter, but other legal experts have lively doubts.

There is no doubt, however, that, if this bill passes, there will be court cases launched and the costs could be punitive for the Indians and their band councils. University of Lethbridge Professor Leroy Littlebear, speaking for the Indian Association of Alberta, put it in a nutshell when he told our committee:

The people who will feel the impact of these discriminatory situations will be the bands. It will not be the government any more. The people who are going to be brought to court, if anybody is brought to court under the Charter and so on, will be the bands, because they will be the ones who will be blamed for these types of discrimination. It will be the bands who will continually be taken to court for these types of situations.

Honourable senators, perhaps the government should look again at the possibility of placing a reference before the Supreme Court on the discrimination aspects of this legislation in order that there might be a clear-cut opinion without the time and expense involved in the hearing of individual cases. Section 55 of the Supreme Court Act is available, and I challenge the government to use it to refer the question of compliance of Bill C-31 with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is a serious suggestion and I hope it will be given serious consideration. If the government persists in its refusal to do this, I offer an alternative suggestion: Would the government assist Indians in funding court challenges to this bill under the Litigation Support Program, as it has done in other cases in the past?

Honourable senators, I have tried to convey to you some of the concerns surrounding this legislation. They are real concerns, and I hope my words will not fall on barren ground because the hard work now must be done in the real world at the band level, should this piece of paper become law.

I do believe a real effort has been made to correct some injustice through this bill. The fact of discrimination against Indian women is unbelievable in 1985. It has hung like a black cloud over the relationship between the Government of Canada and Indian people during negotiations over the past several years. That is one bottom line in this legislation, and if we cannot erase that line of discrimination forever within Canada, how can we participate with any credibility in world councils?

The second bottom line is that a real step has been taken to quicken the pace of disengagement from the intrusions governments have made in the daily lives of Canada's Indian communities. This step is in the form of recognition of future control of band membership by Indians.

But let us not for a moment think that this bill accomplishes these goals. While ending some old suffering, it unfortunately creates new and difficult situations for our Indian society. All the accumulated wounds of more than a century cannot be healed in the minds and hearts of the Indian people by this bill, or by any bill.

While we attempt to deal with one level of discrimination in this bill, we, as senators, must realistically acknowledge the much greater daily trial of racial discrimination which faces the native peoples of this country from the day they are born until the day they die. It is inescapable, not just a product of laws, but a disease of attitude.

In recent weeks I have had the great privilege of travelling with the Senate Youth Committee across Canada. Everywhere, we have been listening and searching for creative and productive ideas which might help turn discouragement into optimism for the current generation of young people. Nowhere is this discouragement more cruelly evident than in the testimony of native youth and those who work with them. To all the other difficulties that youth now faces is added the soul-destroying element of racial prejudice. It has already tainted the hopes and expectations of many of today's native youth.

In my first speech in this distinguished chamber I urge each of us, in whatever way we can, to launch a personal campaign to rid our society of this destructive attitude, wherever it exists. If we cannot stand side by side in friendship and in honour with the first Canadians, what hope can we offer to the other races from other lands who wish to make their home in Canada.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had to, in a sense, make a formal speech in this chamber. I do not intend this to be of a maiden speech, because, as a parliamentarian, I had that honour back in 1968, when I seconded the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, along with my esteemed colleague, Senator Corbin, who moved the motion for the Address in Reply on that great occasion. However, I should like to say a few things in a way that might be considered to be along the lines of a maiden speech.

I want to refer to two predecessors of mine in this chamber who were status Indians. Senator Gladstone was appointed to this house on January 31, 1958. He was an esteemed senator, who hailed from Cardston, Alberta. He made his maiden speech in this chamber on August 13, 1958. On that occasion he moved second reading of a bill which amended the Indian Act, Bill C-24. I did not in my research find out the exact nature of that bill, because he did not refer to it in any detail. However, I knew Senator Gladstone well. He was a gentleman, and I believe he conducted himself in this chamber with honour on behalf of his people. I know that was his desire.

Senator Williams, whom many of you know, was appointed to this house on December 9, 1971. Senator Williams is from the province of British Columbia. He is a long-time friend of mine. He also conducted himself with distinction and honour in this chamber. Incidentally, recently Senator Williams has not been well, and I am sure that all honourable senators will join with me in wishing him a speedy recovery, and we hope that he will regain good health for the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marchand: I am a member of the Okanagan Indian Band, near Vernon, British Columbia. To me, that has always been a great source of pride during my life as a member of Parliament in the other place. I want to say that I look forward to my participation in the work of this house, and I hope that I conduct myself in the same manner as my two predecessors as Indians in this chamber. It is an honour for me to be here with so many distinguished and capable men and women as senators.

I suppose one of the aspects of this bill that we are dealing with tonight relates to self-government, the government of the Indian people, the First Nation, or however you want to describe us. Just as an aside, let me say that I read some portions of the late Honourable John Diefenbaker's book, the first volume, in which he commented upon why he appointed Senator Gladstone to this chamber back in 1958. He said that at that time it was his desire to see a greater participation of the Indian people of this land in the political, economic and social life of this country. At that time he felt that there was no other way in which to accomplish that other than appointing Senator Gladstone to this chamber. However, he later went on to refer, very kindly, to my election, and also the election of Wally Firth at the time, who was a Métis from the Northwest Territories, as things that happened perhaps a little sooner than he thought would be the case.

Perhaps another significant thing that happened around that time was that the Indians of Canada received the federal vote for the first time in this land of ours in 1960. It was the first time that they received that vote.

I will refer to some other very significant things that happened, because some of the changes that are now in this bill relate to Indians receiving the vote. One of the clauses refers to enfranchisement. I know of people who gave up status as Indians when they were so-called enfranchised under the Indian Act, just so that they could get the vote and so that they could buy things like liquor. In the province of British Columbia, for instance, we were not able to go and buy liquor legally in the liquor stores until 1960. It caused our people a great deal of pain and hurt later on, because right now alcoholism among our people is one of the most serious problems they face. Be that as it may, we were still discriminated against very seriously in so many laws of this land. I will never forget that before 1960, when I was 21, I went to the liquor store to buy my first bottle of booze ever. Every time I think about it I shake. I stood in line at the liquor store on West Broadway in Vancouver and so many thoughts went through my mind. I wondered if at some point somebody was going to say, "Hey, you, Indian, get out. You can't come in here. You're Indian. You can't come in and buy liquor." Those are the realities of the situation that we had to face. I am glad that there is at least some movement toward addressing some of those issues in this bill.

• (2130)

I am very pleased with the comments that Senator Fairbairn made. She covered a lot of the territory I wanted to cover this evening. She made an excellent speech. She covered in a very sensitive manner a lot of the real issues that are before the people and are being dealt with in this bill. In introducing this bill, Senator Nurgitz referred to it as a historic act. I wish I could be in agreement with all of his points because I know he sincerely wants to do the right thing, as do other honourable senators. But in terms of fundamental justice and equality of treatment for Indian women, this bill is defective. It really is quite a good bill for the future but for now it fails that test of equality for women badly. I acknowledge that it is okay for those women who can come back, numbering 16,000, and it is also okay for the other 2,000 who lost membership and status for various other reasons. Good God, can you imagine losing your band membership and status because you get a university degree? Can you imagine losing your status as an Indian because you joined the army? Can you imagine the women losing their status because they marry a non-Indian? I can only say about those circumstances, "How stupid could we have been to put up with all of those kinds of situations?"

The bill discriminates against women in this manner: It splits families, which is a very serious matter. The women can come back but all of their descendants cannot come back into band membership and status. The only reason those women and all of their descendants lost membership or did not have membership in the beginning is because they are women and because those descendants were descendants of women. An Indian male was always able to pass on status to any number of generations because he was male. This bill fails badly on that count. It is a very serious matter and a very serious situation in terms of fundamental justice and equality and of treatment for Indian women.

I hope that in the consideration of this bill in committee we can make amendments and present them to the minister again. I am really sorry if the women have to suffer again and resort to the courts in order to obtain justice. They have suffered great indignities, particularly the indignity of losing their status when they were told that they were no longer Indians. That was a very dehumanizing and serious act of discrimination against those Indian women. They are going to have to suffer that indignity all over again because their families cannot come back with them into band status and membership. To say that it is up to the bands to bring them back into membership does not do justice to the situation. In my view band control over membership never really was the real issue. This view is also held by most of the Indian women. Some bands I know have said they want to have that right to control membership. Who are they controlling? It is not as if there is a new group of people all of a sudden dropping out of the sky and saying, "We want to get back as members of the band." These people whom the bands will be considering for reinstatement into membership are the offspring—the children, the grandchildren and perhaps some great grandchildren—of people who were and should have been band members all along. They lost their band membership unjustly, and if women were being treated equally in this bill, as they should be, that would not be an issue. But it is an issue now and the descendants of those children will have to go on bended knee in some cases and say "Please, bands, can we come back into band membership?"

I was speaking yesterday with a lady from a particular band and she said she had already approached them about getting back. She is a first generation descendant. The band council told her that she could not come back because they do not want her back. The only reason they do not want her back is because of the particular family that she comes from. These kinds of little imperfections in Indian communities go on. If you are from a particular family and another family is in power, those women and children are going to suffer a lot again, particularly those descendants who want to get back into band membership. That is the reality of a lot of the Indian communities. In many cases there will be no problems. I hope in my own band that they will be welcomed back with open arms to a large degree.

I have been preaching hard enough to a lot of them to recognize, for God's sake, that these are your sisters, your cousins, your aunts and part of your blood.

Chief Sophie Pierre of the Kootenai Band said it very well for me. She said on behalf of her Band in terms of band membership "As long as any of the people have Kootenai blood in their veins, that is good enough for me. I want them back."

It does not matter if the number reaches 2 million, if they are entitled to band membership they should have it. Money should not be the determining factor in terms of recognizing the rights of Indian women and treating them on an equal basis. As Senator Fairbairn mentioned, in some instances there was the coincidence—at least we hope it was coincidence—that a lot of the bands with great assets were among the most vociferous in saying to the women and their descendants, "We don't want you back." I know of the pressure that was exerted in terms of the desire for control over membership. I have some comments in that respect but I will save those until we are dealing with a bill respecting Indian band government.

● (2140)

There is an urgency and a general commitment on the part of this government and, certainly, on the part of the previous government that there should be a constitutional amendment which would provide the right to self-government. I believe it is a good commitment which I want to see lived up to, but that will be, perhaps, the subject of another debate on another bill.

Honourable senators, I may have more to say at third reading of this bill. I look forward to its examination in committee. I hope the committee has adequate time to really examine all aspects of the bill again.

However, in its present form, I find that the bill has a serious flaw. If we cannot correct that and get some other commitments, I, personally, will have no other choice but to vote against it at third reading.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-31.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I was delighted to join with Senators Fairbairn and Marchand in this debate, both of them indicating that this was their first speech in the chamber. They hardly sounded new or unfamiliar. I fear that their long years of experience in the work they did before they came here will stand them in good stead. Perhaps if I had had their alleged inexperience, I would not have made the serious error that I did in proceeding to tell the chamber about the 10 per cent rule in dealing with "high impact" bands. As I looked at the clock, I thought I was talking much longer than I ought to and, as a result, I failed to mention that this great 10 per cent rule for "high impact" bands is one the committee in the other place considered and came to the conclusion that it was inappropriate.

As I advance that case, I wish to correct the record and indicate that there were strong negative reactions to that kind of proposal, especially from the women's non-status Indian groups. They were concerned that, for most bands, those regaining membership would have to wait for two or three years. They argued that this was unfair and unnecessary since the amendment was only supposed to be a protection for the few "high impact" bands. As a result, the government moved to delete that clause at report stage. I failed to point that out in my initial comments.

There was developed in the committee in the other place a "high impact" amendment which was more targeted. It provided that bands experiencing a membership increase over 50 per cent could only make land surrenders, distribution of Indian moneys to members, or changes to legal arrangements outside the Indian Act for the purpose of making payment to band members subject to approval by a so-called "double majority." This means that approval would be required both from all band electors and from electors who were band members when Bill C-31 came into effect. The effect of this is that "old" members could veto basic changes regarding band assets. This provision also has a seven-year sunset.

Although the government was convinced that this was a fairer and more appropriate means to protect high impact bands from disruption, spokespersons for such bands felt that the amendment would not help. Therefore, the government decided not to proceed with this 10 per cent solution.

Honourable senators, that completes my comments on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1985-86

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-54, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us this evening is the Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1985-86, and provides for the release of the balance of the main estimates for 1985-86 amounting to some $26.7 billion and the whole of supplementary estimates (A) 1985-86 amounting to about $365 million. The total spending authority requested by this bill is just over $27 billion.

The main estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 26, 1985, and were referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. These estimates were discussed in committee with Treasury Board officials on February 26, 1985, and with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on May 8, 1985.

The supplementary estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on May 29, 1985, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Officials of the Treasury Board secretariat discussed the estimates with the committee on May 30, 1985. The committee, on June 11, 1985, presented an interim report to the Senate on these estimates.

As honourable senators are no doubt aware, further meetings are currently being held by the committee to discuss the amendments to the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.

Should honourable senators require additional information, I would be pleased to try to provide it. As I have said, these estimates have already been examined in committee and, therefore, I move second reading of the appropriations bill.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), debate adjourned.

SPORTS POOL AND LOTO CANADA WINDING-UP BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: moved the second reading of Bill C-2, respecting the winding-up of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation and Loto Canada Inc.

• (2150)

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-2 is straightforward, uncontentious and even unpretentious. The bill itself is concise and precise—I hope that my explanation will be the same.

Bill C-2 terminates Loto Canada and the Sports Pool Corporation and confers all rights, property and liabilities on Her Majesty. If any honourable senator feels like suing the corporations because he didn't win, he can now sue Her Majesty instead.

I will provide to honourable senators a brief history of the corporations. Loto Canada was established to assist in paying for the 1976 Olympics. Canadians were optimistic that the Olympics would be a success, which they were in every aspect except the financial. The lottery was extended beyond the Olympics to 1979 in order to attempt to recoup some of the heavy losses accruing from the Olympics.

The provinces, in turn, began to remind the federal government that they surrendered this field on a temporary basis to assist the Olympics, and began asking for the return of that tax field. The Clark government, in negotiating with the provinces, agreed to terminate Loto Canada, in return for which the federal government would receive an indexed annual payment of $25 million.

The Liberal government was re-elected in 1980 and commenced the Sports Pool, despite objections from the provinces that it was re-entering the lottery field and violating the 1979 agreement.

The Sports Pool was set up to meet the partial costs of the Calgary Olympics in 1988 and to provide for amateur sports and medical research. Interestingly enough, the Medical Research Council neither received nor requested aid from the Sports Pool, possibly because that organization had a better vision of the future than this chamber had. The Sports Pool went on to lose approximately $1.5 million per week, and the total losses are expected to accumulate to a sum of $45 million. Recently, the provinces and the federal government have completed a new agreement. The provinces will pay the federal government $100 million over the next three years. This money will go towards the commitment to the Calgary Olympics. In addition, the provinces will continue the indexed payment agreed upon in 1979, and that will be $35 million annually.

I am sure that honourable senators will want to know about the commitment made to the Calgary Olympics, wherein the federal government agreed to assist in the construction of various items such as the Saddle Dome, the ski runs and other facilities. The Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sports reaffirmed this agreement at a press conference on September 21, 1984, when he announced that the Sports Pool was being terminated. He stated, and I quote: "This government unconditionally accepts the commitment to provide financial support in the 1988 Olympics to a total of $200 million." Bill C-2 will not affect that commitment.

Honourable senators may have an interest in the future of the staff members of the Sports Pool. Following the termination announcement, negotiations were carried on with Treasury Board. Treasury Board has now reached a satisfactory agreement with the employees, who will receive compensation according to their status within the Sports Pool. Top and middle management will receive a greater settlement than will the others.

The bill was referred to committee in the other place, but there was no discussion other than a clause-by-clause passage of it. I need not remind honourable senators that our committees have a lot of work before them over the next two weeks, in light of the expected heavy legislative load coming from the other place. Therefore, I would suggest that this bill be passed without referral to committee. If any honourable senator has a question, I will attempt to obtain the information and pass it on to him.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY
COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-26 TABLED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, tabled the following report:

Tuesday, June 18, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 12, 1985, examined and considered the said subject-matter and now reports that it recommends that the said Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Deputy Chairman

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to consult with the house about the business for the remainder of the week. An inquiry was brought to my notice, from one of my honourable friends on the other side of the house, as to whether or not we would be sitting on Friday.

I have consulted with my colleague, the house leader, who tells me that on the basis of the business now before him, it may not be necessary for us to sit on Friday. With respect to those bills now before us, I understand that there is general agreement that they will be proceeded with in time to have Royal Assent on Thursday afternoon. If that is so, then it will be unnecessary for us to sit on Friday.

However, I must issue the caveat that if the other place surprises us by sending us bills that at the present time we do not expect, then we may have to review the situation. But in view of the arrangements that have to be made, I thought that honourable senators might like to know the lie of the land.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In order to be sure that there is no misunderstanding, one bill for which we would hope to receive Royal Assent is Bill C-15, the Investment Canada bill. The interventions to be made on this side of the chamber indicate that the bill will probably receive third reading this week, in time for Royal Assent on Thursday. There is almost equal hope with reference to the appropriation bill. However, with regard to that particular bill, I have to consult further with our spokesman, Senator Stewart. I believe it is reasonable to assume that we will be able to deal with those two items of legislation, and if we are able to deal with any uncontroversial bills that are on our order paper, they too can be ready to receive Royal Assent.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly appreciate the comments of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and with reference to Bill C-15 he is absolutely right. I would not want to leave the Senate with the impression that the appropriation bill is not a matter of urgency. If we do not get the appropriation bill through before the end of this week, then they will have to go to extreme lengths to get funding for various matters of concern for the Government of Canada, namely, the payment of their ongoing expenses. Therefore, it is a matter of practical necessity that we get the appropriation bill through this week before we adjourn.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to raise a question with the Leader of the Government, a question which I asked him on May 28 concerning the sugar-beet and the sugar-processing plants keeping their factories in a state of capability to deal with future crops. I do not need the answer today or tomorrow, but I certainly do need it next week. For the benefit of those producers who are now, of course, not going to plant a crop this year, I expect it would be helpful for them to know before we adjourn for the summer whether or not there is a possibility of those factories being reactivated in the future.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not forgotten my honourable friend's question by any means, but I am not entirely in control of the answers. I have to wait until the companies themselves give us their replies to the questions raised. I will do my best to expedite matters, in the hope of getting all of the replies in by next week, but I am not sure that is possible.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on May 9 I asked the Leader of the Government to ask the minister responsible why he was not obeying the law requiring the monthly tabling of reports under the Regional Development Incentives Act, and I have not yet received a reply. I was hoping that even if the minister did not give us a reason as to why he was not obeying the law, he might start obeying it. Would the leader please follow that up?

Senator Roblin: Yes, I will.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday, June 13, the following motion was to be debated:

That, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits, it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.

The day before, on Wednesday, on June 12, Senator Flynn raised a point of order and tried to defeat the motion on constitutional grounds.

In answer to your request, I shall develop the three important issues raised by this challenge.

[Translation]

Firstly, it was suggested that "the right to vote on a motion of censure rests exclusively with the House of Commons", which of course I do not dispute. A very old British tradition which we have always scrupulously observed says so. But a motion of censure must be drafted in very explicit terms and should actually contain a withdrawal of confidence. But in the aforementioned motion, we find the words "... it is the view of ..." and the conditional "should". Evidently, even if this motion was put to a vote, it is essentially an expression of a point of view, a mere opinion that does not bind the government and even less to resign. An additional proof of my point is the fact that the House has itself, on Thursday, June 13, debated quite a similar motion, though the wording was different, which read:

That the House urge the government to now commit itself to the upholding of the present total indexation of old age security benefits after January 1 of 1986.

During the debate, the mover specified from the outset that his motion was not a non-confidence motion.

[English]

My second argument deals with the notion of anticipation, and here we must tread with caution. Indeed, we should take it for granted that the important elements of a budget must be worked out in a bill during the same session. In the present case, it seems clear that a de-indexation formula will appear in a bill.

Article 416 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition reads:

An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made ... in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again ..."

It says, further:

This rule also applies to decisions taken by the House on amendments to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and to the Budget Motion.

All these arguments apply more specifically to our case.

[Translation]

Let us now examine the motion in question more closely. For the sake of our discussion, I assume the motion has passed through the Senate. I must then ask myself how can such a motion prevent the Senate from subsequently examining a legislation containing a de-indexation formula. Word for word, the motion reads

... it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.

The government receives the notice and decides not to cancel de-indexation immediately. Essentially, all that the motion contains is: a point of view to rescind immediately. Therefore, nothing prevents the government from taking forthwith a different course of action by disregarding that point of view, or from choosing a specific formula at a later date. The motion allows the government complete freedom of action. If it rescinds de-indexation, there will be no further discussion in the Senate. If it does not rescind, we are unaware of the wording which will be used in a gradual formula of indexation or de-indexation. The substance to be discussed, therefore, remains pending, because the terms are unknown to us. We are unable to anticipate in a precise way.

[English]

We now have to consider closely our rule 47. The notion of repetition here is related to that of anticipation, save for slight differences that I shall endeavour to clear up.

Our rule 47 specifies:

A motion shall not be made which is the same in substances as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved ...

Now, it is argued that if the Senate rules in the affirmative or in the negative—that is to say, resolves the proposed motion—this motion could not be debated further on second reading of prospective legislation. In my ruling I do not even make assumptions. I take it for granted that we shall consider the substance of a bill dealing with de-indexation after passage of the proposed motion.

Now, would rule 47 prevail? The bill which will be submitted to us will, no doubt, contain some kind of formula for de-indexation. The budget does not specifically suggest total de-indexation. It is matched with some quantified formula for pension benefits indexation. Our parliamentary jurisprudence requires that we have in hand identical texts for rule 47 to apply. One of the texts suggests rejection of de-indexation, while the other, in its present form, proposes to implement it gradually. The first motion, if passed, would reject partial de-indexation. The difference is substantial. Nothing will prevent subsequent consideration of de-indexation under specific conditions rather than in the abstract.

[Translation]

The Honourable Leader of the Government has raised a fourth point with the following question, and I quote:

If the motion were passed and accepted by the government it would, in effect, call for a payment from revenue because it would increase government expenditures. There is no reason why we cannot find proper wording to deal with resolutions calling on the government to spend money. There is a formula available to private members or anybody who wants to propose something that calls for the expenditure of government funds, without contravening the rule that only the government can produce a royal warrant. I am not sure that this resolution is properly worded to accommodate that important technicality.

I have studied the motion under two very specific angles. First, I looked at the wording and merely saw the statement of an opinion implying no requests as such.

Secondly, I have studied the question of imposed expenditures, should the government agree to the motion. If we analyzed the situation more closely, we would be obliged to conclude that if the motion was accepted it would not impose additional expenses but would simply maintain the status quo ante. Presently, there is a pension act with indexation providing for the necessary expenditures. It would be an amendment to this act changing the indexation formula and, while debating this amendment, parliamentarians would not be in a position, unless they were ministers, to propose any additional expenditures. Which is not our case. The motion, in fact, only refers to the status quo.

[English]

I do admit that the objections raised last Wednesday provided a good reason for us to tread with care and insight, but in order to bar debate in this chamber arguments against the motion must be tight. Even if we are doubtful, we must encourage debate in keeping with the great tradition of freedom of speech in both chambers.

● (1410)

I, therefore, consider that the motion is acceptable.

SPORTS POOL AND LOTO CANADA WINDING-UP BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-2, intituled:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

"An Act respecting the winding-up of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation and Loto Canada Inc.".—
(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps we could revert to this order later this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

INVESTMENT CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Baroote, for the second reading of the Bill C-15, intituled: "An Act respecting investment in Canada".—
(Honourable Senator Godfrey.)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this bill brings a certain feeling of nostalgia to me, because I was appointed to the Senate on October 1, 1973 and I made my maiden speech in the Senate on December 5, 1973, on second reading of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

The first reading of that bill had taken place in the House of Commons sometime in January of 1973. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce studied the subject matter of the bill for approximately two months and finally brought in a report in July of 1973.

Senator Hayden, in a speech which he made to the Senate on December 12, 1973, pointed out that of the 16 recommendations made in the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, ten were dealt with by amendment in the House of Commons. Of these ten, the committee felt that six could be said to meet fully the objections which prompted the committee's recommendations. A further four amendments responded, at least in part, to the committee's recommendations, and in the remaining six cases no amendments were made.

The gist of my speech on December 5 was to say that I disagreed with the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee with respect to at least four of the recommendations which had not been accepted by the government. It might be of interest to point out very briefly what those were. One of the recommendations was that there should be an exception granted under certain circumstances where no Canadian purchaser could be found or was willing to pay a reasonable consideration. I recall at the time reading the evidence of a Mr. Beach who appeared before the Banking Committee for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and he pointed out that if he were permitted to sell his company to an American he would get $1 million more than it was worth from the American, and he did not think that it was reasonable that he should be denied that opportunity. I did not agree with Mr. Beach. I thought that as long as he was getting what he felt his company was worth, there was nothing wrong with it, and that the government was quite right in not accepting the proposed amendment.

The second recommendation of the Senate committee proposed that the province where the investment was located or was to be located be given a right of veto over any decision turning down an investment as not being of significant benefit. I did not agree with that recommendation because I thought that it was a constitutional matter and that the federal government had to take the responsibility, and we had been assured that there would be consultation with the provinces at all times and on all applications. Senator Flynn, the then Leader of the Opposition, pressed the matter and at third reading stage proposed an amendment in the Senate to, in effect, approve that recommendation and give veto power to the provinces. I must say that in the 10 or 12 years that have elapsed since I gave my speech, I have not changed my opinion at all. It will be interesting to see whether Senator Flynn, now that his party is in power, is still of the opinion he expressed at that time and will be proposing a similar amendment when this bill comes up for third reading.

The third amendment recommended by the committee was that there be an appeal to the courts from the decision of the minister to recommend to the cabinet that the investment be disallowed because of its not being of significant benefit to Canada. In other words, there should be an appeal procedure to the courts of what was essentially a subjective, political and administrative decision. I thought the government's position was the right one. Senator Flynn moved an amendment to the effect that there should be an appeal procedure to the courts on that subject, and it will be interesting to see if he is still of the same opinion 12 years later.

Senator Steuart: He has mellowed.

Senator Godfrey: The fourth recommendation was that investment companies be, in effect, exempted from the provisions of the bill. I did not agree with that one either.

There was one recommendation which was not accepted by the government, and I was of the opinion at that time that it should have been. I will illustrate it by reading an excerpt from the brief given by the Canadian Bar Association at that time, as it is recorded in Senate Debates December 5, 1973, page 1265:

A major additional safeguard is that any decision by the Government—except on the question of significant benefit—can be brought before the courts.

In other words, they did not believe that there should be an appeal of the minister's decision on significant benefits. The excerpt continues:

This includes the Minister's judgment on whether the company is foreign controlled and hence subject to the review process; whether an investor has in fact acquired control; whether an acquisition is of a Canadian business; and in the case of the establishment of a new business, whether it is related to an existing operation.

After I gave my speech, the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee met to discuss the bill, and I attended the meeting.

Mr. Gibson, the lawyer for the department, drew the attention of the committee to section 18 of the Federal Court Act which, in effect, gave an appeal from these types of decisions in this type of matter by applying for certiorari or prohibition. I remember at the time observing that I had been guilty of something I had always advised the law students in our firm not to do, and that is to rely on someone else's legal opinion. I always told them to do their own research. I had been foolish enough to rely on the legal opinion of the Canadian Bar Association and the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as I pointed out at the meeting of the committee and later in the Senate, and I was willing to admit I was completely wrong. I actually did not take Mr. Gibson's legal opinion and did some independent research of my own.

• (1420)

However, Senator Flynn was not prepared to admit he was wrong and, in his motion, he still insisted that there was no right of appeal on these technical matters and moved an amendment providing for such an appeal. His amendment was voted down. I would be interested to see whether Senator Flynn has changed his mind in the intervening 12 years on this subject and whether or not he will move a similar amendment to this bill on third reading.

The speakers in this debate so far have pretty well covered the subject, and I do not want to repeat what they have said.

When I was still practising law, I had some experience with FIRA. Even after I retired, I heard many comments and opinions from lawyers about how it operated. I must say that everyone was of the opinion that during the first few years of its operation, the delays in dealing with applications were inexcusable.

I recall, when we examined the original bill in committee, that there were certain time limitations which could be extended and that we received assurances that there would be no undue delays, assurances which were not carried out. Sometimes the delays would be a year long. Sometimes, when undertakings were asked for and the applicant would not agree, they would sit on the application and do nothing until finally, in exasperation, the applicant agreed to give the undertaking.

I believe that FIRA did serve a useful purpose. As Senator Sinclair has pointed out, some of the amendments to the act and the speeding up of the procedures, which were made about three years ago, did clear up most of the objections as to how it was being administered.

As far as the present act is concerned, I agree with Senator Sinclair that the wording does not make such difference. It is cosmetic or window-dressing to try to define the difference between "significant" benefit and "net" benefit. It really does not matter.

What really matters is the opinion of the minister who will be administering the act. The minister is the key person. As long as Mr. Sinclair Stevens is going to be administering it, I do not think any foreign investor will take the act seriously.

The record since September 4, 1984, has been that not one single application has been turned down.

The main advantage of the act was not the fact that it allowed the government to turn down some applications; it was the bargaining power which it allowed the government to exercise with foreign investors. We could get undertakings from them, and that was very useful for the benefit of the country as a whole and could turn the investment into a significant benefit for Canada.

Because of Mrs. Stevens' well-known views on the subject, I think the government has lost all its bargaining power and no foreign investor will take the new act seriously.

I can recall when Mr. Stevens appeared before the committee on the pre-study he talked about undertakings that he had received from the parent company of Texaco Canada to the effect that FIRA had received an undertaking that they would sell 12 million shares of Texaco Canada. In fact, the parent company sold 14 million shares and, as far as the investment community was concerned, the reason they sold that number was because they needed the money. If they were merely complying with the undertaking they had given Mr. Stevens, they would have sold only 12 million shares. They had made large purchases in the United States, they badly needed money and, in a straight business decision, they went ahead and sold 14 million shares.

Honourable senators, there is one other matter which I think has some relevance, and that is I believe we are not paying enough attention to encouraging Canadians to invest in their own country. It is all very well to say we should bring in foreign capital, but Canadian capital has been fleeing the country and, I must say, not always profitably. I must admit that on certain occasions when I see companies who could have spent the money in Canada spending it in the United States and stubbing their toes, it gives me a certain amount of satisfaction. Furthermore, I have always felt that one of the reasons Canadians sold out after the war to the Americans was because we did not have a capital gains tax. People would not have been quite so eager to sell their interests in companies to foreigners if they had had to pay a 25 per cent capital gains tax on the capital gain. By the time the capital gains tax provision was in place, it was really too late.

That is what is worrisome, in my opinion, about this $500,000 exemption contained in the present budget. According to the Minister of Finance and according to speeches given by various ministers, it is supposed to encourage investment in Canada by Canadians. Of course, that could easily have been done by eliminating the capital gains tax on Canadian investments, but they did not do that. They eliminated the capital gains tax on a person's foreign investments as well. I think that the government could have accomplished more by way of encouraging investment in Canada by giving a little more thought to that particular provision and by not including foreign investments in the scope of it.

As Senator Sinclair said in his speech, favourable tax treatment is probably one of the most important elements considered by foreign companies when deciding whether or not they will invest in Canada. I recall that, a few years ago, I had lunch with the vice president of finance and the head of the tax department of Stelco. I asked him how the Canadian steel industry managed to be so efficient—which it is; it is far more efficient than the United States industry and can compete with the U.S. companies in their own markets. He said that the reason for Canada's efficiency is that capital intensive companies in this country receive a much more favourable tax treatment than they would in the United States, for example. Back in 1972, we had brought in accelerated depreciation provisions and investment tax credits. Furthermore, in the United States when a company builds something, it cannot take into account any depreciation until the plant is actually operating. In Canada, however, even though it may take some years before a plant is completed and operating, the company can deduct depreciation right away as the money is spent. The tax treatment of Stelco was so favourable that, at that time, it had not paid any income tax whatsoever for three or four years and did not expect to do so for another nine or ten.

After the luncheon, I phoned an executive vice president of Dofasco to ask whether he was of the same opinion. He happened to be out of town, so I spoke to the head of their tax department and he agreed completely with the views of the official of Stelco. Later, I happened to mention what had transpired at a Senate committee meeting. The Executive Vice-President of Dofasco heard about what I had said. He phoned me and, although he admitted that the information was right, he did not like admitting it in public. He did not like admitting that the government was really going something that was good for business.

Honourable senators, I really do think that our tax treatment of corporations—particularly the capital intensive companies—is such that it should and would encourage foreign investment. I think that such legislation will have much more effect in attracting foreign investment than the few amendments that we are up against in this new bill.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-15. I should like to make a few opening comments on points that have been raised by other honourable senators.

I should first like to congratulate those speakers on the other side of the chamber for their eloquence in expressing their views. I particularly want to congratulate them on their inventiveness in being able to find some good things to say about FIRA. It hasn't been easy, but they have been able to dig up several items to which they can refer with some pride. They have, in part, appeared as apologists for FIRA; but, in so doing, I am afraid they have damned FIRA with faint praise.

● (1430)

Perhaps I may be allowed the courtesy of bringing to your attention one or two specific items. Both Senator Sinclair and Senator Godfrey raised the matter of the sensitive case of decisions having to be made by one cabinet minister, in contrast to having, as was suggested, either the entire cabinet, or a small committee of cabinet, passing on these matters.

There may be some merit and virtue in that. However, on the other hand, what troubles me about that suggestion is that when one minister is responsible for the decision, he is then accountable to the house and to committees.

I see trouble in a committee of cabinet, or the entire cabinet, having the final say, lest they take refuge behind cabinet secrecy. Then those of us who wish to probe into the decision making may not be able to obtain the information we require.

Another item that was raised on several occasions, and which also has some merit, was the request that it would be helpful in future if the minister were asked, through an amendment, to bring to our attention statistics, and also make a report to Parliament on those cases that he judges to be of net benefit to Canada. That point was raised by Senator Sinclair.

In my view, the suggestion has merit. It was suggested that for two or three years in special cases it should be on a short-term basis, and in the larger cases it should be on a longer term.

That could probably be done quite freely without amendment to the act. For example, I know that departments maintain statistics until one's head turns dizzy with them. There is nothing that they do not record, quantify and put on a computer. Surely any member of Parliament, whether of this or the other chamber, could ask for, and obtain, that information at any time, from the reams of statistics that departments have accumulated.

Finally, there was the suggestion concerning fossil fuel: that if a new Canadian business had more than 15 per cent foreign content, it should be reviewed. I believe our Canadian petroleum industry, in particular, and perhaps our fossil fuel industry, are now in a fairly healthy condition to be able to withstand the raids and ravages of the multinationals. I have no fear that Pan Canadian Oils, or that Nova or Husky might be subject any longer to an easy raid.

There is one further item that may appear to be somewhat provincial, and therefore I ask honourable senators to forgive me for mentioning it. There is reference, through the various articles and material, to the new Investment Canada Act opening Canada for business. The slogan is "Open For Business," and, on a provincial basis, I hope my confrères from Saskatchewan will support this. I should say that in October 1982 shortly after the establishment of a new Progressive Conservative administration in Saskatchewan, an excellent conference, arranged by the Financial Post, was held in Saskatoon. The slogan for the conference was "Saskatchewan is open for business;" and indeed it was, and is, and ever shall be, I hope. That has since been copied by many administrations.

Several matters were raised, and I agree entirely with Senator Godfrey who said that the delays were inexcusable. I will touch on those in a moment. Senator Godfrey, with others, also raised the fact that the present act appears to be "cosmetic or window dressing" rather than embodying major and meaningful change. Indeed, from what we hear from other countries, it is what we are perceived to be doing through FIRA that has frightened investment and capital away from this country; so that at times the perception is even more damaging than the actual fact.

To encourage Canadians to invest in Canada, there are provisions in this budget, and there were provisions in the economic statement of November 8.

Honourable senators, since 1974, when FIRA was established, Canada has been perceived as wishing to repel foreign investment. Despite protestations to the contrary by our former Prime Minister and his cabinet, the Liberal administration was regarded as being negative, if not, indeed, hostile to foreign investors.

Although a vast majority of formal applications were ultimately approved after considerable negotiation, the sticky web of red tape and the hordes of bureaucrats combined to create time delays, which were referred to by Senator Godfrey—time delays that discouraged new foreign capital and investment in Canada. In fact, in almost every instance when our officials and elected people met with their counterparts in other countries, that complaint about FIRA was loudly voiced, to our embarrassment.

In addition, many instances can be quoted of foreign investors who just could not be bothered to look at Canada and who went elsewhere rather than suffer the harassment of a FIRA review.

The proof of that was offered the other day. Of 7,035 applications, FIRA disallowed 435. But 637—that is 200 more—withdrawn their applications during the course of waiting, due to the delays which others have touched upon.

The Lord knows how many jobs, how much capital, how much expertise, how much outside marketing ability and potential was lost to Canada during that period—or how much expansion, how much new and sophisticated industrial technique was lost to Canadians and has been forgone because of that act.

Honourable senators, the era of insular protective nationalism in business affairs has gone. In fact, the situation has backfired; and the very same people who practised parochial protectionism in Canada have been, for example, begging and politely blackmailing foreign auto manufacturers to locate in Canada in order to create jobs for our unemployed workers.

The period of history that was led by the Walter Gordons and the Mel Hurtigs is passé, as we have finally realized the damage that FIRA probably did to our economic development and to the protection of employment opportunities for Canadians.

Canada needs jobs. It needs to create real, meaningful, permanent employment; and we can do that only through the capital investment that we require—capital investment that Canada and Canadians have been unable to obtain in sufficient quantities.

The two-pronged effort—and this answers part of Senator Godfrey's question—to mobilize the needed Canadian capital to spur economic prosperity and to generate employment is now laid out before us: first, by Mr. Wilson's budget initiatives, which will encourage and help free up billions of dollars of domestic capital to be invested in new job-creating opportunities.

● (1440)

Second, this act, the new Investment Canada Act, will streamline and welcome investment of all types of capital into Canada establishing a new era of economic expansion and, we hope, prosperity.

We need and we should welcome foreign capital investments from all parts of the world and not allow our narrow-minded parochial nationalism to reject industrial and commercial competition. We should embrace outside capital. This will not only make us more efficient and more productive, but it could also create job opportunities.

I repeat that Canada needs jobs, jobs which governments did not and cannot provide; not wheel spinning, make-work jobs of a temporary nature which past governments have attempted and which disappointed workers, and which barely qualified these workers to go on unemployment insurance in the future, but permanent long-term, worthwhile jobs in small and medium-sized Canadian businesses which will raise the self-esteem and the self-realization of unemployed Canadians.

In this respect and to meet the future needs of such industries, Flora MacDonald's programs of many billions of dollars for the preparation, retraining and upgrading of qualifications is properly co-ordinated to meet with Mr. Wilson's budget and his economic statement of November 8.

Honourable senators, we tried the other methods. We tried throwing away taxpayers' money to create work, and we failed. We tried economic nationalism and we rejected foreign capital, and that failed. Surely, we should give a fair and honest opportunity to encouraging mobilization of private initiatives and of attracting foreign investment to try to accomplish what former efforts and policies failed to do.

During the 1984 national convention and campaign the Progressive Conservative Party promised to change the nature, the name and the mandate of FIRA. Bill C-15 fulfils that promise. We should not, and must not, stand in the way of legislating that expectation of Canadians. Opposition members cannot, on the one hand, complain when government attempts to fulfil its election promises and, on the other hand, complain when they have failed to do what was promised in the election campaign. You cannot have it both ways.

This is a new and streamlined agency, and it will encourage and facilitate domestic and foreign investment. It will be more responsive because it exempts all new businesses from review, requiring only notification of such investments and thereby lessening the work of the agencies.

Investment Canada will establish thresholds to limit review to larger acquisitions by non-Canadians so that direct acquisition by non-Canadians of business in Canada below $5 million will require only notification; second, indirect acquisitions resulting from the acquisition of a parent company outside of Canada of a Canadian business or subsidiary which has assets over $50 million will be subject to review; third, it provides authority to protect Canadian investments in businesses which have culturally sensitive natures in sectors such as book publishing—I guess we will look after Mel Hurting and Jack McClelland in that way—film distribution and production, broadcasting, news media and so on; fourth, it puts in the minister's hands, as has been pointed out, the authority to make judgments on investments that are likely to be of net benefit to Canada and allows us to question him about it; fifth, it imposes time limits—this satisfies Senator Godfrey's complaint—for decision-making in Ottawa for faster and simpler procedures; and sixth, this bill provides clearer rules for determining the status of corporations which are under consideration.

My dear friends, I have no strong urge to condemn actions taken in the past under different circumstances by well-meaning persons in government. We must all concede, however, that until recently we have not been able to accommodate the new entrants into the work force in Canada. Secondly, our economy has not grown at the rate at which we would like to see it grow. Bill C-15 is one avenue of redress, one new initiative to expand our economy and to create employment. It was also, incidentally, a major promise of the Progressive Conservative Party during the election.

Honourable senators, I strongly support, and I urge you to support and pass this bill as introduced by the Honourable Senator Kelly.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Barootes: I would be delighted to respond if I can.

Senator Sinclair: In drafting your notes, did you make any distinction between an audit and statistics?

Senator Barootes: I did not. I noticed that the word you used was "audit". I took it to mean that there would be a substantial outside organization collecting and supplying the information which you might require. I used the term interchangeably.

Senator Sinclair: Would the honourable senator, in light of that, support a view that some change should be made in the language of the bill so that the gathering through an audit of all that detailed information by outside people would assist in the appreciation of what he has said was a new era?

Senator Barootes: My impression of what might or might not be done in this regard is that information and statistics will be collected by the department. The second step beyond that, as far as I can see, which would perhaps satisfy all of us, would be that some organization within government, such as an agency, perhaps Statistics Canada or others who have this information, can, on request, make it available to any member of the other house or this chamber who requests specific information. We already have a great deal of make-work projects in government in Canada, and I doubt that we need to employ additional people to do this.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Barootes. I got the clear impression from his remarks when he referred to, I believe the figure was, 637 applications that had been withdrawn, that he was intimating that all of these were withdrawn because of delays in dealing with them. My question is: Is he not aware that there were many reasons for the withdrawals, including delays, or did he wish to leave the impression that they were all because of the delays?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I accept the remarks that were made. There is no doubt that some of them may have been withdrawn for other purposes, but in the case of those firms with which I have had contact, I should like to quote the Bard: "There is a tide in the affairs of men,—"

In business investments, it frequently happens that there is a time when the investment is feasible and profitable. But there are also instances where time passes by and with other entrants into that field or other sources for that product the investment does not produce the results that would have been produced had there not been the delays and frustrations that FIRA represented in the minds of many people. The statistics I quoted here have come from the address given by the Honourable Senator Graham.

● (1450)

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I ask the honourable senator a question? In his speech he referred to the provision in the bill with regard to cultural matters, and, in a rather slighting way, I thought, he said that that provision would enable us to take care of Mel Hurtig and Jack McClelland. Surely he would not want to leave the record like that. Surely he does see some purpose in that provision of the bill other than simply to be of assistance to these two publishers.

Senator Barootes: I agree entirely, Senator Stewart. That remark was made to apply to those people who had strong ties to economic nationalism. In this case we are referring to cultural matters of Canadian importance. I accept that criticism.

Hon. Azellus Denis: I should like to ask the honourable senator a question. We have read in the newspapers and heard on the radio and T.V. that during the FIRA period more than 95 per cent of the requests for investment were granted. That question was put to the Honourable Robert de Cotret on T.V. He was asked why it was they wanted to change a law that was good to more than 95 per cent of those making requests. He replied that it does not take into account those who did not dare to apply, because they were afraid to ask anything. How is it that those frustrations did not appear in the newspapers, or anywhere else, when every newspaper reported that more than 95 per cent of the requests for investment in Canada were granted?

There must be some interest in coming to Canada to invest. For instance, in the budget there is a proposal to have no capital gains tax in certain cases. That might be a good means of replacing FIRA, rather than this Investment Canada Legislation. It all depends on the interest they might receive from investment in Canada compared with investment, for instance, in the United States. People invest somewhere else because they want to make a profit, but when there is no profit there is no investment. Therefore, I would like to know the real difference between FIRA and Investment Canada. Is there really no difference at all, or is there frustration which did not appear before, or that we do not know about?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I am not sure where the figures quoted by the honourable senator come from. Senator Graham quoted a figure of 7,035 applications.

Senator Graham: An unimpeachable source.

Senator Barootes: Undoubtedly. He said there were 7,035 applications, of which 5,981 were accepted; that is to say, not quite 95 per cent, but it would make it closer to about 85 per cent. There is about a 14 per cent difference. Of those that did not go through, more than half were withdrawn, as I noted. I do not know the total reasons for their being withdrawn.

Senator Sinclair: Let us have the statistics right.

Senator Barootes: One out of seven is 14 per cent.

Senator Sinclair: Come on!

Senator Barootes: That is just in my little head here.

I must go on to point out that these are 7,000 cases where an application was made. God knows—and I don't know, you don't know, and none of us knows—how many firms from Great Britain, Ireland, France, the United States, Mexico or Japan might have applied except that they did not want to go through the harassment, the delays, the push-offs. This is the kind of thing that happens when a business finds an opportunity and wants to get in there to supply, say, rubber hoses for something, and then all of a sudden they are harassed and delayed for a year or two years; somebody else comes in with a new method or technology of manufacture and it is too late for them. In other words, we might well have had another 7,000 industries that might have set up and helped the Canadian economy. I don't know. It is pure conjecture on my part, and on yours as well.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move—

Senator Steuart: You get better all the time. One more question and you've got it made.

Senator Frith: I don't want to interrupt anyone.

Senator Flynn: What are you going to do?

Senator Frith: Knowing how favourably inclined I am to heckling, honourable senators can understand why I do not want to interrupt any heckling. However, I rise to move adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Davey.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Davey, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-41, to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to amend the Crop Insurance Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us is simply a housekeeping bill. It will formally end the life of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund established under this legislation. In fact, operations under the act ceased in 1972, and the repeal of the act will simply confirm that reality.

The original legislation, enacted in 1939, had a long and useful life. Under the act, money was collected from western farmers through a 1 per cent levy on grain sales. This money was kept in a fund that was used to provide financial relief to farmers hit by crop damage or crop failure. When the federal provincial Crop Insurance Program came into force, PFAA operations became redundant. Western farmers had a better way of protecting themselves against emergency situations. As a result, PFAA operations were wound down, with one notable footnote. There was exactly $9,066,972 left in the fund, money that had been collected from western farmers. It belonged to the farmers, but there was no administrative way of returning it to them. The problem was finally resolved a decade later when the federal cabinet authorized handing the money over to the Western Grains Research Foundation, an organization set up to sponsor additional agriculture research in the west. The foundation was established under the supervision of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the umbrella national organization for many farm groups in Canada. Besides the federation, foundation membership includes the three prairie wheat pools and other prominent western farm organizations. Agriculture Canada has a senior research branch official on the foundation board of directors to ensure a close working relationship with the federal government.

• (1500)

The overall aim was to use the money to fund western research in grains and oilseeds on behalf of the farm community, which contributed the money in the first place. I am happy to say that goal is being achieved. The money has been prudently invested; returns on investment are flowing out to finance research projects at more than $1 million per year. By the end of the calendar year 1985, 33 separate research projects will have been arranged.

All of this has been accomplished in a short time span. The foundation received the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund residue in May, 1983 and began funding research projects the following year. Research funding comes entirely from returns on investment. The original donation is intact, and will remain so.

Overall, the decision to return the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund residue to the western farm community seems to be paying dividends. One spinoff was the creation of an entirely new source of research funds for prairie universities. So far, the Universities of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have been the principal beneficiaries of foundation grants. Some research projects are being carried out with the help of Agriculture Canada research stations in the west.

I think the fate of the money from the old Emergency Fund is worth noting as we move towards the official end of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I believe the money is being wisely used for the benefit of western agriculture, and indeed the country as a whole.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SUPPORT AND GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marsden calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of research and development in every province and territory and the need for caution and sensitivity in the realignments of support, and of policy by government, which relates to research and development.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take just a few moments of the Senate's time to comment on Senator Marsden's eloquent remarks on government policy regarding support of research and development.

First of all, let me assure the honourable senator that this present government is deeply committed to enhancing research and development in Canada. The priority approach is through private sector research and development, although not to the exclusion of the public sector.

I will quote a few examples of this government's commitment to research and development. The Prime Minister has committed the government to three specific priorities as it relates to research and development. First, the strengthening of the capital base of private industry; second, a better use of the money involved in R&D flips—and I will comment on R&D flips in a moment. Third, the overhaul of existing government R&D programs. These commitments, made in August last, were addressed in the budget on May 23. At that time, the Minister of Finance said:

Encouraging an improved R&D performance in Canada is an on-going priority of this government.

He identified R&D as one of the three components of economic growth most likely to bring the greatest and fastest response.

The recent budget does much to benefit small technology-oriented businesses. As well, of course, it benefits all businesses, both large and small, in this area. The tax incentives in the budget are opening the doors to large pools of capital for use by small start-up companies and those larger established firms looking to expand.

There is little doubt that Canada can benefit greatly from new technology and more entrepreneurship. This is what creates new jobs, generates increased government revenues, helps national productivity and contributes extensively to the balance of trade by the export of goods and services.

The government has thus decided to provide suitable tax and other incentives to private investors and financial institutions in order to support early stage ventures, particularly seed ventures where research and development are of special importance. The decision to grant a lifetime capital gains exemption of $500,000 to individual Canadians alone will boost research and development in Canada, as it will encourage investment in small, innovative enterprises whose livelihood is research and development.

In addition to the changes in the capital gains tax, measures affecting pension funds, Registered Retirement Savings Plans, RHOSP's and the Solidarity Fund in Quebec will all encourage greater investment in small and medium-sized technology-oriented businesses. The government will also replace the thoroughly discredited Scientific Research Tax Credits with a system which will see the money put directly into the hands of the companies carrying out research and development.

The controversial Research Tax Credit Program which ran wildly over budget, has been canned. The idea of a program which allowed investors in research companies to trade in the tax credits had some merit, but I fear it was far too open-ended. Instead of the $200 million cost projected by then Finance Minister Lalonde, officials of the Department of Finance are now estimating its eventual cost will be at least $1.9 billion, and perhaps as high as $2.3 billion. For all this money, research and development increased only marginally. Much of the money, now gone, could have been made available for some of the very legitimate concerns that Senator Marsden raised in her able address.

Small technology firms will be the bid beneficiaries of the decision to refund 100 per cent of the tax credit which they earned on the first $2 million of qualifying R&D each year. This full cash refund will be much more effective than the complicated and often abused predecessor, the SRTC.

The government has also improved the tax definition of R&D. Those of you who have an interest in science and technology will know that, up to now, expenditures had to be "wholly attributable" to R&D. This has been the source of no end of headaches for smaller companies, especially where management personnel is engaged directly in the research and development area. Marketing was also a problem area. The new flexible definition will not only increase the benefit to the taxpayer but will also make business a great deal easier.

Honourable senators should also note that the term "scientific research" has now been replaced by "scientific research and experimental development." This small but vitally important change recognizes the reality of industrial R&D, and emphasizes the need to develop new products and processes. It is the new products and processes that ultimately create the jobs.

Small science and development-oriented firms will also welcome the news that the Minister of National Revenue will be engaging scientific and technical experts to aid the tax auditors. In some cases, the technical experts may be on site to deal directly with the company concerned, and this should help to make research and development claims easier and more efficient.

The cumulative effect of all these and other changes gives an unprecedented boost to private sector research and development. There is no question that the effect will be many times greater than that created by the now defunct SRTC.

Honourable senators, there is also no question that there have been cutbacks in government funding of various agencies. The ongoing problem of financial demands from the post-secondary educational institutions increases all the time, and it becomes harder and harder to meet their very justifiable demands. There can be no doubt that a great deal more money could be spent on research and development, and indeed on scientific training and improvements. The question is, of course, where is the money to come from? This is not an open-ended, bottomless pit. It is a finite, financial pool with demands on it from all sectors of society, and although cutbacks have been made in the areas mentioned, there can be no doubt that the commitment to scientific research and development, both to the public and private sector is, as I have said, very much a priority of this government.

Before I close, honourable senators, I should also call your attention to the meeting of federal-provincial and territorial ministers responsible for science and technology, chaired by the Honourable Thomas Siddon, Federal Minister of State for Science and Technology on February 4 and 5 of this year. This was the first meeting of its type ever held in Canada, and I would commend the communiques issued by the participants to the attention of my honourable colleagues who are interested in R&D and the scientific community generally. There was a very strongly worded reaffirmation of a federal/provincial and territorial commitment to the idea of concern which Senator Marsden expressed so well. I will not bother to read it at this time or to quote from it, but I can assure honourable senators that it is a very encouraging document. May I at this time thank honourable senators for their attention. That is the end.

• (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Marsden may want to exercise her right of reply on her inquiry, so I shall adjourn the debate in her name.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 2:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have made some inquiries and Senator Perrault is unable to be here until later this afternoon. I shall discuss with him the matter of debating this order tomorrow.

Order stands.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL POLICIES

GOVERNMENT STATEMENT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. Ian Sinclair rose pursuant to notice of December 19, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the growing concern, even in some cases fear, arising from the contradictory government statements on economic and social policy.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise at this time in a very contrite way. When I last brought this matter to the attention of honourable senators, it was just prior to a long vacation period for Parliament. At that time a certain group of people within the country were deeply concerned. Shortly thereafter, the Prime Minister, in a spirit of remembering what was, in his words, a sacred trust, said unequivocally to the House of Commons and to the public, "There will be universality," and those elderly people who had felt concern went to happy Christmas. Now, as we approach the summer vacation, concern, fear, misunderstanding and wonder rest once again in the bosoms of those elderly people. Why?

This time their fear is greater. They thought the Prime Minister of this country, remembering his promise on universality—and it took their fear to bring it to the fore—would not let it happen again. But it has happened again. Just yesterday an honourable senator from the province of Alberta brought to the attention of the Senate via petition this very real concern. The people who are concerned have lived in their salad days. Honourable senators will recall that I asked the honourable senator for the average age of these concerned Alberta citizens, but he did not now. I am sure that the median age would be much higher than the median age in this very distinguished chamber.

Some honourable senators have suggested that we wait and see what the Prime Minister says. Honourable senators will remember that he said, "I have no hesitation at all in saying that I hesitate, and this is why I have put this off until 1986." The Leader of the Government also drew this statement to the attention of honourable senators. The proposed elimination of full indexation of Old Age Security will not go away because it bothers people. You might say that they should not be worried, that when the Minister of Finance, a man of great integrity and the Prime Minister, a man of great words, move across this country reassuring people, they should accept it. Why should they accept this reassurance when all the Prime Minister has to do is to say, "I promised you that indexation of Old Age Security would not be touched; I am a man of my word, and it will not be touched," and the concern will disappear.

If you say that they should not be fearful, I remind you of the words we heard in just the past few days, that perception is often more important than the fact. If the perception of elderly people is that they will have their pensions cut, that there will be some slicing, even if the fact is that there will not, surely that perception should be looked at and action taken. What can be done? The Globe and Mail of June 18 quotes in an article Ms. Joyce King, President of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario:

—the federal Government's proposal to limit old-age pension increases will have a massive negative impact on the lives of hundreds and thousands of Ontario senior citizens—

Hundreds of thousands of Ontarians are concerned and while the task forces of the government rush across the country talking about what they have done for business and what that will do for the investment climate, is it not time that a single word or a single sentence was uttered by the Prime Minister to allay the fears of our senior citizens?

After the words of the Prime Minister just before last Christmas, I delayed rising to speak to this inquiry. In view of the necessity for action now, I rise again and I hope that honourable senators and the Leader of the Government will bring this matter forcibly to the attention of the government before our senior citizens go through this summer—for some of them their last summer—under this cloud.

Senator Flynn: You have saved face.

Senator Argue: Can't the Conservatives work up the courage to reply?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 19, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION

REPORT OF ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-24 TABLED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, tabled the following report:

Wednesday, June 19, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-24, intituled: "An Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of June 12, 1985, examined and considered the said subject-matter and now reports that it recommends that the said Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to publish and distribute its interim report on the review of the National Energy Program as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

Senator Perrault: Don't count on it.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-44

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the subject-matter of the Bill C-44, intituled: "An Act to amend the Western Grain Transportation Act" be withdrawn from the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry and be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Explain.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, on my recommendation, because the words "Western Grain" caught my eye. I have been told since that the bill was dealt with in the other place by their Transport Committee and that it is more properly a matter of concern for the Transport and Communications Committee of the Senate. The bill has overtures to the Crow. I say that very quietly and with great respect, coming, as I do, from so far east. The Crow is a very strange bird indeed. I immediately bowed to those people from western Canada who suggested that the matter is really a transport problem and not a grain problem, although "grain" precedes "transportation" in the title of the act.

Senator Argue: You are still getting feed grain assistance.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: I wish to inform the house that at 8.30 tomorrow morning the committee will meet to study the subject matter of this bill.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISH—ALLEGED SUBSIDIZATION OF CANADIAN EXPORTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to the alleged dispute which erupted yesterday at a meeting between the Atlantic premiers and the governors of the New England states on the subject of fish. In that exchange the spokesman for the New England governors persisted in asserting that Canadian fish was moving into the market of the United States subsidized by the public purse. Of course, that view was contested, and correctly so, by the premiers of the Atlantic provinces, particularly Premier Buchanan of Nova Scotia and Premier Peckford of Newfoundland.

I think it would be helpful to have the matter clarified by having the Leader of the Government state clearly that, in the view of the Canadian government, there is absolutely no foundation for the view that fish moving into the New England market is subsidized from any source.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, that is the position of the Government of Canada; that the definition of "subsidy" as presently understood in the United States does not involve, in our opinion, identification of a subsidy in the Canadian fishing industry. However, my honourable friend will know, as I do, that already a countervail of a very considerable sum has been placed on saltfish. So we have lost the first round, let us say, in the saltfish controversy, but it is my sincere hope that the dispute will not extend to other branches of the fishing industry, where we may face similar problems.

● (1410)

I know that one of my colleagues, the Honourable James Kelleher, is in Washington today and this is among the subjects which he hopes to discuss with the American government with a view to finding some meeting of minds in respect of this very vexing matter.

Senator MacEachen: I wonder if the Leader of the Government can tell us what view the Government of Canada has taken with respect to the imposition of a tariff on the importation of saltfish into the United States market. Has the government made representations and indicated that that action by the United States is unjustified?

Senator Roblin: My information is that that is what has been done, and also what is being reiterated today when the minister meets with his American counterparts.

Senator MacEachen: I have a final question to address to the Leader of the Government. I am wondering whether there can be impressed upon the authorities in the United States, if not upon the fishing industry in the New England states, the desirability of not pressing ahead with these actions, with particular respect to fresh frozen fish. I say this in light of their experience on three or four previous occasions when, upon examination of the facts, it was found that no injury was caused to the United States fishermen because of Canadian importation. I wonder whether that is also a matter which is being conveyed to the United States authorities at the present time.

Senator Roblin: Those are precisely the matters at issue. In our opinion, the real root of the problem has nothing to do with subsidies, but has everything to do with the difference in value between our two dollars. That is the driving force, we think, behind some of these problems.

OLD AGE SECURITY

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—GOVERNMENT MONITORING

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate has to do with the subject of the elimination of full indexation of old age security. In the other place, the Prime Minister has said that the matter will be looked at from time to time. With a view to having this terrible issue resolved, I wonder if the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate could indicate to this chamber what periods of time the government has in mind for looking at this matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have every expectation of making a considerable speech this afternoon on this topic and I shall remember, in the course of my remarks, to deal with the point raised.

Senator Sinclair: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. If the word "monitor" has the connotation I think it has, it means "to do something continuously." Also, I would like to know how much additional revenue would be required to have the government change its attitude and carry out its promises to the elderly people of Canada.

Senator Roblin: The whole question of the economic situation we face and its impact on old age pensions will be highlighted in my remarks this afternoon.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, this chamber recognizes, as I am sure do the people of Canada, that the elderly people in this country are a particular group and are not in the same position as Canadians generally. As I said yesterday, they have had their salad days and therefore must be looked upon from a different point of view, rather than as being part of the economic woof. They cannot make the contribution that my friend is talking about.

Senator Roblin: I think I am going to partially agree with my honourable friend, if he will stick around and see what I have to say this afternoon.

Senator Sinclair: I may not be able to stick around.

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—POSITION OF CANADIAN PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Let me say that we shall be anxiously awaiting his speech this afternoon.

I notice that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has joined that multitude who are condemning the government with respect to their actions on de-indexation of old age pensions. On hearing that, I really had to check my position. I thought perhaps I had made a mistake, but it is nice to welcome them aboard.

My question pertains to the Canadian Petroleum Association, that vociferous spokesman of the multinationals, who were treated handsomely and, if I can use the word, liberally, in that same budget, and has such an alleged deep and profound social conscience. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has received any representation from the Canadian Petroleum Association with respect to the intention of the government to de-index old age pensions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I will be better able to answer that after I have read my honourable friend's report on energy, in which he will be dealing with the position of these "rapacious" oil companies that he has mentioned.

Senator Flynn: You cannot mix oranges and apples.

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—PRESS RELEASE BY PRESIDENT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON AGING

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I think we all received a press release within the last few days from Mrs. Yhetta Gold, the President of the National Advisory Council on Aging, who I believe is from Manitoba as well. In it she indicates that the current plans for de-indexing are going to provide a short-term saving in exchange for a long-term loss. She says:

More and more senior Canadians will find it difficult to cope with a deteriorating physical, mental and social condition. In time, expenditures for other types of care will limit the savings due to de-indexing.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us whether he will deal with this in his speech, or could he tell us what kind of response Mr. Epp has given to Mrs. Gold?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would like to tantalize my honourable friend by suggesting that she, too, remain in her place, and she will hear what I have to say on that subject. I am probably overlooking very few of the observations that have been made in respect of this problem.

Senator Olson: You are supposed to answer questions in Question Period.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ALLEGED CONDUCT OF FORMER CORPORAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I doubt that he will be dealing with this in his heralded speech this afternoon, although anything is possible.

My question deals with the Solicitor General and former Corporal Jim Wood. There has been a suggestion that Mr. Wood, a former corporal in the RCMP, used to leak information to Mr. MacKay when he was in opposition.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Frith: The allegation is that Mr. Wood has now been rewarded by being appointed to the Canadian Pension Commission. The difficulty is that nothing I have read about it deals with the direct question of whether or not Mr. Wood did, in fact, as is alleged, leak information to Mr. MacKay. When Mr. MacKay was asked about it he said:

I've known Jim Wood off and on for over a few years—as I have many other members of the force.

This was outside the chamber.

He has always served his country well in his function as an RCMP member, and I'm sure he'll continue this solid record of public service in his new position.

What I am asking the Leader of the Government to do is to find out for us what the facts are that all of this is supposed to be based on. That is, will he ask the Solicitor General whether or not Mr. Wood used to leak information to him when he was in opposition?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I had better undertake to ask my colleague to comment further on the allegations, and ask him whether he has anything he wishes to add to the statement he has already made that would deal with the point my honourable friend raises.

Senator Frith: I hope the Leader of the Government will particularly, when asking him, say that my interest is really in knowing whether the fact upon which all these allegations are based is true.

Senator Flynn: The allegations were made by whom?

● (1420)

Senator Frith: I'm asking the questions. Do you want me to go over there and answer questions?

Senator Flynn: Who made the remark?

Senator Frith: I'll tell you that.

Senator Flynn: Whom are you hiding?

Senator Frith: There is nothing to hide. I will read the whole thing. It states:

Solicitor General Elmer MacKay debased the Royal Canadian—

Senator Flynn: No! No!

Senator Frith: You asked the question, now you've got to sit and take the answer.

Senator Flynn: That is not the answer.

Senator Frith:

—Mounted Police oath of secrecy when he offered a highly paid post—

I avoided reading all of this but you want it, so you can have it.

—a highly paid post to a former Mountie who used to leak information to him when he was in opposition, Liberal John Nunziata said yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That is what I wanted on the record.

Senator Frith: Can the reporter hear all right?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order! Order!

Senator Frith: The article continues:

The appointment of Jim Wood, an RCMP corporal, to the Canadian Pension Commission at an annual salary of $65,000—

I am wondering if the reporter can hear everything.

—at an annual salary of $65,000—

Senator Flynn: Shame!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame! No!

Senator Frith:

—sends a message—

You asked for it.

—sends a message to other RCMP officers that they can "violate their oath with impunity," Nunziata told the House of Commons.

Senator Flynn: Aha!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that I avoided mentioning any of these issues. I asked simply for the facts.

Senator Flynn: You did not say everything.

Senator Frith: Now you want more, so you will get more.

Senator Flynn: We don't!

Senator Frith: To continue:

"Indeed, if they violate their oath—

Senator Flynn: Don't bother!

Senator Frith:

"Indeed, if they violate their oath for the greater glory of the Tory party, they may even be rewarded."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Those little brown envelopes.

Senator Frith: Do you want to hear more? Fine.

But MacKay, who used information from Wood to attack the Liberal government when he was on the Opposition benches,—

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Frith:

—rejected Nunziata's suggestion as "malicious and unfair."

And now for the question: Did that in fact take place? That was my question but Senator Flynn wanted more. He wanted to ask me some questions so I am giving him the answers. Now, when we try to find out if Mr. Wood, when he was a corporal in the RCMP, did or did not leak information to Mr. MacKay, and when Mr. MacKay is asked he says:

"I've known Jim Wood off and on for over a few years as I have many other members of the force,"—

Still no answer.

"He has always served his country well in his function as an RCMP member and I'm sure he'll continue this solid record of public service in his new position."

What we want to know is, when he was serving his country well in his function as an RCMP member, did that good service include leaking information to Mr. MacKay?

Senator Flynn: Did you ever commit a sin?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I want to express—

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn has another question for me.

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

Senator Roblin: I want to express my gratitude to Senator Flynn for acquainting me with the source of the rumour—a member of the other place. I am not exactly sure whether it is required of me to satisfy allegations made by a member of the other place when the minister to whom he addressed the question is sitting in front of him. I think it is up to that member, if he is not satisfied with the answer that he got from the minister, to pursue his questioning. But to raise the same issue in this house and expect me to provide a different answer from that already provided by the minister is not correct use of the Question Period here.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have a point of order. I said there were allegations made and I wanted to know the facts. The facts have not appeared on the record there or elsewhere. That is what I am asking for.

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking for Nunziata?

Senator Frith: Is the Leader of the Government seriously suggesting that I am not entitled, as a senator, to ask him whether the fact is or is not that something took place? That is what I want to find out.

As I understand it, the point the Leader of the Government is making is that the question was asked in the other place, that allegations were made in the other place and that I am not entitled to ask for facts connected with those allegations. I am so entitled and that is all I am asking for. I am not asking him to say anything about Mr. Nunziata.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: No, I am not. Read the record. I am simply asking for an answer to this question.

Senator Flynn: Ask him.

Senator Frith: Mr. Nunziata does not know whether it happened or not.

Senator Flynn: If he does not know, he should not have made that allegation.

Senator Frith: That is his problem. You wanted to know about Mr. Nunziata, and I told you about him. Now we are going to talk about what I want to know, as a senator, not what Mr. Nunziata wants to know.

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

Senator Frith: I want to know: Did Corporal Wood leak information to Mr. MacKay or not—period? That is the question.

Senator Perrault: A good question.

Senator Frith: It could not be any more simple and it is perfectly in order. It has nothing to do with whether someone asked questions in the other place.

Senator Flynn: You use your immunity like Nunziata. That is cowardly!

Senator Roblin: I have taken notice of the fact that my honourable friend—

Senator Frith: Whom are you calling a coward?

Senator Flynn: I said that what you said was cowardly.

Senator Frith: Is it parliamentary to call a senator cowardly?

Senator Flynn: I did not call you a coward; I said that what you said was cowardly.

Senator Frith: That is a very cowardly answer.

Senator Flynn: I don't mind.

Senator Frith: You do not have the guts to stick with it.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION

REPLACEMENT OF WING COMMANDER MacKENZIE, DFC

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, according to the report in the newspaper, Corporal Wood replaced Wing Commander Andy MacKenzie, DFC, whom I met when I was representing the Senate at the thirty-fifth anniversary of the D-Day celebrations. Wing Commander MacKenzie fought not only in Europe, but while fighting in Korea he was shot down.

Senator Perrault: The Tories shot him down again.

Senator Godfrey: He spent two years in solitary confinement in China before he was released. He is very well regarded in the air force. He never, as far as I know, had any political connections with the Liberal Party.

In view of all of that, would the Leader of the Government speak to the minister in an endeavour to find Wing Commander MacKenzie some other suitable employment? I know it may be too late to put him back on the Canadian Pension Commission.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): When my honourable friend speaks of a veteran, I listen. From personal contact with him many years ago, I know of Wing Commander MacKenzie's distinguished career in the air force.

My honourable friend can rest assured that I will take his question as notice and try to find an answer for him.

APPROPRIATIONS

URGENCY OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-54

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government or, perhaps, more appropriately for his deputy, Senator Doody.

On Tuesday, the Deputy Leader of the Government, with regard to Bill C-54, the appropriation bill, said:

If we do not get the appropriation bill through before the end of this week, then they will have to go to extreme lengths to get funding for various matters of concern for the Government of Canada, namely, the payment of their ongoing expenses.

It is now almost two weeks before the end of June. Interim supply was granted for the first three months of the fiscal year. Why the urgency of having the measure before the end of this week, and why would extreme lengths have to be contemplated to get funding to pay ongoing expenses?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the concern of Senator Stewart. I would like to iterate and, perhaps, even reiterate that the information I delivered to the chamber yesterday was as a result of a message I received from the Treasury Board. It seemed to me at the time that there was some urgency and that was the message I delivered. It was the message I had received.

I will undertake to try to get the information for Senator Stewart from Treasury Board to expand on my answer of yesterday. The information that I received was that, if the government did not get this appropriations bill by the end of the week, it would have to go to warrants. Perhaps naively, I did not ask for an elucidation of the reasoning behind that. I accepted the statement at face value. I will certainly try to obtain the substantiating data behind that and deliver it to the honourable senator as soon as I possibly can.

● (1430)

Senator Stewart: By way of a supplementary question—which I ask because I assume that we will get to order No. 3 on the order paper today—Senator Doody now speaks of going to warrants. Perhaps he would inquire as to what kind of warrants would be used, with Parliament in session, to withdraw money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Senator Doody: I certainly will. I was perfectly cognizant of having used that word because, like Senator Stewart, my experience has been that one does not use governor's warrants when Parliament is in session. With that in mind, then, I shall certainly follow up on the question.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO U.S.S.R. AND AVAILABILITY OF HOPPER CARS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with the proposed trip to Russia of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. First, does he intend to discuss the matter of using the Port of Churchill for the transportation of grains from Canada to Russia? The Russians have entered into grain contracts with Canada on a long-term basis. I am very interested in this matter and I know that our minister will be meeting with those ministers involved with agriculture and grain in the Soviet Union.

Bearing in mind the Port of Churchill, and having become aware that Transcona has now started to build hopper cars of lightweight material—possibly aluminum—I ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware of how many cars the CNR is building. How soon will they be available? How soon will they be on the tracks to the Port of Churchill? Could he provide to us some up-to-date information on what has taken place in that regard?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I quite understand my honourable friend's interest, because he has had a long-standing—I almost said "flirtation"; that is not the right word to use—interest in what is going on in the Port of Churchill. He is quite right in saying that the CNR has now developed a special lightweight hopper car that can use the rather unreliable railroad track to Churchill, which is, of course, closed to standard hopper cars. It is expected that one of these days we might even have a little ceremony to unveil this new hopper car. If we do, I hope that I will remember to ask my honourable friend to attend that unveiling.

Respecting the general question of the visit to Russia of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, my honourable friend can be assured that that is one of the items on his agenda. The government is anxious to do what it can to improve the use of the Port of Churchill. Indeed, it is studying measures to improve the facilities there. I hope that one day in the not-too-distant future we will be able to offer further information about the government plan for that port.

Senator Guay: Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate of the number of cars that will be built by the CNR? It is my understanding that the cars are being built in different proportions, in terms of weight. It would be interesting for all honourable senators to know what this is all about.

Senator Roblin: I shall take that part of my friend's question as notice.

INVESTMENT CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barrotes, for the second reading of the Bill C-15, intituled: "An Act respecting investment in Canada".—(Honourable Senator Davey.)

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have known the Honourable Sinclair Stevens for a very long time. I must confess at once that I like him and admire not only his tenacity but his commitment to the political process. I make these observations notwithstanding my opinion that this bill is wrong-headed and smacks very much of this government's branch plant mentality.

What does it say about this government, a government that is only now about to pass its first major piece of legislation? We have already had the longest wait in parliamentary history from election day to a budget—a budget which, incidentally, did not live up to either its advance hype or its stated purpose. Be that as it may, honourable senators, I think it is typical of Mr. Stevens that he should be the first minister off the mark with an important piece of legislation.

Honourable senators, I was, and I remain, an unrepentant economic nationalist. My patron saint, as many in this chamber will know, is the Honourable Walter Lockhart Gordon, so aptly described as the gentlest of patriots, which indeed he was and which indeed he is. For me, FIRA's only fault was that it had no teeth; that it was never tough enough. But governments change, and apparently so do times, because now Canada is for sale. I think that is what the Prime Minister said, or words to that effect—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes, yes.

Senator Davey: Well, words to that effect, certainly.

An Hon. Senator: "Open for business."

Senator Davey: And, yes, it is true that the government does have public opinion surveys which indicate that a great many Canadians now agree with this government's continentalist philosophy. But be forewarned, my friends opposite, it is at best a fickle love affair. Make no mistake. What Canadians want most of all, in the memorable words of some feckless Tory speechwriter, are "jobs, jobs, jobs." And Canadians are still waiting for this government to produce. They have been told over and over again that big private American enterprise, like the U.S. cavalry of old, is going to ride in and save the day.

Well, this isn't Hollywood, honourable senators; it is the real world. Upwards of a million and a half Canadians are jobless, and recently the Minister of Finance assured us that the problem will not subside, in his opinion, for at least a decade.

Well, that is not good enough. When Canadians realize, as they inevitably will, that the United States is primarily occupied with its own economic problems, that international American corporations look after their own jobless first—which explains some of our own current high unemployment—that foreign takeovers usually cost more jobs than they create and that in return for nothing we will have sold out even more of our heritage—when these realities come home to Canadians, then—and mark my words—then those big Tory numbers will start to tumble, and so, I suggest, will the love affair with Ronald Reagan.

This is the recurring reality of Canada. Our attraction to foreign investment swoops up and down like a roller coaster. It has done so for a hundred years. Meanwhile, I wish that some of my continentalist friends would cool their rhetoric. Indeed, the minister became excessive the other day when he said that those of us who disagree with him, and I quote, "hate everything foreign." That is unfair. It is a little like my suggesting that those who support this legislation are not good Canadians. I would never say such a thing.

In fact, I love New York, apple pie, and the Toronto Blue Jays. I have a number of dear American friends, most of whom, like me, just don't agree with the politics of Ronald Reagan.

[Senator Davey.]

So, here I am, an unrepentant economic nationalist, faced with legislation which both as a Liberal and as a Canadian I find repugnant. I am sure some of my friends opposite faced this kind of problem on countless occasions in the past; but may I suggest that it was easier for them because they were a minority and could vote their conscience. I could never believe that we should use our majority here to thwart the will of the other place. I have really only one course of action: to put my concern on the record, to ask a series of questions for information, and then possibly to abstain when it comes time to vote.

In that spirit, and briefly, honourable senators, let me put these facts on our record. It is a dreary as well as all too familiar catalogue which should inhibit any government's open door to foreign investment. The following are StatsCan figures: our rubber industry, 98 per cent foreign owned; the tobacco industry, 97 per cent foreign owned; the electrical apparatus industry, 71 per cent foreign owned; manufacturing, 51 per cent foreign owned; transportation equipment, 92 per cent foreign owned; agricultural machinery, 51 per cent foreign owned; the chemical industry, 71 per cent foreign owned. By now honourable senators should have the idea. In fact, few countries in the world come even close to Canada when it comes to foreign ownership of its economy. Japan has one per cent foreign ownership; the United Kingdom, 2 per cent; the United States, 2.5 per cent; France, 3 per cent; and Canada, a staggering 30 per cent. In other words, foreign control of our economy is pervasive, it is massive, and it should be alarming.

Someone may ask "Does it really matter?" I think it does, even setting aside the contribution that foreign ownership makes to the erosion of our national spirit and to the resultant Canadian national inferiority complex.

Those things aside, let us examine just one net result of what foreign ownership does to our service deficit. In 1984 there was an outflow from Canada, for interest payments on foreign debt, of $1 million each and every day, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 52 weeks a year; plus $300,000 every hour in dividends that we pay non-Canadians for their ownership in Canada; plus another $800,000 every hour in service charges related directly to the degree of foreign ownership. That totals $35 billion per year.

Even more depressing, honourable senators, is the fact that more than 60 per cent of all loans made by Canadian banks go to non-citizens of Canada. Mel Hurtig in a recent speech said:

It's indeed ironic that in a country where so many of our business and political leaders have for so long pontificated about our heavy dependency on foreign investment, our own major banks, employing Canadian savings, have been the financiers of so much of the foreign control of our own country. It's probably safe to say that throughout the 1970's over half of all private-sector bank loans made by our large banks went to foreign-controlled corporations either inside or outside of Canada. In 1983, an educated guess would be that a shocking 65% of all the dollars lent by our own big banks to private corporations go to foreign firms.

He then says:

It would be nice to offer a more specific calculation, but neither the Bank of Canada nor the Department of Finance is able to, nor are the banks themselves prepared to offer much information on the subject.

In short it's clear we good Canadians continue to finance most of the sellout of our own country.

Meanwhile, honourable senators, FIRA, in my opinion, was at least a stop-gap, albeit ineffective.

Honourable senators will recall that of the several thousand foreign investments reviewed, more than 95 per cent were approved. Of those, almost half of the applications were updated in terms of Canadian value; and countless other foreign takeovers were not even attempted, thanks to FIRA.

Now, under this new bill, we have a $5 million threshold for direct investment review, a $50 million threshold for indirect investment review, and no review at all for new investment.

In other words, more than 90 per cent of all takeovers will no longer be reviewed; and one man alone—Sinclair Stevens—will determine whether such an investment is of “net benefit” to Canada. No longer will it be “of significant benefit”—

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Davey:—because all of us accept foreign investment on our own terms, but now it is simply “net benefit” as determined by the minister.

I began by saying that I admire Mr. Stevens, and I do. But does anyone seriously imagine that the minister will reject anything at all?

Absolutely none of those concerns seems to matter to this government, which cares only about the sacred commitment to the private sector in general and to American private investment in particular; and all that some of us can do is stand by and watch the erosion of our cultural and economic sovereignty.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Davey: That is strong language, but with a Prime Minister who apparently is prepared to sell even our water, I just don't know.

One happy footnote that honourable senators should be aware of is that thanks to the effective work of just 40 Grits in the other place, the government is unable to exempt, without review, the takeover of all rental properties from foreign investors.

I shall close by drawing the attention of the Senate to that part of the bill which provides for a review of investments of all kinds that are “related to Canada's cultural heritage and national identity.” A review? Surely there should be outright rejection of those kinds of investments.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Davey: The other day in the other place the minister referred to book publishing as a case in point. He said that book publishing should not be allowed to pass into non-

Canadian hands. I say “Amen” to that—except that Mr. Stevens added the following phrase:

Book publishing should not be allowed to pass into non-Canadian hands without a review.

That is not good enough. We know these Tory “reviews” too well.

May I therefore ask nine specific questions, to which I trust the bill's sponsor will respond—although he may require time to do so?

I wish to stress that they are not rhetorical questions. I am seeking facts. I want to find out how seriously this government takes its commitment to Canadian cultural survival.

(1) Will this government continue to guarantee that all newspapers published in Canada, and all radio and television cable stations in Canada, will continue to be owned and operated by Canadians?

(2) Will this government give Canadians an ongoing commitment to public broadcasting in general, and to the CBC in particular? Can we be assured that the CBC, as we know it, will continue to serve Canada?

(3) Will this government continue to enforce Canadian content requirements on both radio and television? This is a particularly relevant question, because earlier this week the central Canada division of the Radio and Television News Directors passed a resolution asking that such Canadian content regulations on radio and television newscasts be dropped. Surely, honourable senators, we need a Canadian perspective on international events. Surely we are not going to turn the clock back to utter dependence on American news services.

(4) Will this government continue to protect Canadian magazine publishers by continuing to eliminate the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying space in American media? Incidentally, there is also a footnote here, which seems to be a good impetus. Recently there was a 114-page publication on World War II put out by Life magazine, which never once mentioned Canada's role. Life magazine is, of course, a product of Time Incorporated. The publication prompted Farley Mowat to suggest that “this was further evidence that Americans regard Canada as a regional backyard from which comes raw resources and Florida-bound tourists.”

(5) Will this government commit itself to the policy of its Liberal predecessor when it comes to government advertising? That is, that all advertising on behalf of the Government of Canada, appearing in Canada, will be created and executed exclusively by Canadian advertising agencies?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Davey: The next question is as follows:

(6) Will the government continue to support Canadian broadcasters with such all-important policies as the substitution of simultaneous American programs on cable, the deletion of American advertising on cable, and, of course, the aforementioned elimination of the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying time on American television?

(7) What specific steps is the government prepared to take to protect the Canadian book publishing industry?

(8) What specific steps is this government prepared to take to protect the Canadian film industry?

With regard to the film industry, the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse, made the right noises in Hollywood earlier this week when he said:

The overwhelming pervasiveness of American films on Canadian screens has been an issue for Canadian governments for a long time. Unfortunately, the last six months of discussion have produced no practical results whatsoever.

Honourable senators should be aware that in 1984 American movies accounted for 80 per cent of Canada's $400 million movie box office receipts. The screen time for Canadian films was less than 2 per cent. In my judgment, levies and quotas are the only answer. Moral suasion of the American film industry simply will not work. It has been tried and it has failed. I hope that Mr. Masse is on the right track.

• (1450)

Finally, I come to my ninth question: Will this government guarantee the future of the Canadian Football League by spelling out in specific terms that American professional football will be neither desirable nor welcome in Canada? The last time I mentioned this subject in the Senate, somebody came up to me and asked how we could do this without cutting out the Blue Jays and the Expos. The answer is easy. The coming of baseball to Canada has destroyed absolutely nothing. Indeed, amateur baseball in this country is flourishing as never before. But bring in American football and we can kiss goodbye to the Grey Cup—a great, meaningful, national institution in a country which has far too few national institutions—as we know it.

I thank honourable senators for their courtesy and I look forward to Senator Kelly's answers to my questions. In closing, I quote from the 1977 Senate Committee on Mass Media report which has withstood the years rather well. The quote is from the report's introduction with only one phrase transposed. We said:

Geography, language, and perhaps a failure of confidence and imagination have made us into a cultural as well as economic satellite of the United States . . .

We are not suggesting that these influences are undesirable, nor that they can or should be restricted. The United States happens to be the most important, most interesting country on earth. The vigour and diversity of its popular culture—which is close to becoming a world culture—obsesses, alarms, and amuses not just Canadians, but half the people of the world.

What we are suggesting is that the Canadian (Government) . . . (has) an interest in and an obligation to promote our apartness from the American reality. For all our similarities, for all our sharing, for all our friendships, we are somebody else.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators—

[Senator Davey.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Kelly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I must say that I have been scribbling furiously because Senator Davey, who is a great friend of mine, did not give me notice of his questions in advance, but I shall struggle to answer his questions at the end of my remarks. I think this has been a useful debate with thoughtful remarks being made on both sides of the chamber. Before making final comment on this important piece of legislation and its role in the overall economic agenda of the government, I will take a few minutes to attempt to respond to some of the specific concerns raised by honourable colleagues. Reference was made by Senator Sinclair and Senator Graham earlier to the need for a more specific definition of business activity related to cultural, heritage and national identity. I will come back to this subject a little later in response more specifically to Senator Davey. However, I believe that Senator Baroote dealt with this question, at least in terms of the definition of and identifying areas of concern in specific terms. I would point out that the minister has stated that these definitions will be included in regulations to be issued at the time the legislation is proclaimed.

In respect to the suggestion of Senator Sinclair that clause 14 be amended to require a review of any new business in the fossil fuel sector, I would suggest to my honourable colleague that if the government should find it necessary to increase control of oil and gas development, it might be better to do so in specific legislation, rather than in the Investment Canada bill.

Concern was expressed, both during the pre-study and in this debate, about the transfer of decision-making authority from the full cabinet to a single minister, that perhaps it gives too much power to one minister. Honourable senators, I would like to offer what is really a personal view on this matter, because it is something about which I have thought a great deal over time. Were it not for our system of parliamentary democracy, I, too, would worry about power in the hands of individuals. However, in our system, along with the power to decide goes accountability for those decisions. A minister with power to decide must be accountable to his cabinet colleagues, to his caucus and finally to Parliament. It is easy for me to understand how our system holds an identifiable minister responsible and accountable, but somewhat more difficult for me to see how you would hold a cabinet committee or a full cabinet accountable, except at election time, and this happens under normal circumstances only once every four years. So I do not have the fear of a minister having responsibility to decide, because he is accountable for every decision he makes. In addition, ministers must consult with one another on a regular basis in the carrying out of their responsibilities. The extent of that consultation would vary from case to case, but accountability is ever present.

I believe the government is simply trying to avoid an administrative strait-jacket that would necessitate a collective decision on all cases with the extra time and cost that would be entailed.

Senator Graham pointed out that the bill does not specify the ways in which the minister will encourage business development. I believe the bill itself and the message it sends goes a long way toward that end. I believe the message that Canada wants to encourage investment will have an impact not only externally but internally on the bureaucracy, and this will be important when the staff of Investment Canada hears remarks such as those made by Mr. Labbé, Commissioner of FIRA, to the effect that this new legislation is meant to encourage investors. Their own way of thinking changes, and rather than saying to proposed investors, "We will see whether you can or cannot invest here," they will say, "Let's see how we can make it possible for you to invest here." I think that is important.

Concerns were expressed by Senator Godfrey and others about the distinction between "significant" benefit and "net" benefit. I suppose I could argue both ways, but it seems to me that "net" benefit is a little more precise and, therefore, slightly more in the direction of making things somewhat easier for those would-be investors who have the decision to make about whether or not to apply. I agree totally with Senator Godfrey's point that efforts should continue to encourage Canadians to invest more in their own country, but I do not believe that Bill C-15 in any way forecloses on this taking place, and further, I believe that Investment Canada could well result in a growing number of joint ventures and partnerships between Canadians and offshore investors in Canada.

As regards Senator Davey's comments, I shall try very hard to deal with them, probably quite inadequately, as I always do when he asks me questions. However, I do take issue with the suggestion that someone said Canada was for sale. I would say to my honourable colleague that I have not heard that remark issue from the Prime Minister or any of his ministers. I do not believe that that is what is being said at all and, deep down, I do not believe that that is what Senator Davey believes either. However, I sympathize with his view. We are all concerned, given the nature, size, population, and relative wealth of Canada, about losing control of our own identity. I think this concern has been recognized in Bill C-15. If this government were not concerned about this matter, then clauses 15 and 35 would not have found their way into the bill. I suggest to Senator Davey that many of the concerns he raises are dealt with in other legislation. I think the CRTC deals with a number of the questions and concerns expressed by the honourable senator.

In the overall, however, I still must come back to the fact that we have a million and a half people unemployed. We must try to do something about that. I think that is what Bill C-15 is all about. In the process of trying to do something about it, of course, we must be sure we are not selling the store; that we are not letting something slip away that we can never get back. There is no question about that, but we absolutely must try, and I, for one, am not ready to suggest that it will not work. I worry a little about too many people saying that it will not work, whatever the initiative of the current government happens to be. I think that can become a self-fulfilling prophecy. If we start on the basis that we want to get a million and a half people back to work, none of us can disagree with that. Let us see if we can accomplish that, but let us be careful that we do not lose something in the process, as I mentioned earlier. However, we must try. I do not think we can have it both ways.

It was mentioned by someone earlier—and I do not think it was Senator Davey—that we cannot allow offshore investments to come here, buy a plant and close it up. In my opinion, the circumstance would be rare indeed where an offshore buyer wants to plough money into this country so that he can close up the plants. I can see the circumstances down the line where that might occur, but I do not see that as a basic objective when someone applies to invest in this country.

It is, after all, a global marketplace and the globe is getting smaller and smaller. I heard the other day about an organization that manufactures pizzas and sends them to Italy. That speaks loudly for the nature of this marketplace that we are all in, and we must be a part of it. I do not see us closing ourselves out of it, but I think we can find a way further into that marketplace without running into the difficulties that Senator Davey expressed concern about today. However, I do sympathize with his concern; I believe this government sympathizes with his concern.

Honourable senators, as I stated at the opening of this debate, and as I mentioned a moment ago, we are looking at the question of job creation and re-employment of Canadians as a central objective. Bill C-15 is very much a part of the government's economic agenda, which I believe I covered as adequately as I could on the opening of this debate, and I do not see the need to repeat it now.

Sincerely, honourable senators, I think this discussion has been excellent and I do urge passage of this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the honourable senator permit a question, or rather, one question involving two points?

Senator Roblin: Go ahead, make it two questions.

Senator Kelly: Yes, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Sinclair raised three questions, one or two of them by way of suggestions, and Senator Kelly, in closing the debate, dealt with one of them. The first of those questions is found at page 1026 of the Debates of the Senate of June 13, 1985. After reading one of the purposes of Bill C-15, Senator Sinclair then said:

That is a laudable purpose, but I ask honourable senators, would that not be improved if there were only a slight addition, and that addition incorporated into the Purpose of the Act the following: A review of control arising from direct investment? That, I think, would improve the bill.

Then at pages 1027 and 1028, Senator Sinclair made a suggestion about a change to clause 5 to enable the audit to take place, and then suggested an amendment to clause 14.

Senator Kelly dealt with the question of clause 14, but not the other two points. Was that just oversight?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I would need to check the record, but I believe that Senator Barootes responded to the question of audit. However, I do not read anything in Bill C-15 that leaves me with the feeling that the government intends to do other than watch very closely the results of this new legislation and the results of the decisions made by the minister in terms of all of the things about which everyone has expressed concern. I do not get the impression, honourable senators, that there is an intent here merely to put these matters into the lap of the Honourable Sinclair Stevens and let him run with it without anyone else really being concerned. I believe all of those things will take place, and that is about the best answer I can give you at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-41, intituled: "An Act to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to amend the Crop Insurance Act in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.)

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, the bill before us is certainly a non-controversial bill in the sense that it has the support of all the parties in the House of Commons and I am sure it will receive full support in the Senate. In introducing this bill yesterday, Senator Balfour gave a comprehensive and, I think, a very adequate outline of the moneys involved and the purposes for which they are to be used. As he said, there was something over $9 million left unused in the PFAA fund when it was phased out and succeeded by crop insurance, and arrangements have been made to have this money used for research purposes to assist agriculture in developing new products of various kinds. This was, of course, one of the initiatives that was taken by the Honourable Eugene Whalen during the tenure of the last government and, at that time, as is the case now, the idea received general support.

This is, I suppose, the final phase and the final wind-up of the old Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That act was brought into operation in 1939 under the auspices of the late Right Honourable J. G. Gardner. Prairie farm assistance served a very useful purpose over many years. Criticisms of that assistance were many. One was, of course, that it applied only to the prairie provinces, and people from outside the prairie provinces wanted the same protection as the people on the prairies. Although developments made it draw ever closer to being somewhat on an individual basis, it was also on an area basis, and that area base became smaller. There was always the contention that some producers would have crop failures as defined in the act, but could not be paid because they were not in a sufficiently large area. Therefore it was a matter of somewhat rough justice. But it did assist a great many farmers.

Early on in those years, the idea of crop insurance came to the fore, and I remember in my days at the University of Saskatchewan that a very able and brilliant student at that time, R. E. Motherwell, based his master's thesis on a study of crop insurance. I think that was a useful exercise in that it provided a good deal of information for those who wished to go forward with the idea of crop insurance. I might say that the late R. E. Motherwell was the grandson of the former Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable W. R. Motherwell.

A close friend of mine at the university, a man who went on to obtain his doctor's degree, Mr. M. E. Anderson, wrote his doctorate thesis on the PFAA itself, and today that excellent paper contains a wealth of information on the operation of that act. I think these two papers helped establish a theoretical basis from which crop insurance could develop.

● (1510)

The Crop Insurance Act came forward afterwards, and I say, in all fairness, it was introduced by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton; it was made nation-wide, based upon agreements with provincial governments. It has evolved since, and I think it has been of increasing benefit. I have always taken the view that, in so far as it is possible, the farmers in all provinces in Canada should have access to the same kind of crop insurance protection.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, in 1975, did a study of crop insurance, particularly as it related to western Canada, but also as it related to all parts of Canada, and we made a report which recommended that steps be taken to make the coverage more nearly uniform. If you are dealing with ten provincial governments, you cannot have the coverage identical, obviously. Some provinces would have crops that are of importance to that province but not of importance to other provinces. However, the programs—and I make special reference to the three prairie provinces—are nearly the same, but they are not quite the same. In Saskatchewan, in 1985 winter wheat can be insured. I believe that in Manitoba, in 1985 they are not able to have their winter wheat crop insured, and I would hope that Manitoba would catch up to Saskatchewan in the interests of its producers.

The amounts paid out under prairie farm assistance were very considerable over the years. The total payments were some $378 million, and the levies the farmers paid amounted to $201 million, a benefit of about two to one. The largest payment in one year that I have seen during that period of time was some $54 million. With crop insurance it is another ball game. The largest payment under PFAA, some $54 million in one year, has to be compared with a payment under crop insurance to producers last year of $289 million.

A very interesting statistic shows that crop insurance today is viable, that revenue has been just in excess of $1.9 billion and payments made have amounted to $1.67 billion. So, the crop insurance system is viable; it is in a good state, and I think it is something that is working reasonably well and should be kept in force.

Under PFAA farmers on the prairies contributed 1 per cent of their gross receipts. The government, for all practical purposes, as the statistics show, matched that amount and the farmers received the benefit. Under crop insurance the allocation of the costs is equal between the farmers and the Government of Canada. The farmer pays 50 per cent of the premium, the federal government matches the premium. The provinces make a contribution, they administer the act, and the last figure I have for their cost is some 8 per cent. Thus, the federal government and farmers pay about 46 per cent each and the provincial government pays 8 per cent.

Prairie farm assistance for those of us who were around at that time had the reputation, with its administration, of being something of a Jimmy Gardner political machine. That was the allegation. Well, I do not think he had many Conservatives working for PFAA; I think they were pretty well all Liberals. They did a great job, they were very generous, they were easy to deal with and they liked to give the farmer a break whenever they could. Then the Honourable Alvin Hamilton decided that the provinces should administer the crop insurance.

I think it is a wrong principle when one government pays the money, in an insurance scheme like this at any rate, and hands over the administration to the province which has no responsibility for the program in the sense of paying any part of it.

Senator Doody: It's called confederation!

Senator Argue: Call it what you like, but it leads to provincial political machines. The crop insurance administration in the provinces is not part of the Public Service. The NDP had a political machine in crop insurance in Saskatchewan. When the Conservatives came in they had a tough time dealing with this question and there were some ill feelings; some people were dismissed and new people were hired. At least the public perception now is that it is a Conservative political machine. I guess if somebody wants to get some employment with the crop insurance administration, his chances of getting it would be much greater if he could show support for the Conservative Party than if he supported another party.

In any event, it is a good program, it is of great benefit, but there is a looming danger. The government has decided to cut back on agricultural programs. The government has decided it is "going to have a look at them." The Honourable Erik Nielsen's ministerial task force has published a report. They have been looking at a lot of things, and one of them is crop insurance. The report says:

Crop insurance offers to agricultural producers a means of purchasing protection against production risks. Crop insurance is currently funded on a tripartite basis by the federal and provincial governments, and by producers via their insurance premiums. While the question remains whether producers should receive ad hoc assistance for losses due to natural risks where they could have purchased protection via crop insurance, the federal government reaffirms its commitment to these highly effective programs.

That little titbit in there says that as far as the federal government is concerned there will be no further flood assistance or disaster assistance, as was generously provided by the federal government under the Right Honourable John Turner to northeastern Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, the former administration provided $16 million for flood victims, farmers who lost crops in northeastern Saskatchewan, and the new Conservative government, saying they were friends of agriculture, reduced that to $8 million and the Honourable Erik Nielsen says, "You got it once but you will never get it again." I do not think that is a very constructive attitude for the government to take.

The report goes on:

At the same time, the federal government will be indicating to the provincial governments that it wishes to renegotiate the cost shares, with a view to a more equitable balance of financial obligations between the three parties.

Instead of looking at crop insurance from the standpoint of negotiating a better system, they are going to look at loading a greater cost on provincial governments and on the farmers.

I have used this occasion, honourable senators, to make some remarks about prairie farm assistance and the winding-up bill. That bill alludes to crop insurance itself. I also wished to say that we in this country have made a great deal of progress in providing crop insurance for farmers, paid for partially by themselves, when they have suffered a loss. I want to say to the government, certainly on behalf of my party and, I believe, also on behalf of farm organizations generally, that we shall resist any drive by the government to reduce the benefits under crop insurance or to add a further cost to farmers during times when they are finding it so difficult to continue their operations. We will vote for the bill. We say to the government to deal with the question of crop insurance and keep on improving it and to resist any drive by the Honourable Erik Nielsen, the Minister of Finance and all others who want to tear down, from a farmer's standpoint, the very important provision of crop insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1985-86

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the second reading of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986". —(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Bill C-54 would authorize the Government of Canada to expend the balance of the money requested in the main estimates. It would also authorize the Government of Canada to expend the money it requested in supplementary estimates (A). The fact that authorization is sought in this one bill for these two sets of estimates confronts us with something of a problem.

Second reading of the bill was moved on Monday, June 17. The following day, June 18, the Deputy Leader of the Government told us that the Treasury dogs were barking at his heels. He said, relative to the planning of the program of the week of the Senate:

If we do not get the appropriation bill through before the end of this week, then they will have to go to extreme lengths to get funding for various matters of concern for the Government of Canada, namely, the payment of their ongoing expenses. Therefore, it is a matter of practical necessity that we get the appropriation bill through this week before we adjourn.

When I heard that I wondered what the great urgency was. The main appropriation bill normally does not come to this place until the dying moments of the month of June; yet, here we have second reading of the bill being moved on June 17, and we have been told that unless it receives Royal Assent before the end of the week Treasury Board will have to take drastic action—and will have to seek warrants, we were told this afternoon—as a means of dealing with their dire financial plight. There must be some explanation for this deviation from the normal pattern. That is why I asked earlier today for the government to explain why this bill is needed so urgently when normally the main appropriation bill is not required before the end of June. I hope that the Leader of the Government or his deputy will explain that for us before the bill passes.

Over the years I have watched the financial officers in their relations with Parliament. I was reminded of past thoughts on this subject last winter when the Senate was confronted with Bill C-11. The Department of Finance seems to think that Parliament is a body which has to adjust to the expediency of the Department of Finance. After all, they are the top civil servants in this country—the super-bureaucrats—and ministers are brought in to serve their purposes for a while. Ministers come and ministers go, but the top bureaucrats in the Department of Finance, at least some of them, go on forever. Members of Parliament come and they go, but senators, unfortunately, stay a little while longer. But our feathers are to be plucked, we are told.

I am reminded of what happened in 1971 when the Minister of Finance of that day was proposing a new Income Tax Act. Without regard to all the advice that they received from the staff of the House of Commons, they brought in a notice of ways and means motion which was virtually in the form of the bill that they intended to put on the statute books. As many honourable senators know, that means that the hands of the Minister of Finance were tied insofar as the wording of the bill was concerned. The bill had to be consistent with his notice of ways and means motion. That motion produced by the Department of Finance was so specific that the minister found it very difficult to bring in a bill that was acceptable to members of the House of Commons, or even to those within his own party.

Then last February we had the example of Bill C-11 where the business to be done should have been dealt with in two bills. Now we are told that there were financial consequences that flowed from proceeding as they did; yet stubbornly, they insisted on going ahead regardless of the rights of Parliament.

Now we have yet another example. I do not claim that this is a major example, but it is an instance of the same kind of approach. We have one bill where we should have two. We should have one bill dealing with the balance of the main estimates and we should have a separate bill dealing with the money based on supplementary estimates (A). I do not argue that it is improper to put these two matters together, but it is improper to put them together and then insist that that part of the bill that is based on the main estimates has to be passed and receive Royal Assent with the same speed and urgency that seems to attend that part of the bill that is based on supplementary estimates (A). That is my complaint.

Perhaps Senator Doody is going to rise in his place and say, "No, no, it is not as obvious as that. What you say, of course, is true, but there is a much deeper reason and a greater kind of urgency here that you do not even suspect." I am hoping he will make some kind of interesting revelation along those lines.

We are being urged to give second reading now and third reading quickly to Bill C-54. As I said, second reading was moved the day before yesterday. Nowadays the Senate is going to be put right. The new, straitened régime has been revealed from on high. Thirty days is the appropriate amount of time for a money bill in the Senate. Nevertheless, in this case, this unreformed body is being asked to pass this bill in one week, that is, in about four days. I cannot resist asking myself: What kind of frenzy would the Minister of Justice find himself in if, in fact, we were to take the 30 days, the period which he finds appropriate for debating money bills?

Senator MacEachen: That's an idea.

Senator Frith: Has that ever occurred to you?

Senator Doody: I have been awake every night this week. You have no idea how much I worry about John's frenzy.

Senator Stewart: We do not want to roast Senator Doody as Crosbie's vicar, although he, too, is a Newfoundlander. He should feel chagrin on behalf of his province.

The appropriate period of time for debating a money bill is 30 days, yet we are being told that, unless the government has this bill for the end of this week, it will have to resort to the use of warrants. I asked earlier what kind of warrants these would be and I await the answer to that question.

Honourable senators, that is all I wanted to say about the timing of the bill, but I have something to say about the substance. Perhaps Senator Doody wants to interrupt me at this point to clarify this matter.

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Stewart: The forecast by the Minister of Finance for outlays for the fiscal year, as we know, is $105.4 billion. The main estimates, tabled on February 26, 1985, covered $103,571,860,000. Of this total, $102,530,583,000 is budgetary; whereas $1,041,277,000 is made up of loans, investments and the like.

It is interesting to notice, honourable senators, that, of this total of $103 billion, only about one-third requires to be voted by Parliament. In other words, about two-thirds of the expenditure is statutory; it is on a statutory basis and the expenditure goes on without any action by Parliament. Only about one-third of the total needs parliamentary action.

In the interim supply statute, Parliament authorized the expenditure of $10.5 billion. In the present bill, the balance of the money to be voted from the main estimates is covered. That amount is $26.7 billion. That will produce a total for the main estimates of some $37,216,857,000.

In addition to that, supplementary estimates (A) total $365,400,000. That means that, when this bill becomes law, the Parliament of Canada will have voted for this year a total of some $37,582,257,000. That is where we stand at the moment. Presumably, there will be other supplementary estimates to come. The government planned a cushion of approximately $2 billion. They will have used up only $366.4 million of that after this bill becomes law.

Honourable senators, I have put those figures on the record so that, as future supplementary estimates come before us, we can see how the government is keeping within the Minister of Finance's forecast that the total expenditures for the current fiscal year would be $105.4 billion.

At page 24-2 in the main estimates, Parliament is asked to vote some $2.277 billion as a cash payment to the governments in the provinces for the support of post-secondary education. We all know that associated with those cash payments there is the yield from the tax points included in the Established Programs Financing Arrangements.

I realize that there is a controversy with regard to which government really owns that tax-point money. Senator Tremblay, who speaks authoritatively from a Conservative viewpoint on this matter, insists that the money yielded by those tax points is provincial money; that it belongs to the governments in the provinces, and that all the Government of Canada is doing is acting as a tax collector on behalf of the provincial governments. There are others, including myself, who disagree with that. Putting that aside, the estimates do provide for a cash payment of $2.277 billion for the purposes of post-secondary education.

In the committee examination of these estimates, we looked into this whole matter of the financing of post-secondary education in a preliminary and somewhat superficial way. One of the groups which appeared before the committee was the Canadian Association of University Teachers. They drew to our attention the fact that, over an 18-year period, from 1967-68 to the present, the amount of the transfer in constant dollars from the Government of Canada to the provincial governments has increased in almost every year. In almost every year, in constant dollars, more money has been provided by the Government of Canada to the provincial governments for the purposes of post-secondary education than in the previous year. That remains true whether we talk simply about the cash transfer or whether we talk about the cash transfer plus the yield from the tax points.

● (1540)

They also put before the Committee on National Finance an important table, which appears in the Minutes of May 2, 1985, as Table 3. That table shows that the real expenditures by provincial governments for post-secondary education per student, in constant dollars, has declined in every province except one over the last nine-year period from 1977-78 to 1984-85. The table shows that, over that period in constant dollars, the provincial expenditure in Newfoundland has gone down approximately 29 per cent. In Prince Edward Island, which is the exception, the expenditure has gone up by 32.5 per cent. In Nova Scotia, it has declined by 9.4 per cent. In New Brunswick, it has declined by 18.3 per cent. In Quebec, it has declined by 18.9 per cent. In Ontario, it has declined by 17.4 per cent. In Manitoba, it has declined by 24.6 per cent. In Saskatchewan, it has declined by 12.6 per cent. In Alberta, it has declined by 14.1 per cent and, in British Columbia, at the other extremity of the country, it has declined by 23.5 per cent. The overall, average decline in Canada is 17.9 per cent; this notwithstanding that, almost every year, more money in constant dollars has been transferred from the Government of Canada to the governments of the provinces.

Many other interesting facts are revealed by this table and others provided by CAUT. I do not think that any honourable senator would disagree with the proposition that post-secondary education is of undoubted benefit and importance to the general interest of the people of Canada. A hundred years ago we would have had general agreement with that proposition. In 1985, when so much of our economic activity depends upon advances in the sciences and in conceptual thinking, it is even more acceptable as a proposition than it would have been 100 years ago.

We are being asked to vote over $2 billion for this purpose this afternoon. What is happening? To borrow an expression which we hear often these days, we are throwing money at the problem. It might be argued that that is all the attention we are giving to it; that transfers are being made by the Government of Canada to the provincial governments. The cheques are sent out and that is the end of the concern.

Honourable senators, that is not quite the case, because the Department of the Secretary of State does try to pay some attention to what happens, but it does not do so very successfully. Then, in turn, the provincial governments decide how much money they are going to transfer to the colleges and universities within their jurisdictions. The dollars end up in the colleges and universities. I am sure that each college and university does the best it can in its own locale, but that is tantamount to fighting a war with each soldier in the trenches making his own strategic decisions.

We talk about academic freedom—we use that as an excuse for not confronting the problem. We talk about the independence of the provinces in the field of education, yet when provincial authorities suggest that they are going to interfere, the universities bristle. The final result is that, in many cases, the ultimate decisions are made within the colleges and universities—very often by particular professors in particular departments. That is what I mean when I say that the war is being fought with a distinct and separate strategy devised by each soldier in the trenches. That is no way to wage a war. In that way problems are neglected.

I do not intend to reiterate to honourable senators the entire list of the problems that were put before the committee in its three meetings, but I will, if I may, mention one of them. Some years ago there was a great expansion of our colleges and universities. There were not enough faculty members to service the students who were clamouring to be admitted and who were eligible to be admitted. As a result of that, there was a great recruitment of university staff and faculty members. Then, because of the levelling off of enrollment, the recruitment tapered off. At the same time, as I mentioned, the amount of money being provided declined sharply. The result is that colleges and universities are now recruiting few new staff and faculty members. This means that the personnel pyramid is being badly distorted. It is developing high shoulders. Furthermore, it means that there are few jobs for able new young instructors and assistant professors.

Our committee was told that, very often, the able graduate students respond to the demands of the market and go elsewhere rather than finish their graduate work. I think we can all see what is going to happen. Some day fairly soon, the faculty members hired in the expansion years are going to reach the age of 65 or thereabouts, and will retire. But we will not have graduate students coming on in sufficient numbers to provide replacements. So we will have to go out in the world market to attempt to recruit people to teach young Canadians. Those people will be teaching young Canadians about the Government of Canada from an American viewpoint or a British viewpoint or, perhaps, from a continental viewpoint. I take that fairly extreme example to make my point. Not only will we be unable to staff our universities with Canadians or people who have been trained in Canada, but we will not be able to bring to Canada people of the ability of those whom we are now, in effect, turning away from our colleges and universities.

Honourable senators, many young Canadians are not finishing their training. They are going where the market leads them. We will be recruiting people who decide to come to Canada because they cannot get the jobs that they really want in the United Kingdom, the United States, or France. In my view, honourable senators, it is just not good enough to have a great dependence on people who come to Canada—not in all cases, but in some—as a second or third choice, particularly when we are spending this kind of money in the field of post-secondary education.

● (1550)

I do not expect the Leader of the Government to rise in his place this afternoon and say that he will have this matter corrected before the end of June or before the end of the 30-day period that we are supposed to have on money bills. I do not expect that at all—

Senator Roblin: It is only a thought.

Senator Stewart: It seems to me that there is too much money involved for us to take this whole matter lightly. And what is more important, post-secondary education is of too great importance to Canadian life generally, whether we are talking about the economy, or the quality of life, or the general cultural and spiritual nature of our civilization. Post-secondary education is simply too important a matter to be sloughed off from the Government of Canada to the provincial governments, and by the provincial governments, in turn, to university administrations, which in turn very often slough it off to particular departments or particular professors.

I have called this to the attention of honourable senators in the hope that, should our committee decide to focus further on this question, we will have your support.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to know whether Senator Doody is going to be able to deal with the question concerning the great urgency for having this bill by the end of this week.

Is it because this bill will provide the supplementary estimates (A) money as well as the main estimates money? And if that is so, why were the two sums embodied in the same appropriation bill?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to deal with the question, I shall undertake, as I did at Question Period today, to get from Treasury Board the rationale behind the urgency. I will make every effort to have that information available before the motion for the third reading of this bill is put, if that is acceptable to the honourable senator.

I suspect that what has been done is that the supplementary estimates (A) and the balance of the main estimates have been put into the one bill, as has been suggested. I can appreciate the fact that that is not the most appropriate way to handle the situation, if that indeed is what has been done. It would appear that that is the case.

I would also like to say that it is certainly within the jurisdiction of the Senate and of honourable senators to question the process and to bring it to the attention of the minister and of the department, if this has not been done, perhaps, in the most appropriate manner. I will certainly—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is Senator Doody closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill?

Senator Doody: I am trying to answer Senator Stewart's question.

Senator Frith: I just wanted to be sure. That's fine.

Senator Doody: Whatever the reason, whatever the rationale behind this particular sense of urgency, I shall try to find that out. And make no mistake about it, the urgency was conveyed to me. I am not putting a scam across the chamber. The message was received, and I have delivered it. And I think it would be fitting for us to try to honour the urgency, or at least the request.

Senator Stewart: I thank Senator Doody for that response.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps the appropriate thing to do would be to move the adjournment of the debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill until tomorrow. It can be adjourned in either Senator Stewart's name or in my name. Once we have the answer to the question, we can then deal with the motion for second reading tomorrow; and if everything proceeds satisfactorily, we could give leave to have third reading on the spot tomorrow.

Senator Doody: Certainly that process is in order. I see nothing wrong with that. However, it does raise the question once again—and to me it is a philosophical question rather than a political question—as to whether we in the Senate really want to hang up an appropriation bill once it is sent to us with the appropriate explanations.

Having examined both the main estimates and the supplementary estimates in committee and having reported on both to the chamber, do we really want to refuse to proceed to second reading of the bill before we get the answer? Do we want to adjourn the debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill until the answer comes and then, if the answer is satisfactory, at that point give the other place the appropriation bill that they have asked for?

I think that that is worthy of consideration before we decide on our course of action. It is certainly within the prerogative of the Senate to do whatever it wishes with any bill that comes before us. I just want to flag that question. I do not want it said that the flag had not been raised at the appropriate time, because if the bells start to ring and the flags start to wave again, I want to be in the van of the parade this time and not hanging on to the end of it.

Senator Frith: The problem with that, of course, is that whether or not we are holding something up turns on the answer to the question. Senator Stewart has said that he does not wish to hold this bill up. However, if the answer to the question is that there is really no need to have it until the end of June, which would be the normal time frame, then of course we would not be holding it up by holding it until the end of June. If, on the other hand, the answer provides us with good reasons for passing the bill now, then we pass the bill now.

So, in neither case are we talking about holding up supply.

Senator Doody: I think we are, in effect. I think—and I may be wrong; I may be interpreting Senator Frith's statement incorrectly—what the senator is suggesting is that if the answer that I bring in tomorrow, assuming that I can get the answer by tomorrow—and I hope that I can; or Friday, or whatever—isn't satisfactory to honourable senators opposite, then they will deny this appropriation bill to the Commons. That is where I see the danger. My attitude—and it was the same when I was sitting on the opposite side of this place, so I have no hesitation in saying so—is that when the Commons votes supply, the Senate provides it.

Senator Frith: Absolutely.

Senator Doody: And that notwithstanding the fact that we may not agree with their reasoning, or that we may disagree very much with the amounts and with the subheads. And I think if we find cause for that, we should so inform the minister and tell him that he should straighten up his act, or he should get his department together and change his system. But the idea of the Senate standing here and suggesting that we should wait until we get an appropriate answer about an appropriation bill, sent to us from the House of Commons, to me is just fraught with danger. I would caution honourable senators to proceed that way with extreme care. I would much prefer to have second reading take place this afternoon and proceed to try to answer this question before the bill receives third reading tomorrow.

Senator Frith: The only difficulty that we now have is a misunderstanding as to what is happening right now. What is happening right now is not holding up supply. The only "satisfactory" answer, or unsatisfactory answer, will be either: We have a very good reason for needing this bill today—

Senator Doody: I have told you that already.

Senator Frith: Yes, but then the question was asked: Why? And to give details as to why the normal period did not apply—namely, that interim supply usually lasts until the end of June.

If the answer tomorrow is that we are right, that it is not really needed until the end of June, then there will be no holding-up involved. If they say, "No, we need it now, and this is the reason we need it now—", with the detail that Senator Doody has undertaken to give, then it will be passed and there will be no holding-up.

I want to make it clear that this is not a discussion of holding up supply. It is a question of getting an explanation as to why we would be holding it up if it were not granted this week.

If Senator Doody finds it more satisfactory to work on the basis of our proceeding with second reading now with the explanation to be given tomorrow on the motion for the third reading, that is fine. That is not an important point. If he feels more comfortable with that, let's give it second reading now, and he will give us the explanation tomorrow. If third reading is not given tomorrow, that would still not be the equivalent of holding up supply, because it will only be because it is not needed tomorrow.

That is all we are awaiting an answer to.

Senator Doody: First, let me express my gratitude to the honourable senator for his agreement to go along with my suggestion. I cannot fault the impeccable logic of the honourable gentleman, nor would I ever try to get involved in that. I respect very much his legal mind and his orderly presentation of facts—

Senator Frith: But . . .

Senator Doody: But—and this is a long slow one—the problem is not in the facts as presented; the problem is in the perception. I really do not have to tell any honourable senator that very often what is in the eye of the beholder is not what is actually happening—

Senator Frith: Well, let's see what happens tomorrow.

Senator Doody: If the word gets out that we are waiting until we get an explanation of such and such before giving this bill third reading, then I am afraid of what the perception will be in places other than this one. I do not doubt for a moment that honourable senators opposite are going to give us this bill. I just prefer that they do it in a way that is consistent with perhaps what I think, erroneously, should be the way the Senate should conduct itself.

I thank you for your consideration in this respect. I think it is really for the benefit of the chamber as a whole and not for me.

Senator Frith: There will be no "if" problem if it is tomorrow. We will know tomorrow.

● (1600)

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government should not be put in the position of having to tell the Senate that they—presumably Treasury Board—will have to go to extreme lengths to get funding for various matters of concern to the Government of Canada without having been given some sort of explanation as to what the urgency is and what the extreme lengths are. It puts the Leader of the Government and his deputy in an awkward position when they have to use that kind of language and then say "Well, we will go back and see what they meant when they told us to say that."

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, perhaps I should not have used the word "extreme" with that degree of emphasis. I had not thought I had done that. I thought I had said "extreme lengths", or something like that. Or perhaps I should have just said "lengths"; or simply that "They want the money." I will try to be less histrionic the next time I ask for supply. I will be very pristine, very precise, and very concise.

[Senator Frith.]

As for being put in this position, I do not mind that at all. As I said earlier today, I was President of the Treasury Board and Minister of Finance in Newfoundland for a number of years, and the positions one gets into in that job are really rather difficult compared to my present position.

However, if honourable senators will permit me, I will conclude my remarks on second reading, unless any other honourable senator wishes to speak.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, as I have said, I would prefer to leave the point concerning the urgency of this matter, which probably hinges on the amalgamation of these two bills, until third reading tomorrow.

I have very little to add on the other matters that were raised. Senator Stewart's concern with regard to putting the Minister of Justice into a frenzy is not one that I share. There are many other Newfoundlanders whose present positions are a great deal more uncomfortable and untenable than is that of the Minister of Justice in Ottawa. I am thinking in terms of the number of unemployed people around the province who are in a far more difficult position, and I have far more sympathy for their plight than I do for my honourable colleague and friend in the other place.

With regard to the situation concerning post-secondary education, a few days ago I spoke in that connection and supported the request of Senator Leblanc that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I approached the matter from an angle and a perspective different from that of Senator Stewart. I still look at it from the point of view of its being a provincial responsibility. I lean more toward the school of thought adopted by Senator Tremblay, in terms of provincial rights, than perhaps some of my colleagues, either on the federal or the economic scene.

I believe it is a subject that will require a good deal of consideration, and will become far more important as time goes on. The amount of money involved is large, and the future of this country really depends on the development of that most important resource, our people, and also on standards, both in terms of the scientific and technical training and also on the academia that result from post-secondary education.

I completely concur with the need to examine such matters, and I look forward to participating in the examination of post-secondary education when the subject comes before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

I again thank honourable senators for their consideration in this matter, and I trust that I will be able to provide some satisfactory answers tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of a Message from the House of Commons requesting that a special joint committee be appointed to consider Canada's international relations.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order was stood by me a few days ago, not because of any reluctance to join the other place in a joint committee to examine international relations, but rather because of budget restraints in terms of financing this operation.

Certainly, we have every reason to wish to join with the other place in this study. I have been given to understand that if the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration makes the necessary references, arrangements may be made with the help of the government to provide the necessary funds for the joint committee to undertake the study.

No allowance was made for the study when the budgeting was first decided. This is a new concept that has been brought forward by the other place. Indeed, the same situation applies to the next item on the order paper, consideration of which was delayed for the same reason.

I believe that we should go ahead with this study. I have every reason to hope that funding will be arranged. I may appear to have been somewhat wishy-washy, but obviously I cannot will the money over here. If I could, I certainly would. However, I have been given an assurance that every consideration will be given to providing us with the necessary funds.

Senator Frith: You have been firmly and unequivocally wishy-washy.

Senator Doody: I have been unhesitatingly hesitant in this whole matter. The totality of the situation is that, yes, we want to get the money as soon as we can, as we would like to go ahead with this study.

Order stands.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Wood, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barrow, for the adoption of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs (Report of Commissioner-1984), presented in the Senate on 29th May, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my comments in connection with Order No. 6 apply also to this order.

Order stands.

THE BUDGET

ELIMINATION OF FULL INDEXATION OF PENSION BENEFITS—IMPACT ON SENIOR CITIZENS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of June 11, 1985, moved:

That, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits, it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.

He said: Honourable senators, should it be the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should immediately rescind this particular provision of the budget?

It is now beyond any doubt that Canada's elderly citizens feel betrayed by the Mulroney government.

This morning, on the CBC FM and AM news, there was a rather touching moment when a 69-year old citizen, who was coming from Montreal to demonstrate on Parliament Hill, said that he had never before been involved in any demonstration and had, in fact, always been against the idea of public demonstrations. However, he had given thought to the famous poem "In Flanders Fields" and the words "if we break faith with them." He said:

I feel that the government has broken faith, and although I personally am not seriously affected by the removal of full indexation, I feel it is my duty to protest because of that breach of faith.

Have senior citizens any reason to feel betrayed? Are they wrong to feel betrayed? Is it just a misunderstanding stirred up by the media and opposition politicians? Is it a form of mass paranoia stirred by peddlers of class warfare, as someone designated it?

● (1610)

Honourable senators, senior citizens have long memories. Conservative governments have a history of betraying elderly Canadians. In 1979, with interest rates and inflation climbing, Conservative Prime Minister Joe Clark told the House of Commons that senior citizens—and that included old age pensioners and those receiving the guaranteed income supplement—would simply have to, I think his word was "endure" the economic conditions creating higher costs and eroding the incomes of the elderly. In the same year, with the United States in deep recession, the Conservative government flatly refused to protect the incomes and well-being of elderly Canadians by refusing any increase in the old age pension or the GIS. The new Prime Minister has, as usual, outdone his predecessor, in this case in an act of what is perceived as callous betrayal, by first making promises to the elderly then welshing on those promises by cutting benefits to the elderly.

When did he do this? On July 26, 1984 during the election campaign, Canadians were assured that his party would increase pension benefits in Canada when the Prime Minister said, "We are committed to full pension fund reform to eliminate poverty among retired Canadians and to improve their standard of living." Honourable senators will remember that trial balloons were then sent up on the question of universality on the basis of words used by government spokesmen that universality would have to be reviewed, that maybe universality was something that had to be changed in order to attack the deficit and make other changes in economic policy.

So, after the promise made in the election, around Christmas, Canadians, including the elderly, began to worry about this government. Unrest was created. In January 1985 the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Jake Epp, outlined in a consultation paper what were to be a number of firm commitments. Having made the promise in the election, and then giving an indication of welshing on that promise, the Conservative government then tried to reassure Canadians by uttering statements such as the following:

The concept of universality is a keystone of our social safety net. Its integrity must not and will not be called into question.

Any savings which may result from program changes will not be applied to a reduction of the deficit.

It should be stated at the outset that the government regards the present system as a good one, which is working well.

The concept of a universal base payment which is taxable, and thus varies its after-tax benefits progressively (i.e. the higher the income, the lower the net benefit) is a sound one and should not be disturbed.

Changes in these programs which may result from this review should improve benefits for those in need.

Any net savings which may then remain, whether resulting from reductions in expenditures or additional revenues, should be applied to other priority concerns in the social affairs envelope. No such savings should be transferred to deficit reduction.

Now to get back to our original question: Are the elderly in some form of paranoia about this? Have they no reason to be worried as they are and as evidenced by their march on Parliament Hill today? On the basis of the assurances given in the election, and, when there was uneasiness, reaffirmed in the statement by the Minister of Health, senior citizens felt that they could sleep sweetly with those soothing words under their pillows. Then came the nightmare.

Although any reasonable person would assume that the bold words of Mr. Epp uttered in January represented firm and honourable intentions that would be outlined in the budget, the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance in May devotes only four lines to this subject, but a pretty powerful four lines they are. Pensions were being de-indexed. Full indexation was to be removed. There was just the four lines with no explanation of their ramifications, no concrete examples of how incomes of senior citizens would be affected. The explanation of the results was left to the opposition, and the opposition caught it very quickly. The Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, who brought in indexation when he was the Minister of Finance, immediately caught the deception and justly called it a sneaky budget because it did not spell out the results of those four sharp lines.

Of course, it was left also—God bless them—to the elderly themselves. They have now organized. They saw the deception and they saw through it. They realized that they had been told that no savings or additional revenues in the area of social programs would be applied to reducing the deficit, and expected, in fact, that it would be applied to increasing their benefits based on what the government had said. That is the betrayal. It is May 24; it is the House of Commons, and the Minister of Finance is on his feet:

Everyone has been asked to share a little of the burden in order to get the budget deficit and the accumulating debt problem under control.

Remember January?

—the government regards the present system as a good one, which is working well—and that it —is a sound one which should not be disturbed—that —changes in these programs which may result from this review should improve benefits for those in need—and that

—savings should not be transferred to deficit reduction—

A sharp stick in the eye in four easy lines. So the budget, which is punishing for all Canadians, is especially cruel to the elderly and, as has been described, it does not spell out how it is being cruel, but it is being so and sneakily. The results of the budget and the cruel effect on the elderly had to be dug out by the opposition, the media and the elderly themselves.

What are those effects? The real income of an elderly couple will fall nearly $1,200 by 1990. There was nothing about that in the budget speech. By 1995, the real income of an elderly couple will be cut by almost $2,600. There was nothing about that in the budget speech. The real income of elderly singles, mostly women, will be cut by almost $1,300 and, in addition, elderly Canadians will have to pay tax increases for gasoline, health care products, certain foods and other goods. That will amount to hundreds of dollars a year in lost income.

But it is even worse than that. While this government is capping the de-indexing of old age pensions at 3 per cent, its budget, is admittedly pushing up inflation so that even a rate of 4 per cent means that the elderly will receive a cost of living increase of only 1 per cent. The same budget that hands out billions to the multinationals will actually increase poverty. The Canadian Council on Social Developments says that the federal government's plans to partly de-index old age security pensions would see as many as 200,000 more elderly Canadians living in poverty by 1990. I point out to honourable senators a Machiavellian ingenuity here. It will increase the number of persons below the poverty line. You will remember that the Minister of Finance complained that there are not enough rich people in Canada, so he has to tax the poor. With this cold-hearted logic, having decided that his tax base is the poor, he proceeds to increase his tax base by increasing poverty. As a result of this budget, more than three-quarters of a million Canadians will fall below the poverty line by 1990. More than 200,000 elderly Canadians living on fixed incomes will be forced into poverty because of the Mulroney government budget. It will cast more Canadians into poverty than did the global economic recession in 1981 and 1982. At the very least, his budget will round up more Canadians into the poverty-line corral for future taxation and punishment.

● (1620)

That is where the government and the Prime Minister stand in the very first important decisive action this government has even taken. This government has done nothing up to the time it presented its budget and suddenly we find the Prime Minister pitter-pattering, as Jeffrey Simpson says, scuttling around in the bottom of the box he has fallen into; a box with high, slippery sides; scurrying around, trying to find a way out. What can he do?

With the style that he and Ronald Reagan have made famous, he can act like none of this is his fault. He prefers, as does President Reagan, to take credit for anything that is good, but anything that is bad is somebody else's fault. Now that he is in trouble, we can expect him to indicate that it wasn't his fault. Maybe he will point over to Mr. Wilson and say, "There is the man with his hand in the cookie jar. I did not know what was going on; I did not understand that this was going to be in the budget. I would not do this to the old people. I left this budget to others. I was playing a gig in Quebec City with my new vaudeville partner, President Reagan." Honourable senators, it is rather reminiscent of the old vaudeville act of Mr. Gallagher and Mr. Shea. Perhaps some of you are not old enough to remember that team.

Senator Murray: I remember.

Senator Frith: Then you will grasp the metaphor, I am sure. Even Amos 'n Andy were around at that time, too. In any event, Mr. Mulroney was doing his song and dance there in Quebec City, and perhaps he will say, "I did not really know what was in the budget. The minute my back was turned, these people go around betraying the elderly. I will just have to blame Michael Wilson." After all, the Prime Minister seems to get away with dumping on his other colleagues. He dumps on the Minister of State for External Affairs—and the minister takes it; he appoints distinguished Canadians to the Senate, and then calls senators a bunch of hacks—and they take it. The question is: Will he do it with Mr. Wilson? He may get away with it when he dumps on these others, and this, I admit, is gratuitous, but I do not think he will get away with it with Michael Wilson. I play squash with Michael Wilson and he is a pretty tough cookie. I think if the Prime Minister tries to dump on Mike Wilson and leave him standing there, out front, with his hand in the cookie jar, Mike Wilson will tell the Prime Minister where to go.

In any event, no matter how hard he tries, he will still be down there, because the elderly know that he is still trapped in that box that he has fallen into and, although he might try to say that none of what he is in got on him, the elderly will see through that, as will all Canadians, because they will see that some of it did get on him; in fact, a lot got on him. So there he is, in the first serious box he has been in, behaving in this way, as we can expect.

Now, the ultimate irony. Who comes to his rescue but the Senate. The Senate of Canada, the very body he sneers at and reviles; we senators, with this motion, reach down to pull him out of his box. With "love thine enemy" Christian charity, the Senate says to the Prime Minister: "Stop being a mouse, scurrying around in the bottom of that box, trying to find a way out. Stand up like a man and, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from elimination of full indexation of pension benefits, rescind this particular provision of the budget immediately."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is something about the opening picture sketched in the speech of my honourable friend that caught my attention. He spoke of that dear little old lady about my age, I think, if he said 67.

Senator Frith: Sixty-nine.

Senator Roblin: Sixty-nine?

Senator Frith: It was a man, though.

Senator Roblin: Well then, a dear little old man of 69.

Senator Frith: I did not say that he was dear, or little, actually; just old—and not that old—Canadian and poor, that's all.

Senator Roblin: I think probably when I finish with my speech, you will find that there is some relevance in my remarks, so I would be obliged if you would wait for the development of my argument before you start your usual tirade—

Senator Frith: No, you were quoting me. I just wanted you to quote me correctly.

Senator Roblin: —because I have a responsibility to that elderly citizen, male or female, who appeared on television and that is to say to them, honestly and frankly, that the policy we are debating today is a policy which the Progressive Conservative Government of Canada, in whose cabinet I sit, believes to be one which, on the whole, is a policy and a budget which is advantageous for the people of this country. While I intend to deal as best I can with the allegations that have been put forth as to unfair treatment of elderly citizens and seniors, I think it would be quite wrong for me to limit my remarks to the context of that particular problem, because it can only be considered when we look at our nation as a whole; it can only be considered in fairness and in wisdom if we relate it to the economic problems of the country.

Senator Hastings: Deal with the problem.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will be patient and quiet, he will find that I will do my best not only to deal with the point that has just been discussed, but all of those other queries that have been raised today and on other days, which I have postponed to this statement. My honourable friend had better get his cushion, because if he sits through to hear all of what I have to say, it may take longer than he might wish and, certainly, longer than I would wish.

Senator Hastings: I will be here; I will be right here.

Senator Roblin: I am pleased to hear it, because you are one of the people who needs to be brought into the light in connection with this particular matter.

Senator Murray: That will be difficult.

Senator Roblin: I would say that when one deals with the issue of man's humanity to man, particularly as exemplified in the activities of government, each one of us brings to that consideration the accumulation of the experience of his own lifetime, and I am no different. I have been in the midst of this issue for thirty-odd years. What I felt and what I did during that time is indelibly marked upon me, and certainly influences what I have to say in this chamber. As a matter of fact, not in any way to paint the lily with respect to my own experience, I can say that I was associated with a pioneering effort in my own province to identify the obligation of those who are strong and prosperous to help those who, mostly through no fault of their own, need and deserve the help of their fellow citizens and of their country.

● (1630)

In those days, which have long since passed—shrouded in history, thank God, in many respects—we moved, in the government in which I was responsible, to help those who could not help themselves—single mothers with children, the handicapped, in the biblical phrase, “the halt, the lame and the blind,” and, of course, the seniors. Our resources were limited. The need was great. We decided that we would not give to everyone, because if we did nobody would have very much, and those who were in need would not get enough. So we chose in those long ago times to select those who were in need, particularly the seniors in need, for doctors' care, health care, drugs, housing and the necessities of life. When I recite that list of services, honourable senators will understand how long ago it was.

Now, I have to admit 25 years later the needs principle stands in a different light. Different standards prevail. But I still ask myself: “If you give to everybody, will the needy still have enough?” However, I advance this proposition. The connection between the benefits that we give our people and the public revenues and the fiscal resources that are available are significant and important today, just as they were then. I put to honourable senators that this issue of pensions cannot be disassociated or dealt with in isolation when a government has to face the totality of its position. I much regret that in his interesting if somewhat one-sided recital a few minutes ago, Senator Frith has not sought to enlighten us on the interconnection of these matters, which clearly is apparent to the most indifferent observer. There is no tougher job in politics than to write a budget, and there is no federal budget that I know that is without wars. This one is certainly no exception. No matter how good these budgets look to the people who are the budget-makers, and no matter how fierce the pressure of fiscal difficulty, no matter how well-tailored a budget may be in the national interest, it does not take long for those who feel that their particular interests have been affected to zero in on the budget to see how it works for them personally. We are especially sensitive when we see something personally that we do not like, either for personal reasons or for political reasons, and we want to see the budget rearranged. So we are sometimes reluctant to look at the whole picture and consider the general good that the budget hopes to achieve.

So that is not the way the world works. That is not the way budget works. However, it does point to the fact that budget-makers, however good their intentions, are constrained. Today the great constraint of the budget of 1985, against which I suggest all policies, including the one under debate today, have to be related, is surely, as I hope to show, the question of the deficit, or, if I were to use a phrase, the constraint is the interest on the public debt. I want to discuss that and tell honourable senators why I think it is relevant to the discussion before us now.

If the Leader of the Opposition had been here today, as I had hoped, he and I would be on familiar ground, because in his first budget, October 28, 1980, he declared a deficit for 1980-81 of $14 billion, and he made a forecast of the deficit for 1983-84 of something under $12 billion. In fact the deficit turned out to be $32 billion. That same gentleman, on November 12, 1981, in his next budget, reported a deficit for that year of about $10 billion, but he made us cheer up, because the estimate for 1985-86 was $10 billion. But in fact, before the changes made in the November 6, 1984, Economic Statement and in this budget, the deficit would have been $38 billion. Think about that for a moment and ask yourselves how much help could have been given to old age pensioners if it were not for these sad facts.

But people say to me, particularly those of the great public who do not follow these matters as carefully as you and I do—and that is human nature—“So what? I have lived with a deficit. My goodness, you have been telling me about this deficit for the last ten years, you have pointed out to me that it is going up in a seemingly irresistible fashion, but what harm does the deficit ever do me that I should worry about it, or ask my Minister of Finance or my government to worry about it, or that it should be allowed in any way to affect the measures and the policies and the social benefits that the administration proposes to the Canadian people? What harm did it ever do me?” Well, there is a harm. Deficits have to be paid for, and everybody knows they are paid for by interest. I am not talking about repayment. Far be it from me to propose that. I am talking about the interest on the deficit.

The interest cost on the deficit is inevitable, and therefore that becomes a consequence of the deficit, and there's the rub.

[Senator Roblin.]

There's the rub, because in 1974 the interest payments of the Government of Canada were a little less than $3 billion. In 1985, the interest was $25 billion or $26 billion, up nearly 871 per cent in 11 years. But that is not the worst feature. The mere sum of money is not the worst feature. The worst feature is something quite different. The worst feature is this. In 1974 interest costs, interest payments, interest charges, took up 11 per cent of the cash tax payment made by the people of this country to their government in Ottawa. Eleven per cent. Eleven years later, in 1985, paying the interest cost and charges in this country amounted to 34 per cent of the cash take given by the people of Canada to this government in office in Ottawa. Think about that for a minute, will you? From 11 per cent to 34 per cent in 11 years.

I suggest to you, honourable senators, that if Brian Mulroney were to remain the Prime Minister of this Canada of ours as long as Pierre Trudeau did—which some think may be possible—and as long as there was no change in the fiscal policy, the debt policy and the interest policy of the Government of Canada, if the debt were not checked and brought to a halt and interest costs were not checked and brought to a halt, then the cost of paying the interest on the debt of this country would not be 34 per cent, it would be a little higher.

If you follow my line of reasoning to its logical conclusion, the interest charges will amount to 100 per cent. I say to citizens of this country and to this chamber that if we allow this to go unchecked, and if the ratio of interest payments to our tax intake continues to go up the way it is going, what then becomes of old age pensions? What then becomes of medicare? What then becomes of our transfers to the provinces? What becomes of the social policy of Canada? Obviously, it is in ruins. Other measures which none of us would like to consider or to face may very well be those that we will be compelled to take.

We have a budget now that is a budget of sacrifice, to be sure. I minimize it in no way. There is a budget of increased taxes, and I minimize it in no way. There is a budget of decreased services in some respects because of harsh necessity, and if we do not get control of our fiscal position now, then all the good things that government does may be beyond our reach.

So much for interest rates; so much for the central theme of this budget that in order to get jobs, in order to preserve our social system and in order to get our people back to productive endeavour, we have a budget of this character. I am going to deal with the question of indexing, Senator Hastings, because that interests you, because that is one of the proximate causes of our problem. It is far from the only one, but it certainly is one of the problems that we face.

What we have done in this country, and at the time it seemed good, is we decided to index the government's payments to deal with the problem of inflation. The payments to the old age pensioners that are on the table in the debating arena right now, and a lot of others, we decided to index them to meet inflation. What is the consequence of that? The consequence is that the government's expenditures automatically rise because of the indexing for inflation. Some may say, "so do the problems of the people," and I do not overlook that fact.

On the other side, indexing of the tax system means that we index it down so that the take from the tax system automatically is less than it would be if we were not indulging in this policy of indexing. As it involves simple mathematics it is easy to see expenses going up because of indexing and income tax revenues going down because of indexing. The nature of the problem is obvious to anyone who wants to look at it for a minute or two.

No matter how difficult it is for us to consider, we have to consider that if we neglect the question of indexing, which is a proximate cause of our central question of deficits and interest rates, the danger to fiscal control is obvious. I put it to you that indexing in 1985 in some respects is counterproductive. No matter how cogent you may find this argument, no matter how desirable the goals may appear to be, yet, the policy must be tempered with prudence and understanding because the welfare of too many people depends on prudence and understanding in dealing with public affairs. In the case of pensioners, in my opinion, the case for special consideration was a very strong one, indeed.

I regret that there has been, in my opinion, a failure on the part of some who ought to give leadership or, at least, who ought to tell the facts as they really are to present that picture of the old age pensioners and the partial indexing question in what I think to be its correct and proper perspective. It is true to say that the old age pension is partially de-indexed to the extent of 3 per cent for all old age security pensioners. Pensioners in need, as identified by those who get the GIS, have a full GIS indexing that remains undisturbed. No pension to anyone will be less in 1985. Every pensioner whether under GIS or not will get more, and even after April 1986 no pensioner in need will be deprived of the escalation on the GIS. To talk, as this resolution does, about an adverse effect on the standard of living of all old age pensioners that should be dealt with immediately, seems to me, to put it mildly, a little premature.

I should like to give you some figures for 1985. For the first quarter of this year every old age pensioner in the nation will get—I will leave the cents off—$273. In the second quarter of this year of 1985, every old age pensioner will get more—$276. In the third quarter of this year it will go to $279, and in the fourth quarter of 1985 it will go to $282 for every old age pensioner in the land. That stays in the second quarter of 1986, under the present plan, because that is when the partial de-indexing of old age pensions comes into effect. I want to tell you what it is for the year 1986 for which this budget has been prepared. For the entire year of 1986, because of the impact of the partial de-indexing of pensions, pensioners will get an amount of $64 less than they otherwise would. That works out to 17 cents a day.

I want you to understand clearly that I am not saying that that $64 is not important. Anyone who has ever tried to live on those reduced standards knows that it is important. I am not saying that 17 cents a day does not count, because if you are trying to eat every day 17 cents a day does count. I do not minimize that at all. What I am saying is that the real impact of this measure in 1986, which is the budgetary year in question, is the one that we should think about. These extensions—and we heard it today—for the next five years are interesting, but I would be rather surprised if those forecasts about indexing were any more accurate than the forecasts made by the Leader of the Opposition when he was telling us where the deficit is going to go. It is not accurate at all. Nobody can say what the legislative provisions will be after 1986 because those budgets have first to be brought into effect. The basic question is, should men and women who get the old age pension and the GIS suffer any shortfall from de-indexing? After all, these are the people on the GIS who are really in need. That is why the government has taken a certain precaution, which I shall come to before I am through.

I want to be clear: I support the budget. We know that we cannot let interest costs continue to eat up more of the tax money. I agree that indexing is part of the problem and certainly must be dealt with. I know that Canadians want, through this budget, to see new opportunities and more jobs, but they also want to keep the things that they think are good, and certainly this question of old age pensions has to come into that particular category. But the pensioners ought to know that their sacrifices are not going to be in vain because with these very same budgetary measures that we are criticizing so vehemently this afternoon we should take into account the fact that because of some of these changes the government has been able to extend its social services not necessarily to the same people but to the needy who comprise a large section of our population. We have been able to extend the eligibility for spouse's allowance to cover another 85,000 people, mostly single women and women with children. They will receive hundreds of millions of dollars in 1986 on that account. Some 180,000 handicapped men and women will receive a worthwhile consideration in their income tax statements: Over $2,500 is the figure. That will involve considerable cost to the public purse. We are changing the pension rules—and I will admit this is not within the government body—on private pensions to make sure that women, spouses, get fairer treatment in this respect. We are freezing the unemployment insurance contributions, which everybody knows are just a direct tax on the workers of this country. If we keep them down, we will be doing a good thing.

● (1650)

There are measures in this budget which extend the social services net to almost a quarter of a million people who did not have it before. I think there are a good many among the old age pensioners who would think that a good thing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I see no reason to be ashamed of that. Then, of course, we have increased the incentive for people to provide their own pensions, which is a good thing.

But if anyone thinks we do not have a problem with seniors, they had better think again, because we have. Let us try to analyze that problem to see how we can come to grips with it. I was interested to see some figures produced concerning the economic status of seniors. While one has to take polls and research figures with a grain of salt, one can, I think, maintain that they show general directions.

With respect to those over 65 in the country, in this particular survey, 84 per cent said they were satisfied with their personal economic circumstances. For all I know, they may have said that before they heard from Mr. Wilson. Although this report was published on June 6, I do not know when the poll was taken. It indicates that a good many old age pensioners are making do. I am not saying they are going to Florida in the wintertime, but I am saying that like a good many Canadians they are making do.

Forty per cent of them were reported as having incomes of over $25,000. Not a large sum, but, nevertheless, a good many people manage on it well. I also report to you that 35 per cent made less than $15,000. Those are the people who attract my particular interest and concern. I also report to you that, according to the poverty line used here, about 57 per cent were below the poverty line. We must always remember that, in calculating poverty lines, something we do not always do is consider the value of medicare and social services which apply to everyone.

Honourable senators, that is not really what I want to draw attention to; I want to draw to your attention the fact that, although we are legislating for 1986, we cannot overlook the future. There is a time bomb in connection with senior citizens which only the future will reveal. In 1981, 10 per cent of our population was over 65, but, according to present trends, in a short time, by the year 2000, 25 per cent will be over the age of 65; and a little while after that, by the year 2031, about one person in three will be over the age of 65. This means that two people will be working, we hope, to support or to provide the economic activity to support one senior.

That has to be a serious consideration. Anyone who looks at the situation with respect to pensioners, based on today's situation only, is in for a rude awakening. I am not quite sure that I am young enough—Senator Croll is—to have to deal with this problem 10 years down the road, but someone will have to. We have to start thinking about it now.

Under the GIS, the singles, with old age security and the GIS together, receive a grand total of $7,200 a year. Not a large sum. They continue to receive the GIS until they reach $11,250 when they are cut out entirely.

As far as married people are concerned, they get the GIS and the old age security which adds up to $12,000. You still have to scrape pretty hard to make that go far enough. The GIS cuts out for married people at $17,000 a year.

Of the old age pensioners, one-quarter receive the full GIS and 50 per cent receive partial GIS payments. It would be heartless to deny the tragedy of poverty. It would be heartless to ignore the elders, particularly the single elders, who face the worst conditions. We need to try to find a better understanding of the problem to understand the future that appears to be menacing us in a relatively few years from now and to know what our policy best can be.

I am satisfied that many seniors—although, when I read the papers, I realize you cannot get many politicians to agree to this; only those who support the government, and they do not say it very loudly—who are not at the poverty level and who are cut out of this 3 per cent limit are glad to think that they are helping to make things better for younger Canadians. I think that is true.

Deficit-reduction, which I have been talking about, is not an end in itself; it is not enough in itself. It is good only if it leads to something better. That something better is the prime mover—the recovery of our economy to provide the means to do the things we want to do.

If we want to see better social services, and we all do, that will only become possible if our economy is made productive. It will only become possible if our debt structure and our interest payments are lower.

We have tried the way of deficits. If deficits could cure unemployment, we, in this country, would all be working, but, instead of curing unemployment, all we do is increase the amount we owe, and employment gets a pretty short shrift.

I come back to the point that the theme of the budget is to get the economy moving again. Can it be done? Will it be done? I confess, so far as I am concerned, that it is an act of faith. I say that the old methods have not worked; that is clear, so we have to try something new.

I have here in my hand a list of figures which show some brightening on the economic scene. We were told last November by the doom-sayers that what the Minister of Finance did then would cost hundreds of thousands of jobs, and, of course, it did not. Some 271,000 jobs have appeared since then.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Oh, oh.

Senator Roblin: We have seen 159,000 jobs appear in April and May, the best two consecutive months in 12 years. We have seen inflation down for this last little while. We have seen the estimates of corporate investment up—although I'm from Missouri and I will believe that when I see it. We have seen the OECD predict growth for Canada next year which is above average for that organization. We see an unemployment rate that is 10.5 per cent in May, down 1.1 per cent from September of last year.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: We have seen youth unemployment down two points to 16.2 per cent. We have seen it down by 1.3 per cent in April and May alone. We have seen higher employment for adult men and women. We have seen interest rates falling—that is probably due to the federal whatever-its-name-is. We have seen personal disposable incomes rising.

● (1700)

I would not maintain that this cycle of encouraging economic factors represents an irreversible trend. I would not maintain—although some would like me to do so—that it is solely by virtue of the present administration that these things happened, because I take a wider view of the world than that. But I do say this, that, without a sound fiscal policy that the enterprise system recognizes as being positive to it, in terms of jobs and profit, I am sure that things will not happen the way they should. If this government can project an image to the people of this country that things can be better, that we are putting into place things that will make them better, then I think that we are doing the job we are here to do. We do not have to take all the credit for what happens—that is not what we are here for. We are here to set the lead. We are here to open the door. Other people have to walk through that door to provide the things that we know this country can provide to its citizens.

I want to come back specifically to the resolution we are being asked to support.

Senator Hastings: The promise.

Senator Roblin: I must congratulate my honourable friend; he has been very patient. He has been sitting here without a murmur. He has encouraged me; he has done everything he could for me, and I thank him. But I still say this, we have been looking at this budget for 1986. When we examine the problems in drafting it, when we see the effect of the partial de-indexation of the OAS on the needy at $64 for 1986, then we understand the magnitude of the problem we are discussing. When we see encouraging signs in the economy, we know there is a possibility that, when the next budget comes around, something can be done about it. That is the promise contained in the present budget—it was carefully spelled out. With respect to the partial de-indexing of old age pensions, it states: "... review the adequacy of payments in the light of future circumstances and will increase them as resources permit."

Senator Hastings: That was not the promise.

Senator Roblin: That may not be your promise, but I suggest that this debate, if it took place at a later date, might have some substance. It has none today. There is no adverse effect at the present time on pensioners in Canada. Every last one of them is going to get a higher pension from now until March of next year. Does that constitute the basis for a resolution of this kind which asks the government to withdraw from a policy, even when that very government has said that it will re-examine and consider the problem as circumstances develop?

Senator Frith: As they always used to say, "I'll get back to you on that."

Senator Roblin: Well, you'll be around, and if we don't get back to it, you will be heard from. I will be waiting to hear from you.

Senator Frith: That was not the promise.

Senator Roblin: I am almost through, honourable senators will be pleased to hear.

Some Hon. Senators: No! More, more!

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, there is one man here who told us what to do. He sits right across the chamber from me. His name is David Croll. He spoke the other day on the prospects of a new government in the province of Ontario. He was outlining his view as to how it should approach the task it faces. In his usual succinct, down-to-earth, and, may I say, inspired fashion, he said these words:

Show compassion. Attend to the needy before you get down to business. And then it should be a cake-walk.

That was the advice he gave to the Government of Ontario. I am going to take those words of his as advice to me and to the government which I support.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would accept just one question?

Senator Roblin: I would be delighted to answer just one question, if I could believe that it was only one.

Senator MacEachen: I will confine myself to one question; that is a promise. Earlier in the day, our colleague, Senator Sinclair, asked whether there were fixed points in the review period at which the monitoring would become decision. I notice that the Leader of the Government used the expression "when the next budget rolls around." Are we to take it from that that there would not be any change in the current policy of the government before the next budget?

Senator Roblin: If I left that impression, I am glad to correct it. This business of watching the impact of the policy is one which, contrary to what I intimated in the house the other day, is not limited in time nor does it start at a particular period of time. Obviously, pensions are not changed for 12 months, so there is that leeway. Circumstances, however, will certainly change before then—and I am thinking particularly of the economy. While it is not possible to give any benchmark, because those things are not predictable, these are factors that will be considered in the government's monitoring of the impact of the policy.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Would the honourable senator permit another question?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Hastings: I have accepted his advice and his counsel, as he knows I normally do, and have listened very carefully to the words he had to say to us this afternoon. He said two or three times that he would deal with the promise. All I can really get from his speech is that it might just as well have been made in 1935 as 1985.

Senator Murray: That is because your mind is back there.

Senator Hastings: There was no real substance there for the 2.5 million Canadians who are concerned, today, about the future of their cheques. Senator Roblin mentioned that we cannot overlook the future. I have to ask this question: Does this government not understand that for the old age pensioner the future is now? Does the government not comprehend that old age pensioners cannot accept a promise of something in the sweet bye and bye? Honourable senators, we are going to get there soon enough. To the old age pensioner, the future is now—today. This idea that something may happen in the future is simply repugnant to the old age pensioner. All he can now expect is to be monitored. That puts the old age pensioners pretty fairly in the same category as the Canadian Petroleum Association which will be monitored, too, according to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, except that the old age pensioners were not treated in quite the same way in the budget as the multinationals were treated.

My question is this: Is the government going to honour the promise made by the Prime Minister in Sherbrooke July 26 when he said that a Conservative government would fully index old age pensions? Yes or no?

Senator Roblin: There is not going to be any yes or no answer to that question.

Senator Frith: Oh, no!

Senator Roblin: The policy of the government was stated in the budget, and that is the point on which I am going to take my stand. My honourable friend can go on about the oil industry all he likes, but he knows perfectly well that that is part of the job-making process that is going on now. I know that he is an honest enough man to admit that he is going to find more jobs in his own province of Alberta now than he would have found before. Ultimately, that is going to act as a benefit to all.

When our budgetary situation enables us to give a positive answer to this question—as I have some hope that it might—it will be given. But I wonder just how often he has told the old age pensioners, whose petitions he has so faithfully presented in this house, that their pensions would be going up in the second quarter of this year, that their pensions would be going up in the third quarter of this year, that their pensions would be going up in the fourth quarter of this year, that their pensions would not be affected by this measure until the second quarter of 1986, and at that time, the cost for that year would be $64.

• (1710)

That is a lot of money, particularly for those people; but I think that had he told them the facts as to what they face, they would be a little more patient than he is in allowing the government to review the matter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I don't—

An Hon. Senator: You are only allowed one question.

Senator Hastings: I don't have to tell them the facts. They are well aware of the facts, and they are well aware of what awaits them in the future.

You mentioned that 85 per cent were satisfied with their present economic state. That was on June 6. That is when they had a little bit of faith in your government. That is when they understood that you would keep your promises. But they now know—

An Hon. Senator: Ask your question.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Hastings: They now know that you will not be keeping your promises. You have broken this promise to the old age pensioners.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Hastings: You mentioned the fact that the multinationals came down here with jobs, jobs, jobs. But we know it was profits, profits, profits that they want—and that is what they got from you. My question is: Will you—yes or no—honour that promise your leader made to the old age pensioners in Sherbrooke on July 26, 1984?

An Hon. Senator: What have you got against profits?

Senator Roblin: I am just wondering whether my honourable friend thinks that there is any relationship between jobs and profits.

Senator Frith: There is the answer.

Senator Roblin: Apparently not. He doesn't really think there is.

Senator Frith: That is not the question he asked.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do not know whether that is the prevailing sentiment in his own province, but I rather doubt it. Not that profits should be the be-all and the end-all of any government's activity. Far from it. But if we want to encourage the private sector, the sector that is the real job creator in this country, we must recognize the role of profits.

As for his question, I have answered it to the best of my ability. I will advance not an inch beyond that.

An Hon. Senator: Still no answer.

Senator Hastings: Let me answer your question.

An Hon. Senator: You have asked your question.

Senator Hastings: You asked me whether there was any relationship between jobs and profits. If there is a relationship, why did the multinationals, which piled up record profits in 1984, need more profits to create jobs?

Senator Roblin: Well, I would like to see the report of the committee which my honourable friend chairs on the National Energy Program first. Once I see that, I think I will be prepared to debate this business of profits with him.

An Hon. Senator: Answer the question.

Senator Frith: That is not the question.

Senator Roblin: You can ask the question. It is my choice whether to answer it or not.

Senator Frith: So, you are admitting that you have not answered the question.

Senator Roblin: I answered as best I can.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would deal with a question.

Senator Roblin: I will do my best with it.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you participate in the debate?

Senator Frith: He can do both.

Senator Stewart: Well, Senator Flynn is trying to bedevil the house again today.

The Leader of the Government puts a good deal of emphasis upon the monitoring of the effect of this partial de-indexation. Would he tell us what specific data will be taken into consideration in this monitoring.

What are the factors that might change the decision of the government? Is it an increase in inflation, the interest rate? What are the various factors that would bear upon a decision to change the present policy of the government after a monitoring date or point had been passed?

Senator Roblin: I am not going to pretend to answer my friend's question with any great degree of precision. He understands as well as I do the difficulty in doing so in these circumstances. But I can say to him that the first thing that has to be considered is a careful review of what the effect of this is on old age pensioners.

It might be all very well, as I have said in my remarks today, to say that it is only 17 cents a day in 1986, but I do not overlook the fact that it might be an awful lot different the following year, and the year after that, and the year after that. And the effect of those changes must certainly be part of the monitoring process.

The other thing that has to be part of the monitoring process is the state of the economy and the capacity of the public treasury to do better in terms of the social welfare policies.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

POSTPONEMENT OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a meeting of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee was scheduled for today when the Senate adjourns. Senator Charbonneau is not able to be here, which would mean that I would be chairing that meeting. I have consulted with Senator Doody on the matter and have decided that, given the time, that meeting should be postponed until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. I do not yet have the room number. We will see that honourable senators are notified as to the location of that meeting later this evening or first thing tomorrow morning.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 20, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting a matter I have raised two or three times, that being whether or not the government is going to announce a policy for the sugar-beet growers of Canada.

My reason, of course, is that there are now only two or three sitting days left before the summer adjournment in which the Leader of the Government can make such an announcement in this chamber. As well, the sugar-beet growers' representatives are back in Ottawa pleading for an answer to the question they have raised.

One part of the question dealt with whether or not the sugar factories are going to be in existence to deal with future crops. If the factories do not answer the question put to them by the Leader of the Government, I suppose we have to accept that. But the other part of the question related to whether or not the government is going to take any action, as it has been implored to do for the last six months or so, respecting a deficiency payment for the 1984 crop, in respect of which, in total, the returns fell way below the cost of production.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall have to take my honourable friend's question as notice.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Government had notice on May 28, and I gave him notice again on June 11. It is now June 20. Can he give us at least some indication of when we will get an answer?

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: I stand corrected. My honourable friend is right. He has raised the question on several occasions before. I am doing my best to get an answer for him, but I have not been successful in getting one so far. I think part of our problem is that it involves not only this level of government but also, to an extent, other levels of government, when it comes to formulating a policy for the sugar-beet industry in the near future. That does not alter the fact that I cannot give my honourable friend an answer right now. I have not forgotten it, and I am pursuing it as expeditiously as I can.

Senator Olson: I wonder if the Leader of the Government could give us some indication. What seems to be happening is that, while these representations are being made a number of other products are getting the same kind of treatment—they are all under the same management—whether it is pork, beef, sugar-beet, wheat, corn or whatever. The returns from these crops are going down all the time. What we see, of course, is a withdrawal of, I think it is $42 million from the budget of the Department of Agriculture in an announcement made by the Minister of Finance on November 8. When the budget came out on May 23 of this year he announced a further reduction in that minister's budget of something like $50 million. Is this the kind of reply that the agricultural community can continue to expect? In other words, is that the policy of this government, or are they going to be helpful when there are certain commodity groups who are having a rough period?

Senator Roblin: We are going to do our best to be as helpful as we can within the limits of the means at our disposal. I remind my honourable friend of what he already knows in connection with beef imports from the European Community. There were 50 million pounds last year; we have been able to negotiate that down to less than half the amount. Even though that might not appear to some to be a satisfactory solution, it is an improvement over what we had last year. We are going to take each one of these problems on its merits and do our best with it.

PREPARATION—USE OF CONSULTANT

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he inform this chamber whether the Honourable Jacques Parizeau was a consultant either to the Department of Finance or to the government prior to the last budget?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have no information on that point, honourable senators.

Senator Sinclair: The reason I ask the question is because—

Senator Flynn: We all know why you asked the question.

Senator Sinclair: It is because of the story in La Presse of June 20. This is the second reference that has been made to the Honourable Jacques Parizeau. Honourable senators will recall this gentleman as the one who did irreparable harm to Quebec, Montreal and the people of Quebec, and it strikes me as somewhat amazing that he is described by the Prime Minister of this country as, if my translation is right, "the most distinguished of our finance ministers." I just wonder if that reaching out by our Prime Minister in support of the budget is a matter of government policy.

Senator Roblin: With respect to the gentleman in question, I am in no position to say from my own knowledge whether he is the most distinguished finance minister in Canada. That is a matter of opinion. I can say that when he appeared in this house to discuss Bill S-31, which is before the Senate, with respect to a certain organization with which my honourable friend is well acquainted, he made an indelible impression on the committee with his testimony, so I have to pay tribute to Mr. Parizeau as an able man. That does not mean I subscribe to all his opinions.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am very happy that my friend has raised that point on Bill S-31. At some time I would love to debate that question with him. I think I know as much about it as he does. Maybe a little bit more.

Senator Flynn: You know enough about six-and-five, too.

Senator Sinclair: I remember what Senator Flynn had to say on that.

Senator Flynn: Would you share your knowledge about six-and-five?

Senator Sinclair: Let us stick with the knowledge of Jacques Parizeau respecting de-indexation. Is he the person the honourable Leader of the Opposition [sic] wants to use as the epitome of knowledge of de-indexation? Is that the man he would like to support? That is the question.

Senator Roblin: I think I am Leader of the Government in the Senate, up to the present time at any rate, so I will amend the description.

I do not think I ever claimed to know any more about Bill S-31 than my honourable friend. I merely quoted the impression which I think was widespread among honourable senators that, when Mr. Parizeau appeared here and made his comments on that particular bill, he struck one as being a knowledgeable man and so impressive, indeed, that the bill was abandoned.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I find it very difficult to see any connection between Bill S-31 and the question of fairness to elderly citizens. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate will assist us. Just because a man is eloquent about Manitoba does not necessarily make him eloquent about other areas.

Senator Roblin: I think, if my honourable friend will do me the kindness of reading my speech of yesterday, he will be familiar with my views on the matter.

Senator Flynn: That is much too subtle for him.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I still do not seem to be able to get an answer to the question as to how the Leader of the Government in the Senate views the attitudes of the Honourable Jacques Parizeau in regard to de-indexation.

Senator Roblin: I think Mr. Parizeau is entitled to his opinions on that subject, and they are his alone: They certainly do not have to be part of mine.

APPROPRIATIONS

URGENCY OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-54

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government, or his deputy, a question concerning the business of the Senate. On Tuesday last, Senator Doody told us that there was great urgency for the enactment of the appropriation bill. He said:

If we do not get the appropriation bill through before the end of this week, then they—

—that is, the financial officials—

—will have to go to extreme lengths to get funding for various matters of concern for the Government of Canada—

Yesterday he told us that he was not distorting or exaggerating in any way the sense of urgency that had been communicated to him.

Since the motion for third reading of Bill C-54 is the second Order of the Day, it would be helpful if we could be told whether he has any explanation for the sense of urgency that was communicated to him.

Senator Flynn: It will come in due course.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Certainly, if the honourable gentleman preferred to hear the explanation I have at this point in Question Period, I would be most happy to oblige.

Senator Stewart: It relates to the timing of the business of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Would it not be appropriate to wait until third reading of the bill?

Senator Doody: If the house so prefers. I am completely at the disposal of my colleagues. If they want the information now, I will provide it, or if they want to wait until third reading, I will leave it until then.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If you have no objection, we would like to hear it now.

Senator Doody: Obviously, I am in a quandary.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, this matter was raised by the deputy leader with regard to the business of the Senate. He did not wait to deal with this matter when he dealt with the substance of the bill.

Senator Flynn: He dealt with it at the second reading stage.

Senator Stewart: I am raising it now under the same rubric. I think it would be useful to honourable senators if they knew the answer to the question which was raised initially under this rubric by the deputy leader.

Senator McElman: Will the real leader stand up? Senator Flynn is the one who would like to be.

Senator Flynn: Don't worry about that.

● (1420)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I do not want to offend the Chair in any way, but I would like to honour the request of Senator Stewart, if I may. If they want the reply now, I can give it.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Senator Doody: This is not a matter of such crushing national importance that 20 or 30 minutes one way or the other is going to upset the world. If somebody asks me a question in this chamber and I am in a position to answer it, no matter how embarrassing the answer might be, I still feel that I should try to oblige. It is what is called the tone of new civility, or something like that to quote some master of—perhaps I should not have said that.

Senator Stewart: An old friend!

Senator Doody: I had a rather long but less than satisfying discussion with Treasury Board this morning who informed me that the main urgency, the matter with which they were most concerned at this time, is the cash problem in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. There are other votes for other departments which are also crying for money, which is not unusual at this time of the year, but the most pressing demand at this point related to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The supplementary estimates (A) contain a vote 20a called the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act. This program has been out of funds, the invoices have been piling up, and I suspect the department has been getting a lot of pressure from the waiting public who are looking for the money that they deserve from government for having completed the program. The original estimate in the main estimates was, I think, some $40 million and now this $55 million in supplementary estimates (A) will make a total of $95 million. This program is being phased out by Bill C-24, and I think this bill had pre-study already in Senator Hastings' committee. This phasing out has caused the final rush and the consequent pressure on the department.

The use of the word "warrant" was indeed unwarranted and I have warranted not to use it again without serious consideration. I should have caught it when the word was used in my conversation with the department earlier. I should have known better because I have had more experience than that, so all I can do is apologize. I should also like to say that I will not use the word "extreme" again with or without histrionic inflections. I shall try to be as undramatic as I possibly can in describing the condition of the public purse.

Honourable Senator Stewart is quite right when he says the rush is for the supplementary estimates (A) and not for the main estimates. If two appropriation bills had been tabled, then the pressure would have been on for the supplementary estimates, but this is not the way it has been done. I am told that when early supplementaries have been tabled in May, they have been presented to Parliament as one appropriation bill. I was tempted to say that they have always been but I am learning as I go along, so I am not going to box myself into that corner any more. I can see Senator Stewart searching for a precedent and saying, "No, in 1927 there was a set of supplementaries brought in." I am sorry that I did not have this information yesterday because I would have been more than happy to oblige at that time. I hope that this clears up the matter to the satisfaction of Senator Stewart. I promise to be more precise in my language in the future.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think that that was a very helpful answer and I am sure it will expedite our business.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NORTHERN WATERS—SOVEREIGNTY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it is in regard to the very important question of Canada's sovereignty over its northern waters. I am sure my honourable friend is aware that there is a current proposal by the United States government to have a United States Coast Guard icebreaker proceed through the Northwest Passage this summer. In view of the fact that Canada has been claiming, and in my view very properly so, and, indeed, establishing for a number of years in a very clear fashion that those are Canadian waters, in light of that serious question of sovereignty plus the added question of the possible ecological damage, and considering that Canada has been in the forefront in assuring that whatever happened in the Arctic there was to be no ecological harm, could the leader indicate to us what action the government proposes to take in this regard? Will it be prepared to take this matter before the International Court or what exactly does the government propose to do?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I had better deal with the specific instance of the question and tell my honourable friend that we are aware that this icebreaker will be traversing the Northwest Passage during the summer and that we are in communication with the Government of the United States about it. We have told that government that we must be satisfied that the specifications and the route plans of the voyage meet our requirements for environmentally safe Arctic passage. We are negotiating with them to that effect. I am told that this particular passage is not to undermine our legal position respecting our claims that the Northwest Passage is, indeed, part of this country, as is the whole Arctic archipelago, in our view.

I can also say without breaching the rules of confidence that this whole subject is a matter of concern to the administration and steps are being considered as to how it should best be tackled. I do not think that we would like to take it to the World Court in the first instance, that there should be other methods by which we can approach the problem, and they are being given consideration at the present time.

JUNE 24 CELEBRATIONS

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY—ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF GIOVANNI CABOTO

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it is one that is non-controversial. I want to preface my question by saying that I hope I am not upstaging the leader when I ask him if it is his intention to express later on today the best wishes of the Senate to our confrères from Quebec who will celebrate Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day on June 24, a very important holiday to that province.

Also, I would like to ask him if he is aware of whether or not the Canadian government is preparing celebrations in connection with June 24, which is the day on which Giovanni Caboto landed—

Senator Doody: Who?

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa:—either in Cape Breton or Cape Bonavista, Newfoundland in 1497. I am not saying that Giovanni Caboto was the first person to set foot in North America, but he is the first person who set out to make new discoveries. Of course, he returned to tell the people what he had found. As Senator Olson has said on previous occasions, the Vikings were here long before him. I have learned that committees have been formed in Italy and in the United States to prepare for the celebration in 1992 of the five-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of North America and to honour Cristofolo Colombo.

An Hon. Senator: Cristofolo who?

Senator Bosa: I am wondering whether the Canadian government is preparing similar celebrations to honour Giovanni Caboto on the occasion of the five-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Canada.

Senator Guay: Was he your grandfather?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for bringing to the notice of the Senate the fact that June 24 is the national day of the Province of Quebec with Saint Jean Baptiste as the patron saint, and I endorse his words of goodwill on that occasion.

The honourable senator interests me much with his references to, I must say John Cabot because, although I can claim an Italian ancestor, I cannot claim the accent my honourable friend has. I recall that King Henry VII was the monarch who sent him out on his expedition and who, in one way or another, welcomed him when he came back and who gave him 10 pounds.

Senator Doody: Gave him 10 pounds! Some people in Newfoundland say he should have got 10 years!

Senator Bosa: It was not indexed.

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that I do not think he is upstaging me, but I can tell him that somebody right here is, because he knows more about John Cabot—

Senator Doody: Jack Cabot.

Senator Roblin:—than I am likely to know. I appreciate my honourable friend's intervention.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have another question on another subject for the Leader of the Government. It is one that I had asked questions about earlier this session, and that is the problem of a sugar policy for Canada. I want to thank the government for acting on my request that was made at that time and for agreeing to a temporary agreement in conjunction with the provinces which has permitted the sugar-beet industry in the west and in Quebec to continue. However, there remain two problems. One is the longer term problem of a Canadian sugar policy, but I understand that the government is moving on it, so I am not asking for an immediate reply, although I would hope that by September we will have a statement from the government.

There is an immediate problem, and that is the stabilization payment for the year 1983. From what I understand, this payment is normally settled in the fall of the year with the payment to come in the following spring. Surely, by this time there should have been a decision as to the payment for 1983. At the moment there does not appear to be a decision by the government. Would the Leader of the Government indicate when this decision might be made, and can we expect a reply before the house rises next week?

● (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take it as being correct when my honourable friend says that no decision has been made for the year 1983, because I have no personal knowledge of that fact.

If that is so, it seems that someone may have been somewhat dilatory. I will do my best to find out what happened to the matter.

Senator Molgat: I thank the Leader of the Government. Could we hope to have an answer, one way or the other, next week, before we rise?

Senator Roblin: I always do my best for my honourable friends.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, since we are now dealing with delayed answers to questions, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether I can expect an answer before the end of the present session to written Question No. 7, in my name, which I presented on February 12 of this year. The question concerns a visit to Cairo by the Honourable Marcel Masse, Minister of Communications, in connection with a conference of the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation. Several aspects of this question are of interest to me and particularly to my fellow Francophones in New Brunswick, since the Government of New Brunswick is one of the agency's participating governments.

At the conference, there was a discussion, or there was supposed to be a discussion, on the important issue of communications and exchanges among participating countries.

My question has been on the Senate order paper since February 12, and I have yet to receive any indication whether I will get an answer and when. There is a lot of activity at the present time in the field of communications and in connection with the expansion of television services in Canada. Discussions are being held by Mr. Masse with the Quebec Minister of Communications and with other parties, and I would like to know, and I think I have a right to know, what is being done in this area.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate have the kindness to enquire and let me know whether I will get an answer and when I can expect to receive it?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must tell my honourable friend that the matter to which he refers was referred to the department concerned at the time he raised the point.

I shall do my best to see whether I can get an answer for him before we rise.

INVESTMENT CANADA BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Kelly, moved the third reading of Bill C-15, respecting investment in Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1985-86

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the third reading of Bill C-54, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I say a few words with regard to Bill C-54? We were told that there was great urgency that this bill be enacted.

The bill, as we know, will give legal effect to the balance of the main estimates and to supplementary estimates (A).

We were told earlier this afternoon that the reason for the urgency arises from the fact that the provisions to provide the money requested in supplementary estimates (A) have been put in with the provisions based on the main estimates.

I am not questioning the urgency for the money in supplementary estimates (A). Senator Doody has given us a reasonable explanation of that. But the problem with which the honourable senator had to deal arose from the fact that two sets of estimates were bundled together in this bill.

Bill C-54 passed the House of Commons much earlier than the main appropriation bill normally does. Had that bill gone through the House of Commons right at the end of June, the difficulty to which Senator Doody refers would be even greater than it is now.

I suggest to the Leader of the Government and to the deputy leader that it is not advisable to try to short-circuit the process when, in fact, one appropriation may be required early and the other may be required only several weeks later. It is not appropriate to piggyback, in a sense, the money for the main estimates needed in July on a set of supplementaries for which there may be genuine urgency. I am sure that the Deputy Leader of the Government takes my point and will convey it to the appropriate officials.

As I said yesterday, the appropriate officials are often quite indifferent to the requirements of Parliament in these matters; and no doubt under one government, as under another, we have to keep insisting that Parliament is important in the constitution of this country. I believe that all honourable senators will support me in that position.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will simply say that I do, indeed, take Senator Stewart's point. It is an ongoing battle; it is not exclusively the Public Service in Ottawa that likes the convenience of short-cuts from time to time. That applies also to the provinces.

This may be an appropriate topic to raise before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when either the minister or officials from the Treasury Board appear before the committee. We could bring this matter to their attention at that time.

I certainly appreciate the comments of Senator Stewart. Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—THIRD READING

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the third reading of Bill C-41, to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to amend the Crop Insurance Act in consequence thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking at length on Bill C-41. It is a very simple bill. Why I am rising at this stage, with the question being put on the motion for the third reading of this bill, is to inquire as to the status of some questions put to the sponsor of the bill during his speech in the debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill.

● (1440)

Senator Argue made a very good speech, a speech in which he reviewed the history of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. During the course of that excellent speech, he asked a number of questions of Senator Balfour, none of which has been replied to by Senator Balfour. I am surprised. Surely there should be some response from the sponsor of the bill in the Senate to those questions.

The problem I face now is that once I sit down, I will have had my last kick at it, too. So, I have to put the whole of the matter before you before I resume my seat.

The question of vital importance to many of the producers is: In respect of those areas that were covered by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, what is this government going to do with the Crop Insurance Act?

There are no important amendments set out in this bill. It is very much a housekeeping exercise, a cleaning-up exercise with respect to the amendments to the Crop Insurance Act identified in the bill. But there are all kinds of rumour or speculation, or something like that, that this government intends to load a far larger share of the cost of crop insurance on to the producers.

I do not know whether that speculation has any validity or not. But surely the sponsor of the bill in the Senate ought to be in a position to advise us as to whether or not that is the policy or intention of this government.

The year 1984 demonstrated what a valuable substitute all-risk crop insurance is for what PFAA used to do. It was far more adequate. It covered a larger portion of western Canada, and indeed other parts of Canada. When we had a widespread crop loss from drought and other things last year, it proved to be extremely important.

I do not remember the precise figures given by Senator Argue, but it seems to me that there was something over $300 million paid out of that fund, a fund that had been established and funded by three levels: the producer, the provincial government, and the federal government, with the federal government paying 50 per cent of the premium and the provinces, in most cases, paying the administration costs of the crop insurance scheme.

If this is to be upset, with a significantly larger share being transferred on to the producers, surely we ought to know about it, if that is what the government is intending. And if it is not intending to do that—which I sincerely hope is the case—then we should have that assurance now, and there seems to be no better opportunity than when this bill is going through this chamber.

I realize that in Bill C-41 there is not a large number of amendments. Its main purpose is to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. And while it is not stated in the bill, there will be an assignment of the moneys remaining in that account for research, or some such purpose. And I am not complaining about that, either.

I do think that we should have a reply to the questions that Senator Argue raised yesterday, and particularly a reply to his question dealing with the future of, and the prospects for, the all-risk crop insurance scheme that is in place now, a scheme that has been so highly accepted by the producers involved.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I thought I made it clear in my remarks that it was generally accepted that the existing crop insurance scheme in force in this country was a highly satisfactory one and, if anything, more satisfactory than the former PFAA scheme, which we are now giving a decent burial to.

I thought Senator Olson's choice of words was quite appropriate. He said "rumour and speculation." Honourable senators, I feel no obligation to address a question based upon rumour and speculation, and certainly not at this time. When policy initiatives in the agricultural field are proposed in the future, we can then debate them.

If Senator Olson or Senator Argue, or anyone else, cares to have a special debate on agricultural policy as it now exists, we on this side would be happy to respond. But I do not feel motivated to respond to an inquiry based upon rumour and speculation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I ask a question?

Given that we are having a debate on precisely the matter that we wish to discuss—namely, the crop insurance scheme which is the substitute program for PFAA—it could not be a more appropriate time for the sponsor of the bill, the spokesman for the government, to provide answers to the questions that have been raised. I do not see why we should be required to set up a special inquiry to debate precisely what is in front of us now.

The rumours and speculations are getting to be more and more valid. The sponsor of the bill has said that he does not need to respond to rumours and speculations. But some of the facts are starting to show. There has been a $90 million cut in the Department of Agriculture since this government took office. That is probably something in excess of 10 per cent of that department's budget, or approximately that much. There are indications—and I could go into the detail of it—that it is going to be more. Is crop insurance going to be one of the victims, too?

This government talks about a user-pay philosophy. Does that mean that producers are going to be asked to pick up a larger and larger share of the cost of what is now in existence? At the moment we have an actuarially sound premium of which 50 per cent is paid by the producers and 50 per cent by the federal government.

On the basis of the user-pay philosophy of this government, is that going to be increased? Or is the federal government going to continue to honour the contractual arrangements that have already been set in place?

We worry about that a little bit. We know what happened to the promises made to the pensioners. Broken. With every week that goes by, promises are broken, and these things that I have referred to as rumour and speculation turn into facts.

That is the question. I do not think Senator Balfour can simply dismiss it. We are having too many instances where rumour and speculation are used to see if the kite will fly, with the actual announcement coming sooner or later. It has already happened with the Department of Agriculture in some respects.

My question is: Is the crop insurance scheme going to be one program to which the user-pay philosophy will be applied, with the producer's share going from 50 per cent to some higher level?

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, if my response does not satisfy Senator Olson, I am afraid that that is his problem, not mine.

Senator Olson: Oh! We have—

Hon. Jacques Flynn: On a point of order. Is the honourable senator going to speak three times on the motion for the third reading of the bill?

Senator Olson: If Senator Flynn does not want to hear any more from me, then under the rules I am obliged to sit down, and I am—

Senator Flynn: Well, do it.

Senator Olson: —and I am ready to do that.

Senator Flynn: Then, do it!

Senator Olson: It is amazing that we have bills going through on second reading—

Senator Flynn: Do it!

Senator Olson: —and the sponsor doesn't even reply to one question. That is amazing.

● (1450)

Senator Flynn: Do it, then. When you say that is the rule, follow it.

Senator Steuart: Under the rules you would have to be ordered to sit down eight times.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the bill be read the third time now?

Senator Olson: On division.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, if "On division" was heard from somebody, that's fine. As far as I am concerned, the bill before us is a good bill and should receive unanimous support from the whole house. The whole question of what is in the future is something else. I think that that was very properly alluded to, but nevertheless I hope that this bill will pass without being passed on division.

Senator Olson: It has to be noted that they do not answer the questions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that the bill be read the third time—not on division?

Senator Argue: Unanimously.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Unanimously. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

20 June 1985

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 20th day of June, 1985, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Esmond Butler

Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Senator Stewart.]

Yesterday, during a heated, but I must say, for my part, enjoyable exchange with Senator Flynn, towards the end of our fun we got ourselves tangled up in the words "coward" and "cowardly." At page 1066 I see—

Senator Doody: 1066 was a good year.

Senator Frith: It is "1066 And All That."

Senator Flynn said:

That is cowardly!

Then, after an interruption by Senator Roblin—I suppose, strictly speaking, we were interrupting him; it was the other way round—I said:

Whom are you calling a coward?

The report goes on:

SENATOR FLYNN: I said that what you said was cowardly.

SENATOR FRITH: Is it parliamentary to call a senator cowardly?

SENATOR FLYNN: I did not call you a coward; I said that what you said was cowardly.

SENATOR FRITH: That is a very cowardly answer.

SENATOR FLYNN: I don't mind.

SENATOR FRITH: You do not have the guts to stick to it.

I do not think it is all that serious, and neither does Senator Flynn. If anyone has any doubts, let me say that I have had my disagreements with Senator Flynn, but he is not cowardly and he has plenty of guts.

Senator Doody: History will be delighted with that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I share the same view of Senator Frith.

Senator Doody: At least there is some civility.

Senator MacEachen: Civility has been carried much too far!

Senator Perrault: It's almost a love-in.

SPORTS POOL AND LOTO CANADA WINDING-UP BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act respecting the winding-up of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation and Loto Canada Inc."—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not intend to spend much of the chamber's time discussing Bill C-2. The fact is that the Calgary Winter Olympics requires money. We have a commitment, which I am pleased to say I made when I was the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. It is gratifying, and I think worth pointing out, that the new government has fully accepted that commitment given by the previous government, and they are to be congratulated upon doing so.

The games in 1988 will be very costly in terms of invested dollars, but the potential return which exists for the provinces of Canada is, frankly, huge. The Summer Olympics in Los Angeles demonstrated that Olympic Games, under proper management, involving the private sector along with government and with careful allocation of all moneys paid out, can, in fact, turn a profit. No one, I think, is at this point predicting that the Calgary Olympics will show a profit. If they do show a profit, well and good. The committee there is very competent. Those of us who saw the Calgary Olympic display in this building the other evening will, I think, be enormously encouraged about the progress that has been made thus far. The fact is that all of Canada's political parties support the Calgary Olympics. It is a worthy national endeavour and the people of Calgary deserve our complete support in this ambitious and world-class project.

As I have said, the commitment that was given two or three years ago to provide $200 million in non-tax dollars to the games was made on behalf of all the Canadian people. It is a matter of fact that, directly or indirectly, the federal taxpayer will contribute much more to the Calgary Olympics, but no one should be scandalized by that fact. For example, there are certain services that will be provided by the federal government. There will be a federal presence in several ways, including a role in communications and security. However, the investment by the federal government will be matched, in very substantial measure, by the government of the province of Alberta. Revenue will be received from ABC Television in the United States. The television rights for the Calgary Winter Olympics are being sold for over $400 million, which marks a new record high for television rights for a winter games.

The winter games will confer major benefits. In the ultimate, the games will mean tourism, jobs and incomes and substantial tax revenues for all levels of government. Left behind will be a heritage of winter sports facilities that will contribute extensively to the training of Canadian athletes, whether they live in the maritimes, in the west, in the central provinces or in the north.

It may well be said, then, "If all the parties support the Calgary Olympics and there is no disagreement with respect to the $200 million federal commitment, where is the area of disagreement, if any?" Honourable senators, I intend to support the measure before us. I do not think it requires referral to a committee for further study. It is straightforward.

The government should not proclaim this, however, as yet another example of the superb co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. Yet, they talk in terms of "breaking new ground" in developing "better relations" with the provinces. We are assured by the minister that this is a magnificent deal. Well, just how splendid is this arrangement? In 1974, a Liberal federal government established a lottery, with the substantial support of all the provinces, and the political parties, to help finance the Montreal Summer Olympics. Both the Olympics and the lottery were highly successful.

Loto was a painless mechanism established to enable every Canadian to support voluntarily the great Montreal summer sports spectacle. After the federal Olympic commitment was met in 1976—and it was touched upon very briefly by Senator Phillips the other day in a recitation of certain facts—Loto Canada Inc. was established to provide funds for the development of Canadian athletes, for medical research and for cultural development. It was felt that through a national lottery there should be a national initiative and federal leadership to provide funds for three key areas of sports, medical research and culture.

● (1500)

Loto Canada was an extremely popular federal initiative which, among other achievements, through its promotional devices, helped to develop a sense of nationhood in this country and a feeling of federal co-operation with and a federal interest and concern in the regions. To be frank, honourable senators, it was too popular for the official opposition who saw it as something more than that. Again, I think this is almost a matter of fact: They saw it as a device—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Doody: Almost unique.

Senator Perrault: The allegation was that the Liberal government of the day was using Loto to publicize itself.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Perrault: The unworthy allegation was that it was a device which enabled cabinet ministers, members of the House of Commons and senators to deliver cheques to promote good regional public relations. This is hardly unheard of in political life. Understandably, this government will be doing its share of that. Indeed, already much credit has been taken, by this government through publicity channels, for projects initiated by the former government. We accept this as one of the features of a change in government.

The fact is that in just three developing years Loto Canada netted over $200 million. Its potential for good was, at that point, enormous; but what happened? Politically, as I said, it was too popular for the official opposition. It was regarded by them as some sort of political apparatus. So, they attacked Loto Canada and pledged, short-sightedly, to end it when in power. They said that Loto should not be in the hands of the national government although other national governments throughout the world use similar fund-raising plans with great success for projects in the public interest. The Tories said they would end national Loto and give it to the provinces. In one of the great disastrous negotiations of all time, the Conservative government, in 1979—

Senator Frith: A gold medal.

Senator Perrault: —in fact, abandoned the field. It was hardly a gold medal performance; it was a fool's gold medal performance.

Senator Marshall: That is a good expression.

Senator Perrault: It was a narrow and short-sighted attitude which said that the provinces could distribute these funds more efficiently than could a federal government. They did not say to the provinces that they would withdraw in exchange for a pledge that the provinces would use Loto for medical research to fight multiple sclerosis or cancer and other diseases, or for sports and cultural development. They said, "Let's make a deal."

What kind of deal was it? The Conservative government handed over a plan which realized $200 million in a three-year period and in exchange made a deal with the provincial governments for $24 million indexed to exit from lotteries and let the provinces take over. The provinces virtually licked their chops and slavered at the financial prospects, and well they should have because the revenues which have poured into their coffers since that time have been, literally, enormous.

Coveting the success of Loto Canada, the provinces had initiated their own lotteries in 1976, and, with this deal with the Conservative government of 1979, they were well on their way to acquiring revenues of record proportions. Honourable senators, I will give you those figures in a moment.

Again, unbelievably, the Tory government yielded to provincial demands. They allowed Loto Canada to be taken over. In return, they received $24 million which was indexed, that is, less than 50 per cent of the net yield for the lottery. They said that they were doing this because they wanted to inspire federal-provincial co-operation! In return, they agreed to a pittance in comparison with lottery yields of today.

When a new Liberal government was established in 1980, the Tory agreement with the provinces was not breached, but efforts were made to re-establish the federal government in the area of sports pools as distinguished from lotteries.

We had this commitment to Calgary which had to be honoured. We felt that people should support the Calgary Games voluntarily and so the commitment was given that $200 million would be contributed to Calgary from non-tax sources.

The provinces were not very happy about the Sports Pool. Legislation was passed in Parliament—I am sure honourable senators will recall this—legitimizing and adopting the pool idea and allowing the alternative of a special plan, if necessary, to meet the $200 million commitment to the Calgary Winter Games.

The provinces were furious despite the fact that they were, by then, rolling in their lottery-derived wealth.

The magnitude of the lottery treasure hunt can be measured in part by recent 12-month statistics which indicate that $1.8 billion worth of lottery tickets were sold in Canada in the last 12 months; with $700 million net going to the provinces. This is the federal government that states that the previous Liberal government was imprudent and had not left any money behind. The fact of the matter is that the official opposition helped clean out the till if, indeed, the till is short of cash. It was an imprudent measure to abandon the national lottery field and to give them all to the provinces at a time when there were human needs all over this country.

[Senator Marshall.]

Do you think the federal government would be talking in terms of de-indexing senior citizens' pensions if they had an extra $700 million to spend today? Of course not. The government has opted to give almost all of the lottery funds to the provinces who, in some cases at least, have taken these funds along with certain block funding and misdirected them in certain ways. Honourable senators, it is known to you that some provinces are paying not 50-50 but zero per cent of the financing of higher education in this country because provisions for federal funding are so imprecise that it has permitted them to do so.

Yet, the government persists in its claim that, when they took power last fall, the federal treasury was bare. Apart from the absurdity of the claim, the fact is that they and the 1979 government entered into imprudent deals like the abandonment of Loto and so deprived the federal government of revenues to which it was entitled to apply to human needs in this country. An extra $700 million today could do an enormous amount to help those in need, yes, including the athletes, medical research, culture and the rest.

The government claims that Sports Pool was a failure. I was never the minister responsible for Sports Pool. The cabinet responsibility was assigned after I left. I think some mistakes were made in its implementation, but let me tell you that the concept was a sound one. It has been very successful in some countries. In my view, it should not have been implemented without the full co-operation and agreement of the sports affected, and I said so at the time.

Senator Nurgitz: It was opposed by all the sports.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and it should not have been implemented in the form it was without the support and co-operation of the sports affected. I reiterate that there were ways to overcome that problem.

Sports Pool was, primarily, a victim of provincial hostility. Sports Pool was barred from lottery terminals and lottery centres. Most of them were administered by Conservative governments working hand-in-glove with the Official Opposition here in Ottawa. The plan was to keep the federal product out of all the terminals in Canada, and in that way the Sports Pool could be deprived of revenue and forced to close down. That was the tactic. There was no question here of giving Canadian consumers any kind of choice.

The ultimatum was delivered to countless dealers across the country: "Either you get out of Sports Pool or we are going to close you down. You won't handle any of our products again." They got out of Sports Pool.

The decision was made mostly by these provincial governments of Tory persuasion to protect their lucrative minority rights. They said to the consumer that they did not care whether they wanted Sports Pool or not; they were not going to allow it to be handled in their provinces.

What do we have now? An agreement that is not as good as the one negotiated by the previous government one year ago.

One year ago, when there was a Liberal government in office, we had a deal to have the provinces provide $100 million net—not the $85 million net which is going to be acquired from the provinces through this plan, because $15 million of surplus in the federal Loto Canada fund is going to revert to the provinces.

Last year, we negotiated $100 million with no $15 million to revert to the provinces; no amendment to the Criminal Code to exclude forever federally-sponsored lotteries and/or sports pools for good causes—well, that is some deal.

We have retreated some way from the provincial offer made to me when I was Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. At that time the leading spokesman for provincial lotteries said, “We are making a lot of money from lotteries and if you do not get into pools, we will give you the whole $200 million for the Calgary Winter Olympics.” This deal offered today by the new Minister of Sports is not the kind of deal that should send him to the victory podium in glory. If so, he should only wear a barrel.

● (1510)

Senator Sinclair: What is his name?

Senator Perrault: The proposal was that the provinces would provide the entire federal commitment if we would exclude the federal government from sports pools and lotteries.

As pleased as all of us must be to have the federal government involved in helping to fund the Calgary Olympics, I say there was a far better deal available.

Senator Murray: Could the honourable senator tell us who the provincial minister was?

Senator Perrault: An official representative of the provincial lottery organization in a personal conversation with me made that offer. He said very frankly that of course he would have to bring most of his colleagues along with him but he thought he could do so. I am just setting forth the facts.

Senator Murray: These are almost the facts.

Senator Perrault: I did not say they are almost the facts because they are the facts and verifiably so. All I can say is, the Lord help Canada if this agreement represents the shrewdest, canniest bargaining skills of members of this government.

Senator Sinclair: Who is the minister?

Senator Perrault: As I say, we are not going to impede the progress of this deal in the Senate but it represents the largest single transfer and, indeed, abandonment of revenue rights and revenue potential in the history of Canada. With not one single commitment from the provinces with respect to the vast revenue potential which we have delivered to them, no commitment to ensure that the smaller communities in this nation get the kind of support they need to develop sports skills and to host national and international sports events, no commitment to the medical research people, no deal with the proviso that there had to be some support for culture. All this profligate action in the name of federal-provincial co-operation!

We should have learned our lesson a long time ago about these so-called “good faith” transfers, including block funding that I referred to earlier. At a time when the federal government needs every cent available, when the federal per capita debt is higher than provincial debt, when human needs are all around us, this government chooses to abandon on a vast scale a popular voluntary form of taxation. Inevitably, those lost revenues must be replaced with involuntary taxation in many painful forms as the government is going to discover. It is not even a good political deal, and we are all in politics. There will be very few credits given to federal government politicians for this deal with the provinces.

I am certain that honourable senators will support—perhaps with regret and reluctance—this measure because it could have been so much better. Certain alternatives, I think, were much more attractive.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Doody, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Phillips, speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Perrault for his ringing endorsement of this measure. I took great heart from the fact that he announced earlier that he was supporting this bill, and I listened with great relish to the words of congratulations and goodwill that he expressed toward it and to its sponsors.

I have participated over a number of years in negotiations with the federal government on behalf of my province in trying to capture a share of what we felt was a legitimate tax field, namely, the lottery returns. I agree completely that the money was, by Senator Perrault's standards, misdirected. We did not build sports facilities with most of the money that we got from our share of the lottery. Every time I drive around the city of Nepean where my house is now, I look in awe, wonder admiration and jealousy at the multi-use sports facilities that are in that city. There are more stadiums and related facilities in Nepean than we have in the whole province of Newfoundland. I feel bad about that, but the money had to be spent for a TransCanada Highway, for welfare, for health care purposes and for education purposes. We hear in this place time and time again that there is not enough money spent on education by the provinces and that they are not using the money properly. If the provinces had the money, they would use it to the best possible advantage. It would be directed toward their objectives. The fact that their objectives are not necessarily the same as the federal government's objectives does not mean that they are poor managers. I am delighted to see this deal. I think it is a big help for those provinces that desperately need the revenue. I hope the day comes when they can spend excess funds on sports facilities and other such things which right now, unfortunately, are a luxury in these provinces. I am pleased to see this bill supported, and I am delighted to sponsor it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the question of leave, as we have heard from His Honour that there will be Royal Assent this afternoon, there seems to be no point in holding this over, so it might as well receive Royal Assent this afternoon.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 25, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to inform you of the work schedule we have ahead of us next week. The pre-studies that the committees have done have managed to keep us up to our workload. We anticipate receiving from the House of Commons next week five or six bills in addition to the borrowing bill, and I think that adjourning until two o'clock on Tuesday next will allow us to deal with these very effectively. I want to thank honourable senators for their co-operation to date on this work schedule. I have been given to understand, and I know it is not necessary to repeat it, that should the workload increase it may be necessary to sit some evenings. As of now, that does not appear to be necessary but, if it is, I am sure that we will all agree that that course of action should be followed.

• (1520)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder whether Senator Doody can tell us which bills he expects to come from the House of Commons.

Senator Doody: I understand that today in the other place they are working on Bill C-44, an act to amend the Western Grain Transportation Act. It is to go to committee, and we will receive it some time next week. The next bill is Bill C-26, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act. We thought that we would receive it this afternoon, but I understand that an amendment has been introduced, so it will probably not come over until early next week.

We can expect to receive Bill C-27, an act to amend certain acts in regard to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; Bill C-36, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act; Bill

C-24, an act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act; Bill C-39, the Supplementary Fiscal Equalizations Act; Bill C-32, an act to amend the Fisheries Act; and Bill C-53, an act to authorize the disposal of the Northern Transportation Company Limited and the forgiveness of its debts to Her Majesty, and so on. This bill has been referred to the Transport and Communications Committee for pre-study. There are three other bills on this list that are already before our committees—Bill C-31, an act to amend the Indian Act; and Bills C-46 and C-47 dealing with the Divorce Act. That is about it.

Senator Hays: What about Bill C-51?

Senator Doody: Bill C-51 is the borrowing authority bill. I believe it will be brought back to the House to be debated on Tuesday, although I am not sure. That bill, like the others, is in the hands of the other place. As of this moment, that is all the information I have. Of course, it is subject to acts of God and the people in the other chamber.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Doody can tell us whether it is the intention or the determination of the government to have the borrowing authority bill before the end of June, or is it possible that it can be stood until the fall or until the session resumes, whenever that may be?

Senator Doody: It is my understanding that the government would prefer to have that borrowing authority bill as soon as possible. Our National Finance Committee has pre-studied the bill, and we were given the impression by the minister that the government would like to have that bill as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

The Honourable Marcel Danis, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

THE LATE RICHARD SANKEY MALONE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to speak briefly about one of the great men in my life in the person of the late Richard Sankey Malone. Dick Malone was a great westerner and a great soldier. In journalism, which was my chosen profession, he did remarkable things, both in western Canada with the Winnipeg Free Press and later in consolidating FP Publications, which was one of the major newspaper chains in this country. He would not want a sad note. He was an adventurer, a tough man, and a man of great humour. And he was a man who took extraordinary risks, one of which involved naming me to the FP bureau in the Parliamentary Press Gallery in the early 1960s, a time when women simply were not offered such appointments. However, Dick Malone took a chance in appointing me to that bureau and in doing so opened up a truly wonderful career to me. I doubt that I would be standing in this chamber today had I not had the opportunity he offered to me.

I revere his memory, and I offer my sympathy to his family.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to join in the expression of sympathy that has been offered by Senator Fairbairn. When I became the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party in Manitoba, Dick Malone was the publisher of the Free Press, a post which he occupied for a good deal of the time that I was engaged in provincial politics. While it is perfectly true to say that we did not see eye to eye on all the issues of public concern, I nevertheless found him to be a very forthright and honest exponent of the causes which he espoused.

As Senator Fairbairn has said, his career, both in the field of journalism and in the military during the Second World War, was remarkable by any standard and reflected the greatest credit on his determination and his capacity to achieve the goals that he sought.

I join with my honourable colleague in extending words of condolence and sympathy to his family.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, it was my good fortune to have worked with every publisher at the Globe and Mail—no, I do not go back to George Brown with the Globe. I do not suppose that there was any publisher whose appointment I viewed with more apprehension than that of Richard Sankey Malone. He had a reputation of being a tyrant about the things that he wanted to do and the things he felt he could do, and how he felt he could operate his institutions—and the Globe and Mail became one of his institutions.

I found him a kindly man, a man who said: "All right! The Globe and Mail has its own traditions. You work page 6; I will work page 7." So, we did some odd things. He was a great believer in a free press; he was a very great believer in a strong military; and, by God, he believed in the Canadian West. And I cannot think of any greater tribute to express to my late colleague.

STATUTE LAW (CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS) AMENDMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-27, to amend certain acts having regard to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder whether Senator Hastings would vouch for the authenticity of all the names on these petitions.

I ask the question in view of the fact that a petition was presented in the other place a couple of days ago purporting to contain the signature of an aunt of Prime Minister Mulroney—an aunt who has been deceased these past 11 years.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I cannot vouch for the authenticity of each and every one of the 2,500 signatures. They are the result of Operation Justice in the province of Alberta and are a spontaneous response to the cad of a government they have to put up with.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-55

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-55, intituled "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

RESTRUCTURING OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—MOTION MODIFIED AND BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY DISCUSSION PAPER

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 7:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with your permission I should like to modify Order No. 7. It deals with a motion standing in my name which reads as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to study and report upon the document entitled: "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion", tabled in the Senate on 23rd April, 1985; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

The first paragraph of that motion is fine. However, it has quite properly been brought to our attention that the Internal Economy Committee is trying to maintain a grip on the spending practices of committees and is asking for budgets to be provided in advance. That is a reasonable request. In view of that, I would ask that the second paragraph be deleted from the motion.

In addition to the first paragraph of the motion, we would like the committee to study two other items: first, the final report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, CDIC; and second, the subject matter of bills, in advance of their coming before the Senate, and other matters relating to those documents.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I move:

That the motion be modified to read as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to study and report upon the following:

(i) the document entitled "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion", tabled in the Senate on 23rd April, 1985;

(ii) the document entitled: "Final Report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC)", tabled in the Senate on 18th June, 1985; and

(iii) the subject-matter of bills, in advance of their coming before the Senate, and other matters relating to these documents.

● (1430)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, does Senator Doody have leave to present the motion, as modified?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Just notice?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, it is moved:

That the motion be modified to read as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to study and report upon the following:

(i) the document entitled—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as modified?

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, on a point of clarification, the removal of the paragraph empowering the committee to engage the services of professional, clerical and technical personnel, will mean that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will have to go through the same process as every other committee has to go through in this respect, that is to say that it will have to go to the Internal Economy Committee for permission to engage such services. Is that what it means?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, that has already been done, and I have made my peace with the subcommittee since the original motion was stood.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as modified?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the motion that has been put this afternoon does not say that that paragraph is to be deleted. Are you moving that that paragraph be deleted from Order No. 7?

Senator Doody: I thought I had made that clear, although I agree that it is not in the motion, as modified.

Senator Bonnell: If it is not in the motion, the motion will not delete it. What—

Senator Doody: If you will sit down, I will stand up.

Senator Bonnell: You cannot stand and move another motion. We have a motion on the floor now. How many motions are you going to put on the floor?

Senator Argue: By unanimous consent.

Senator Bonnell: Very well, by unanimous consent.

Senator Doody: Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Doody be permitted to present the modified motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Doody. While I am in favour of giving committees more independence and allowing them to conduct inquiries on their own initiative, I have some concern with the wording of paragraph (iii), which speaks of "any bills." That is very sweeping. Surely it should mean bills that are within the purview of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

I am just a little confused by that.

Senator Murray: I do not have the wording in front of me. In reply to the question, I believe that the wording envisages only those bills that would relate either to the McDougall white paper on financial institutions or the report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. I have checked and there is ample precedent for adding to such a motion a provision that the committee pre-study any legislation arising from those papers.

Senator Godfrey: It does not say that.

Senator Murray: That was the intent.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: What is the motion to which we have now agreed?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it the wish of honourable senators that I put the motion again?

Senator Bonnell: We want the motion as modified.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion, as modified, agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AVIATION DISASTERS

LOSS OF AIR-INDIA AIRCRAFT—TOKYO AIRPORT EXPLOSION— POSSIBLE ACTS OF TERRORISM

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it would be, I think, quite inappropriate to begin Question Period without making a comment about the tragic airline disasters which have occurred since we last met. The world has been shaken by the loss of the Air-India jumbo jet and further shaken by the incident in the airport in Tokyo, which may indeed be related to the Air-India disaster. That is something we do not as yet know.

Apart from expressing our sadness and shock, I think it is the sentiment, certainly of those on this side of the house and, I am sure, of all honourable senators, to express our condolences to the bereaved and particularly to the Indian community in Canada, which has been so deeply affected by this tragedy.

Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in that context, whether the government has been able to ascertain the cause of the loss of the Air-India jet; and if so, what the findings of any investigation have been to date on this matter?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I concur entirely with the sentiment expressed by my honourable friend, which draws to our notice the magnitude of the tragedy which has struck the country over the weekend. We share with him his expression of sympathy for those involved. While it has been a shattering experience for the world, it has been a particularly shattering experience for Canada as it now appears that we are in the front lines of terrorism, a place where we never thought ourselves likely to be. The fact that bombs have been placed—or, apparently, explosives of some kind or another—have been placed on one aircraft for sure and possibly on another is something that must cause us great concern. It is only by the grace of God that the Canadian Pacific plane did not wind up in the ocean in the same way as the Air-India plane. It causes us all the greatest concern.

I do not think that air travel will ever be quite the same in Canada again. As honourable senators know, the government is putting into place, as fast as it can, whatever measures can be devised to guard the travelling public against further dangers of this kind, in the full knowledge, of course, that perfect protection is beyond our grasp.

Respecting the question raised by my honourable friend about the cause of the Air-India disaster, I am sorry that I cannot give him any information on that at the present time. The Air-India representatives, and others, Canadian and British, are examining the situation in Ireland, and elsewhere, with a view to seeing what facts can be determined that will throw light on this situation.

Up to the present time, to the best of my knowledge, there has not been a determination made as to what the probable cause of this disaster was. Rumours are afloat. People have their own ideas. But until such time as something more concrete can be developed by those who are examining the nature of this tragedy, I am afraid I can add nothing to the information that is already in the public domain.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it was reported on the weekend that some time ago the Indian authorities drew to the attention of the Department of External Affairs their perception that Canada might be a source of international terrorism. I am wondering whether it is true that such a representation was made to the Department of External Affairs, and if so, what action was taken to meet the perceived threat as alleged by the Indian authorities.

Senator Roblin: I read the same newspaper report, and I have also seen newspaper statements by others that action was taken with respect to their warning of the possibility of trouble—action that they took and that others took. But I wish to be precise about this matter, so I will inquire of my colleagues in order to provide a more satisfactory answer.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the honourable leader for that, because I think it is important to know whether the Indian authorities did make such representations and what steps we took in response thereto.

TRANSPORT

SECURITY AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have one other question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate dealing with the decision of the authorities in Canada to reduce the presence of RCMP security at Canadian airports, and particularly at Canadian international airports.

Will the government now respond to the appeal by the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association to restore RCMP security—which I understand was removed from Canadian airports for budgetary reasons?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am not altogether sure that my honourable friend has it right, though he may be right with respect to the number of RCMP personnel at Canadian airports. My information is that up to the present time searching of baggage has been considered to be the responsibility of the airlines. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were standing by in case they were required for any reason, including the discovery of questionable baggage in the system. However, up to the present time it has been the responsibility of the airlines concerned to check the baggage of people going on board their aircraft and they, as opposed to the government itself, have been hiring the people to do that job. It may be that the process will change, but I have no information on the matter at the present time.

● (1440)

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the leader raises an interesting point. That is, who really is responsible for security at Canadian airports? Is it the airline companies or is it the Government of Canada through the Department of Transport? I asked this very question this morning and I did not get a clear answer. I have right in front of me the person who can give me a clear answer and that is the Leader of the Government. Is the Department of Transport the institution responsible for airport security and is it delegated by the department to the airlines? I have been told that in this particular case the delegation went from the Department of Transport to Air-India and to Air Canada. I do not know the facts. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would undertake to provide us with the clear line of authority and what delegation, if any, took place.

Senator Roblin: I shall try to do so. I know that at the present time the operation is divided. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have authority for security of the airport as such, but the airlines have undertaken the responsibility of clearing the baggage of people who are boarding their aircraft. In order to be precise about it, I shall get a more definite statement for my friend.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a specific supplementary question with respect to this matter. It may be that the Leader of the Government intended to seek an answer anyway, but there is some confusion as to who is responsible for the fact that all the baggage was not removed from the Air-India flight in question and re-examined when, I believe, three questionable pieces of baggage were found and detained. Perhaps he could give us some more precise information as to whose responsibility it was to determine whether all the baggage should be removed and whether the flight should have taken off without re-examining the baggage, which is the normal practice in such cases?

Senator Roblin: That is a question I shall have to address to my colleague who, in turn, will have to ask the authorities of Air-India about it.

Senator Olson: And the Minister of Transport.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

TRAINING SITES

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators my question, which is along the same lines, has to do with the tragedies that occurred this past weekend. Having in mind the wonderful record in commercial aviation that Canada holds and has held, I wonder whether the government leader in the Senate could inform us as to what action the government will take with regard to terrorists being trained in another country, crossing our borders and bringing into our midst their lack of concern for human life?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I understand the point my honourable friend is making, and he has some reason to be proud of his association with the safety record of our airline industry. However, one must remember that these days terrorists are trained everywhere. They are not just trained in Louisiana—if I understand the import of the question correctly—but they are trained in Libya, Lebanon, East Germany, Bulgaria and other places where people have an interest in promoting this kind of activity. I do not know exactly how the government can undertake to deal with such a situation. It is simply outside our jurisdiction in every sense of the word.

What we have to do is our very best to identify such people and to make sure that they do not come into this country. However, there is something far more basic to the whole issue than that; namely, that the nations of the world who do not espouse terrorism as an aspect of national policy should be called upon to consider what we as a group of nations interested in dealing with the problems of terrorism can do to help one another and to ensure that this kind of outrageous behaviour does not spread further than it has done at the present time. I think that that is the challenge to the civilized world. I am not entirely sure yet what the Government of Canada will do about the problem, but if I have anything to say about it, they will take a lead in trying to organize such an approach to the problem.

Senator Sinclair: I thank the Leader of the Government for his remarks. Certainly something drastic has to be done. But when we see on our televisions and read in our newspapers references to a commando school in our neighbouring country, the United States, training terrorists, surely the government can take some action to bring such schools to an end immediately. Surely, you cannot have people saying on our television that they have trained Sikhs and indicating that they are proud of the fact that they trained them and that they have done well in such training. At least, that is what the leader of this school said on television this morning. Honourable senators can imagine what people working in the airline industry and passengers think when they hear those kinds of remarks. Surely there is something our government can do to preclude those schools from continuing.

Senator Roblin: I most emphatically agree that there is something our government can try to do. Though it is not within the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada, it is possible for the Government of Canada to make its views known. I feel confident in saying to my honourable friend that that will be done.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am sure that many of you who have gone through international airports have noted the computer printout that is available to, for example, immigration officers of the United States. My question is: Do we have a similar printout in our airports, and is there not some way in which information on known terrorists can be put into these computers? Apparently it was known that three people who were under surveillance by the FBI somehow disappeared in the past few days. Is there not something that can be done to update these computer files?

Senator Roblin: We will be flooded with newspaper stories, some of which will be wrong and some of which will be right, in connection with this tragedy, and we will have to monitor the situation as we go along. With respect to the specific question asked by my honourable friend, I shall take it as notice.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Obviously the Leader of the Government shares Senator Sinclair's views about this training school. I wonder if, for instance, the co-operation suggested by the leader between those countries that are not promoting terrorism could include in this case our telling the United States Government that we resent the fact that the terrorists who may have been responsible for the Air-India disaster were trained in the United States. I agree that it is a little more difficult to tell the same thing to Bulgaria, although we could do so. It seems to me that the government should make it clear that we do not take with equanimity the statements made today about a school which apparently is taken as a normal school and the headmaster of which, if I heard correctly, said, "Oh, I thought that they were going to go back to India and use all these terrorist skills I taught them to fight for Sikh independence," as if that made it acceptable. I am urging the government not to let this matter go by without making some statement on behalf of Canadians to the effect that we do not take this sort of thing as normal and that we do not treat it as being at all acceptable.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I got the message.

● (1450)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I join with my colleagues in deploring the tragic circumstances of the Air-India flight on the weekend. I gather from news reports that an overall review of security is being conducted by our government. Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know if this review extends beyond the security review for flights destined for foreign airports and includes flights within Canada? I ask this question because I think that some of us were surprised to learn that there was no surveillance of luggage on domestic flights. That took me back to testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which is studying the transportation of dangerous goods. Recently, Mr. G. E. Lindsay, who is the Vice President for Government Affairs of the Air Transport Association of Canada, gave some examples of difficulties encountered in shipping both by shippers and individuals on aircraft in Canada. One example he gave was that of a professor who was carrying some nitric acid in his luggage on an aircraft for use in a demonstration, and the stopper came off en route. No one knew that item was in there. His baggage disintegrated. Mr. Lindsay said it did not do the plane much good either.

[Senator Sinclair.]

Another example was oil samples containing PCBs being shipped on one of our airlines in Ontario. This was not discovered either until after the plane had landed.

To go back to my question, could he assure us that in this security review precautions for domestic flights will also be seriously considered in terms of upgrading our standards?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, in respect of domestic flights, as everybody knows, hand-held baggage carried on the aircraft does go through an electronic surveillance which is effective to a degree. Baggage that is checked in, in most cases, as far as I know, is not further examined on the theory, I suppose, that no one would check a piece of luggage that is going to blow himself or herself up, but the examples that my honourable friend has given indicate the problems that one does encounter. In smaller airports there is no baggage check at all because there is no machinery set up to do it.

You have a very difficult question here. Whether in the long run it will be thought advisable to do the most complete check, that is, a personal, visual examination by opening the person's luggage and finding out what it contains, is the right way to go or not, is a good question.

At the moment I am under the impression that the review that is being undertaken is starting with flights to destinations abroad. I am not sure that it is ending there, but I shall endeavour to find out.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to touch on one more aspect of this question. Since the Leader of the Government and I seem to be on the same beam of civility on this question—

Senator Roblin: Comme toujours!

Senator Frith: —I would like to make a suggestion that when considering what we might do to make our feelings known, particularly to the United States about this school for terrorists, that he might consider obtaining a tape of that interview that appeared this morning on the CBC radio news at eight o'clock and sending it to the President of the United States because he may or may not know about that interview. I say that because I cannot believe that the President would not take some action if he heard that interview, given the things that he has been saying about terrorism and the situation in Beirut and, no doubt, his feelings also about the Air-India crash. Perhaps we can fortify our position by just letting him know exactly what took place because I believe that if he could do it, given what he has been saying, he would close that school.

Senator Roblin: Of course, I agree that one picture is worth a thousand words. I will take the suggestion under advisement.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the announcement that was made early last week before those fatal air accidents occurred, that it was the intention of Transport Canada to relieve many of the airports of the RCMP services and replace them with unarmed security guards. I think that this serious matter ought to be reconsidered and I, therefore, ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to make representation on my behalf to try to keep the RCMP in Winnipeg, because the possibility has been mentioned that they might be taken out of Winnipeg which would create more unemployment. I also think that the whole policy should be reviewed. Could he enlighten us on this matter within the next couple of days?

Senator Roblin: I want to assure my honourable friend that the government will do nothing which it believes would lessen the security of those who are travelling by air. The other points he raised, I believe, are covered by previous questions, and I think I am on record as having undertaken to make those representations.

ADVERTISING

SOURCE OF FUNDS FOR MATERIAL IN MAGAZINE

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to some advertising material—I say advertising material because the top of the page states “advertisement” with Canada’s name on it—in the June 10 issue of Fortune magazine. I should like to read a couple of quotations from the advertisement before asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate some questions.

Among other things, this material says the following:

... there is a growing conviction that the new course Canadians sought when they gave a sweeping victory to Brian Mulroney’s Progressive Conservative Party last September is being followed.

It goes on to state:

Mulroney has been reaching out to all sectors of Canadian society. ... a refreshing change for businessmen who felt their views had been largely ignored by the Liberal Party under former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

It goes on to say that an important energy agreement was reached:

... with three Western provinces that is a major step toward the dismantling of Trudeau’s much-criticized National Energy Program;—

My question is: Was that advertising material paid for by public funds and, if so, what department paid for it?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give my honourable friend the assurance that an advertisement of that sort is not an advertisement placed by the Government of Canada.

Senator Olson: But it says it was.

Senator Flynn: Even if it does, it wasn’t. You have to prove it.

Senator Kirby: I have a supplementary question. Could the minister do some inquiring into that matter because by reading the material and, indeed, the associated material that goes along with it, one is certainly left with the distinct impression that it was paid for by the Government of Canada. What I would like the minister to find out is whether or not that is true and, if it is not true, as he has just suggested in his response to my original question, then I would like to know whether or not any government official or minister had anything to do with the editorial content of that material.

Senator Roblin: I do not think the government writes editorial comments in Fortune magazine. If my honourable friend would be kind enough to send me the advertisement which, I must confess I did not see, I will take a look at it and see if there is any further information I can give him on it.

TRANSPORT

AIRPORT TAX—REPORTED RESTRUCTURING

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I read an article in the Globe and Mail but like everyone else I am a little leery of quoting it. It says that a new airport tax will be put into effect September 1. Will such a new airport tax be put into effect shortly by the new government? The article states that it is a second tax increase in two months and I am wondering whether that is true.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not customary for me to be called upon to verify, to confirm or to deny any newspaper reports and I do not do so on this occasion. If my honourable friend would rephrase his question, which he could easily do, to ask me what the tax situation will be, I will take his question as rephrased and try to find out for him.

• (1500)

Senator Olson: Sometimes they quietly announce things.

Senator Lucier: As a supplementary question, I would like to point out that, if this is fact—and quite frankly I think it is—I would like to know what kind of logic goes into removing a fixed airport tax and putting in place a percentage tax, which is what is being proposed, which will increase the fares from western, northern and Atlantic Canada by a large amount. This will increase the fares from Vancouver to Toronto by some $40 or $50.

I know Senator Roblin has a better understanding than almost anyone else of the alienation that already exists between western and central Canada. I would like to know what kind of logic it takes to introduce a new tax at airports so that people in western Canada, who want to come to their capital to do business, have to pay more to do it than people who live in central Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that sounds like something I could have said myself. I will take notice of my honourable friend’s question.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I have a question or, rather, a respectful reminder for the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Before an august body such as this one recesses for the summer, I imagine that no dust should be left in any corner. On March 19, 1985, the honourable Leader of the Government took as notice two questions of mine regarding the appropriateness of apologies from the government, first, to Her Excellency the Governor General, and, second, to Her Majesty the Queen for the slight offered to Madame Sauvé on the occasion of the Quebec summit. I trust my honourable friend will not leave these questions unanswered.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will not surprise my honourable friend by agreeing with his premise that a slight was offered to Her Excellency the Governor General; that is not the position of the government.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On March 19, as shown at page 658 of the Debates of the Senate, I asked the Leader of the Government to let me know whether the leader of the NDP had been invited to the gala performance in Quebec City during the Canada-U.S. summit. As yet, I have not received an answer.

Senator Roblin: I am sure we will bend every nerve to answer that important question.

Senator Flynn: Extremely important.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government has broom in hand, I should like him to go after dust in some other corners, too: On April 30, in regard to CN, I asked whether the government had requested the resignation of the board and, if so, why. I asked if the resignations had been forthcoming and whether anyone had been approached to be appointed if resignations were received.

My honourable friend could conceivably think that question is dépassée by reason of some changes that were made. However, I assure him I would still like an answer to that question.

On June 19, I asked if the Leader of the Government would ask the Solicitor General whether or not Corporal Wood, who has now been appointed to the Canadian Pension Commission, used to be an informer for Mr. MacKay. I also hope that question will not gather dust over the summer.

Senator Roblin: Although "proud" may not be the right word, I think I must declare myself satisfied that the government has, with due diligence, pursued questions which I myself was not able to answer on the occasions they were posed. We have provided a very large percentage of answers. I think our record will bear examination.

However, I am not at all unwilling to redouble my efforts, and if there is any way in which I can get answers to outstanding questions before the end of this week, I will do so.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Frith: On the question of his satisfaction in dealing with questions, perhaps the Leader of the Government will permit me to say—and, as I have mentioned before, this applies to all of us, I am sure—I recall the notes in the navy called "flimsies." The commanding officer would make a comment on these flimsies as to how he felt someone had behaved under his command. I saw one which said, "Conducted himself, at all times, to his own entire satisfaction."

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether it is fair to ask my honourable friend, but was that flimsy on his record?

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I should also like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On March 12, I asked when the Order in Council for the 1986 census would be tabled. This is not a trivial question. Research projects have been planned on the basis of the data which will emerge from that census. Although we are reassured on an informal basis by officials that the projects will be roughly similar to those planned by the previous government, I think many people are waiting for that Order in Council, and we would be grateful if this could be tabled before Parliament.

Senator Roblin: Since the whole matter is under consideration, I can give my honourable friend no assurance that it will be decided this week.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate in his congratulations regarding what the government has done in answering questions. Up to this point, they have done quite a good job.

In light of his co-operative stance today, I would ask the Leader of the Government, if, when he makes these inquiries, he will remember my question of June 13 in which I asked him, after quoting from the press some remarks about the Council of Maritime Premiers, if they had made representation directly to the government for changes in the budget or, as Senator Doody would say, the "boojit."

Senator Doody: Isn't that correct?

Senator McElman: I would also ask him whether the Council of Maritime Premiers has also made its views known to the government with respect to de-indexing, as it stated it was going to do.

My question of June 13 is found at page 1021 of the Debates of the Senate.

I asked another question on March 19, which is found at page 657 of the Debates of the Senate, inquiring as to the uses of the Great Seal and by whom it could or should be used.

Senator Roblin: I do not recall the Great Seal question. I am surprised I have not answered that.

Senator MacEachen: It is not the grey seal; it is the Great Seal.

Senator McElman: That is the Great Seal of Canada.

Senator Roblin: In that office in my department, where all the thinking is done—and it is not my own office—a list of all these questions is kept. A note is taken as to who asked them and what department of the government is expected to reply. We do our best to prod those concerned to provide answers within a reasonable time, and we will keep right on doing so.

Senator McElman: It may have become confused with the maritimes' harp seal.

TRANSPORT

SECURITY AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: My question is addressed to the Leader of the Government. Earlier this month, the Special Senate Committee on Youth was travelling in the maritimes, and there was absolutely no check of our luggage, hand-held or otherwise, at various places. Does this indicate that the Department of Transport is less worried about maritimers being kidnapped than people from other parts of Canada?

Senator Marshall: They are less worried about senators.

Senator Roblin: It is not maritimers who were in the forefront of their consideration; it was undoubtedly my honourable friend.

I will have to make a special inquiry, I see, from now on to make sure that his baggage is given a double examination. I will undertake to investigate the possibilities of that happening because no one would like to see his sojourn in this vale of tears cut short because of any negligence on our part.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to express my gratitude to the honourable Leader of the Government for the promise to have me harassed by customs officials.

Senator Roblin: Not customs officials—security officials.

Senator Gigantès: I noticed, however, that people who are not members of this chamber—in particular, those who do not make up the majority in this chamber—were also not examined on those occasions in the maritimes. I would suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government that he should tell his colleague, the Minister of Transport, that there are many valuable maritime members whom we would not like to see kidnapped, even if they are not senators.

● (1510)

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I always take his suggestions seriously, indeed.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on that point. Is it clear—I suppose it is clear—that baggage on domestic flights is not examined? I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would be so kind as to provide honourable senators with the directives that have come from the Ministry of Transport concerning the examination of baggage going on to domestic and international flights? I think that we should be supplied with the official instructions from the Minister of Transport concerning this important question.

Senator Roblin: I would like to make sure that my honourable friend understands that baggage taken physically on to planes by the passengers is checked in the way he is familiar with. He is probably asking about baggage that is checked.

Senator Argue: That is correct.

Senator Roblin: To the best of my knowledge, that is not subject to the same kind of examination. I am not, however, about to pretend to the Senate that this is a field in which my expertise is unlimited. My expertise is very limited, indeed. I think it would be advisable for me to make further inquiries before being completely positive in this regard.

Senator Argue: Could the government leader provide us with the precise directives that have been issued from the Minister of Transport? If those show that there is a blank there, fine, but let us have before us the official directive so that we know what the position has been. It is crystal clear to me that these deaths would not have taken place if the proper precautions had been taken.

Senator Roblin: I think that this information is in the public domain right now.

Senator Argue: I would think that the government leader could provide it. If it is in the public domain, fine; he has facilities available to him, and I think that the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant his producing that information.

Senator Roblin: We now come to one of the responsibilities of ministers answering questions; that is, they are not responsible for duplicating what is already in the public domain. If the information is not in the public domain, then my honourable friend's question is a reasonable one and I will refer it to my colleague.

Senator Argue: I do not think that that is a good enough answer.

Senator Roblin: Too bad.

Senator Argue: If it satisfies other honourable senators, fine, but from time to time we can ask questions in the Senate that are in the public domain. We want to know the answer from the government. We cannot spend all of our time doing this research. I think it is an important question—

Senator Flynn: The Senate cannot spend all its time listening to you!

Senator Argue: Oh, now, now, now; this is the most talkative and the most interruptive senator.

AVIATION DISASTER

LOSS OF AIR-INDIA AIRCRAFT—TREATMENT OF INSURANCE CLAIMS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: My question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the government consulted with the insurance industry to make sure that the exemption for cause such as war is not going to be applied on the insurance payments due to the heirs of the victims of this disaster?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Speaking entirely off the cuff, I would suggest to my honourable friend that the insurance policy one takes out regulates the way in which that policy has an impact on claims. I would be surprised, indeed, if the government decided to modify that which has been accepted all over the country.

Senator Gigantès: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether his answer means that, in the view of his government, a terrorist act that causes the destruction of a plane is an act of war and that, therefore, payment under these policies would be suspended, as the policies state? This is not a frivolous point. This is an important point for the continued livelihood of those people who have lost their nearest and dearest in these tragedies and who may be in need of this money.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am sure that there will be all kinds of special considerations that will have to be taken into account before this matter is over. I know that my friend does not expect me to offer a legal opinion on this point, particularly when he has not even shown me a copy of the contract about which we are speaking.

Senator Gigantès: I asked the Leader of the Government to find out about this important issue because I did make inquiries this morning and was told by some insurance companies that, yes, the war exemption applies.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN M. MACDONALD

FELICITATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF APPOINTMENT TO SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to make reference to the fact that 25 years ago yesterday the Honourable Senator John M. Macdonald was inducted into this chamber.

Although he is not here at the moment to receive our congratulations and our good wishes and, perhaps, our surprise that he has lasted 25 years in this chamber, I thought that my colleagues in the house would like me to take note of the occasion and to draw it to their attention.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FISHERIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-32, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[Senator Gigantès.]

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

He said: Honourable senators, we will be discussing many bills over the next few days before this session is over, but I am sure that all honourable senators will be pleased with this bill. It will directly affect a great many needy senior citizens and it constitutes a satisfactory effort to attend to their needs.

I rise to introduce to honourable senators Bill C-26, to amend the Old Age Security Act. This bill proposes to extend the Spouse's Allowance Program to include all low-income widows and widowers 60 to 64 years of age. It will be effective September, 1985.

Currently, the income-tested Spouse's Allowance benefit is paid to the 60 to 64 year old spouse of a low-income Old Age Security pensioner and to a widow or widower who was eligible to receive the allowance when the pensioner spouse died. For these two groups of near-elderly persons, the allowance ensures that they have a minimum income which is adequate to meet their basic living costs.

Unfortunately, many other persons in the 60 to 64 year age category do not have the same income guarantee. Many low-income persons in this age group are forced to continue working at jobs which have become too much for them if, indeed, they have not become victims of the high unemployment situation in this country. For those not in the labour force, all too often their only assistance is received through means- and needs-tested provincial social assistance programs. I am sure that we all recognize and fully appreciate the importance of these provincial programs, but I think that more can and should be done for near-elderly Canadians who, through no fault of their own, are experiencing severe financial hardships.

Honourable senators, the bill before you today will ease the financial difficulties faced by one particular group of needy Canadians—widows and widowers 60 to 64 years of age. It is up to us to ensure that, come September, these deserving persons are receiving the Spouse's Allowance benefit.

An estimated 85,000 people, representing almost 60 per cent of the 60 to 64 years of age category, stand to benefit from the extension of the Spouse's Allowance Program. These are widows and widowers who, through no fault of their own, do not have sufficient personal resources to meet adequately their basic needs.

While both men and women will benefit from this bill, I am sure that honourable senators are already aware that the incidence of poverty is most prevalent among elderly women. In fact, 72,000 of the 85,000 widowed persons affected by Bill C-26 are widows. These are women who have given much to this country through their work in the home and the community, and it is time this country gave them something back.

• (1520)

To date the only contentious aspect of the bill relates not to those it helps but to those who will not benefit, namely, single, divorced and married persons 60 to 64 years of age. Indeed, a similar concern was expressed in 1979 when we debated the bill which resulted in the continued payment of the spouse's allowance until age 65 in the event of the pensioner's death.

At that time honourable senators pointed out that the Spouse's Allowance Program did not include unattached men and women, including widowed persons 60 to 64 years of age who had not been eligible for the allowance at the time of their spouse's death. Despite this concern, we still recognized that the program was being improved, and we gave that 1979 bill our approval.

As a result, the husbands and wives who lost their pensioner spouse no longer had their allowance cut off six months after the pensioner's death. One small group of widowed persons—approximately 6,300 in 1984—have been the fortunate beneficiaries of that change.

We also saw the necessity for approving that change to the Spouse's Allowance Program because of its positive side. I am confident that the amendment before us today, which will extend the protection of the Spouse's Allowance Program to another 85,000 widowed persons in this country, will receive our approval for the same reason.

This extension of the Spouse's Allowance Program is not inexpensive. In 1985-86 the proposal is estimated to cost $190 million, and, in 1986-87, its first full year of implementation, the cost will be approximately $350 million. Given the numerous restraint measures that the government has had to introduce in order to take aim at the huge deficit, including restraints on social program spending, the fact that this measure has been brought forward is evidence of the government's commitment to help those persons most in need.

Unfortunately, there are those who say that the government should not be expanding the Spouse's Allowance Program at this time. They argue that since the money is not available to help all low-income 60 to 64 year olds, the government should do nothing at all. But I am pleased to note that this was not the position taken by the anti-poverty organizations or women's groups. Certainly those groups would like to see the spouse's allowance provided to all 60 to 64 year olds in need. We too would like to see that. However, they have realistically accepted the economic realities and they applaud this bill, which will indeed take care of a very vulnerable group of near-elderly persons.

As honourable senators may already be aware, both legal and common-law spouses are recognized under the Old Age Security Act. However, it is worth while to draw your attention to an amendment which has been made to Bill C-26 since it was first introduced in the other place. The definition of common-law spouse has, since its introduction under the Old Age Security Act in 1975, required that in addition to public representation as husband and wife, the couple must have lived together for three years if there was a bar to marriage. Where there is no bar to marriage, only one year's cohabitation is required. Under this program, through the amendment, there is no reason to distinguish between those couples who have a bar to marriage and those who do not. Thus, the bill now before us simply requires cohabitation for one year.

As noted earlier, low-income widows and widowers will, if we give prompt passage to this bill, become eligible for the spouse's allowance this September. Of course, annual application must be made, and the amount of allowance paid will depend on the amount of other income that the recipient has.

Given the large number of widowed persons who will, for the first time, become eligible for spouse's allowance benefits, there is a great deal of administrative work to be done in order to ensure that those eligible will begin to receive their benefits as soon as possible. The measure quite naturally will need to be publicized in order to ensure that eligible persons are aware of their right to the allowance. Also, application forms will have to be made available to potential beneficiaries who, in turn, must complete and return the applications to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Only then can eligibility be considered, the amount of the allowance be calculated, and the first cheques made ready for delivery in September—which is not very far away.

Honourable senators, in order to ensure that the necessary time is available to have the allowance available for payment in less than three months from now, I can only stress the need and appeal for your co-operation in giving prompt passage to the bill. Certainly we can then ensure that a very deserving group of Canadians, who have long had to do without, can begin to receive the assistance they so richly deserve as quickly as possible.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak to this bill. However, it is an important piece of legislation. As the minister said when the bill was being studied in committee, it represents another giant step for mankind—or, at least, womankind—in the progressive development of social services in this country.

I have a few questions that I should like to direct to the sponsor of the bill. Perhaps, when closing the debate on second reading, he will be able to provide the answers.

The bill has already been pre-studied. The committee was in favour of the legislation as being progressive, but expressed the view that it did not go far enough to include more people. However, there is no end to how far we can go, and if we proceed one step at a time, perhaps next year we can give consideration to some of those who have not been included in this legislation. I should have liked to see the legislation cover all people who are aged 60.

I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill how much income a person must have so as not to receive any assistance under this new legislation. I can see that it could involve a graded scale. As one's income increases, one would probably receive less assistance.

Approximately $50 million will be saved by the Department of Veterans Affairs because many widows are receiving the War Veterans Allowance or benefits under other legislation. Of that sum that is being saved by the Department of Veterans Affairs, how much is being saved in each of the provinces?

Many individuals between the age of 60 and 65 will be receiving benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, Canada Assistance Programs, or our social services, and, as such, approximately $35 million will be saved. That is a shared program with the provinces. How much money will each province save as a result of this legislation being passed and the program being taken over 100 per cent by the federal government?

Both British Columbia and Prince Edward Island have a large proportion of senior citizens, and it will be interesting to see how much money the provincial treasuries of those provinces can save as a result of the passage of this legislation.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay the bill, which I support. I wish the legislation could have gone further. Perhaps over the next few days the sponsor of the bill can provide the house with answers to my questions.

Of the 85,000 people who will receive benefits under this program, and the 72,000 women who will receive benefit under the program, can he tell us which provinces those people come from? In other words, can he provide us with a breakdown by province?

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

STATUTE LAW (CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS) AMENDMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend certain Acts having regard to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that this very important and substantial piece of legislation does not indeed involve any change in direction or policy. In other circumstances, one might even like to call the amendments contained in this bill housekeeping or consequential amendments—except, as I understand those two parliamentary terms, they usually refer to matters that are not of substance, and these amendments, I submit to honourable senators, are amendments of considerable substance.

Bill C-27 is one of a number of initiatives resulting from a very extensive review of federal statutes, regulations and administrative practices undertaken to ensure consistency with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The review was necessary because laws which are not consistent with the Charter may be found to be of no force and effect. From time to time we read in the newspapers and in law reports, for those who follow them, that the courts are declaring various sections of various acts to be of no force and effect. The government believes that it is preferable to change laws than to force people to go to the courts to assert their constitutional rights.

This particular bill amends roughly 50 federal statutes. In addition to this bill, the government has a number of other initiatives under way to ensure that our laws conform to the Charter. The one particular legislative initiative to comply with the Charter, and the one that I suggest has been outstanding, the only one in which Canada's record in human rights has been called into question, is that dealing with the Indian Act, and that, we hope, will come to a satisfactory conclusion once Bill C-31 finds its way on to the order paper tomorrow. The amendments to the Indian Act to end discrimination, I suggest, are important and are dealt with outside of Bill C-27. I point that out as an additional government initiative.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has indicated in the other place that he will be bringing forward amendments to the Combines Investigation Act to deal with Charter concerns.

The search and seizure provisions of the Income Tax Act and related statutes, I am told, are also under review. The report of the Chief Electoral Officer outlining Charter considerations in the Canada Elections Act is being considered by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

As part of the process to review and amend the Criminal Code, the Department of Justice is constantly examining Charter issues arising out of the large number of cases that are now before the courts.

The discussion paper on equality rights tabled by the Minister of Justice in the House of Commons in January of this year is another major Charter initiative. A subcommittee of the House of Commons Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has travelled throughout the country to hear the views of Canadians on how the equality rights in the Charter should be achieved. The report of this committee will provide the government with important insights on complex policy issues before changes are proposed to ensure consistency with the new standards of equality enshrined in the Charter. I am sure most of us have seen the media accounts of the hearings held by that committee in our respective home cities.

As honourable senators will realize, the review of statutes has been an enormous task. There are hundreds of federal laws covering a wide variety of subjects. In addition, the Charter is new and in many areas there are no definitive judicial decisions. The Charter also involves an evaluation of fundamental issues on social policy.

The bill before you today sets out some of those areas where the government has been able to reach clear legal and policy decisions about changes which should provide consistency with rights guaranteed in the Charter.

I now turn to a discussion of the bill before us today, which will amend, as I have indicated, something in excess of 50 federal statutes to provide for consistency with the Charter. If one can find a focal point of the bill, it is in the amendments related to things like search and seizure, right of entry, warrants, and so forth.

Section 8 of the Charter guarantees Canadians protection against unreasonable search and seizure. A large number of federal statutes authorize what is termed in law warrantless entry to premises for the purpose of carrying out inspections to ensure compliance with regulatory schemes, or to search for evidence of a contravention of a statute. Of concern here is the protection of legitimate privacy interests which may be at risk during a search or seizure.

The amendments proposed in this bill seek to balance these privacy interests with the need to ensure compliance with regulatory schemes. The aim has been to provide for the greatest degree of control on the discretion of government officials consistent with effective regulation. For this purpose, statutory powers of entry authorizing an inspection have been treated differently from powers of entry authorizing a search.

In brief, inspectors under various statutes—and ones that come to mind quickly are the migratory bird regulations and regulations dealing with certain aspects of the fishing industry—may still enter for the purposes of seeing that compliance is taking place; but the amendments to the statute will provide that where evidence is being sought to find a breach of the statute, where there is to be a charge, trial and conviction process, a judicial warrant would be necessary to enter the premises.

An inspection occurs when entry is for the purpose of ensuring compliance, as I have indicated, with a regulatory scheme. For example, under the Pest Control Products Act, amended by clause 21 of the bill, an inspector can enter any premises where he reasonably believes there is a control product to which the act applies for the purposes of carrying out such inspections as are necessary to carry into effect any of the provisions of the act. The amendment to this particular act, and most of the other acts covered in Part I, will require a warrant when such an inspection is carried out in a dwelling house.

The reason for drawing a distinction between commercial and other premises and a dwelling house is that there is a legitimate expectation of privacy in a dwelling house—something about a man's home being his castle.

A person engaged in a closely regulated industry expects to be inspected regularly in his or her commercial premises.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Sic transit gloria. A man's home is his castle, or whatever.

Senator Nurgitz: That is a new one.

As I was trying to explain before some weighty principle got in the way—

Senator Frith: Before some Latin scholar interrupted you.

Senator Nurgitz: Before some broken Latin scholar got in the way, a person engaged in a closely regulated industry expects to be inspected regularly in his or her commercial premises. This same expectation ought not to be there for a dwelling house, where historically more rigorous safeguards have been recognized.

A search occurs when entry is for the purpose of seeking evidence of a contravention of a statute. The amendments in Part II of this bill are a direct result of the Supreme Court decision that many of you will be aware of in the case of Hunter vs. Southam.

A number of federal statutes, such as the National Parks Act and the Environmental Contaminants Act, which already contain search powers will be amended to require a warrant. The circumstances where a warrant is not required are specifically spelled out. When the delay necessary to obtain a warrant would result in danger to human life and safety or the loss or destruction of evidence, the search may take place without a warrant. The determination of whether or not these circumstances exist will be reviewable by the courts. There are also limitations on the use of force in executing a search warrant. When the person with the warrant is not a peace officer force can only be used if it is specifically authorized in the warrant and the person is accompanied by a peace officer.

● (1540)

In some of the provisions in Part II—the Fisheries Act, the Environmental Contaminants Act, etc.—separate inspection powers have been added. This is intended to ensure that the administrators of these acts will have an adequate range of powers clearly delineated according to whether a search or an inspection is required, to ensure effectual administration of the legislation consistent with the Charter.

I would like to deal briefly with the National Defence Act referred to in Part III. The major thrust of amendments to the National Defence Act is to bring the system of military justice closer to the ordinary criminal law. The Minister of Justice has pointed out that the government accepts the view expressed by some of the judges in the Supreme Court of Canada case of McKay vs. The Queen, that differences in the protections available under military law must relate to the specific needs of military life and organization. Briefly, the amendments in this bill will provide that an accused in a trial under the Code of Service discipline has the benefit of any defence available under the Criminal Code or any other federal statute; end double jeopardy where a person has been previously acquitted, convicted or punished by a service tribunal, a civil court in Canada or a court of competent criminal jurisdiction in another country; provide for specific authority for searches relating to military personnel; and provide for a right to bail or interim release for those awaiting trial or appealing a conviction.

The amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act, which is dealt with in Part IV of the bill, take into account allegations that the procedure for appointing tribunals conflicts with the guarantee of procedural fairness in section 7 of the Charter. Under the new scheme provided for in this bill, the Commission will continue to screen complaints to determine if the appointment of a tribunal is warranted. However, the actual appointment of the members of the tribunal will be handled by an independent officer—that is, the president of the tribunal. In this way it is hoped to eliminate any possible perception that the Commission is making a finding of guilt before appointing a tribunal.

As I mentioned earlier, the more controversial equality issues of Part V are dealt with in the discussion paper on equality rights. The equality amendments in this bill are in those areas where the charter implications are clear. A number of statutes will be amended to change provisions which refer to members of one sex and to provide that benefits will go to the dependents or survivors of both sexes. Such acts as the Canada Shipping Act, the Bankruptcy Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act will have references to "wife" changed to "spouse" and references to "widow" changed to "surviving spouse." I would say that these are more consequential amendments as opposed to substantive amendments. In other acts such as the Canada Corporations Act and the Livestock Pedigree Act, the minimum age for eligibility to be a director or an applicant is changed from 18 to 21.

Senator Corbin: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: Did somebody slip one in on you?

Senator Nurgitz: I am pausing to catch my breath. I shall clarify that point in a moment. I am safe because I see that Senator Godfrey is not here.

In the Pilotage Act, age is deleted as a factor in determining minimum qualifications for navigational certificates.

Part VI deals with the examination of bills and regulations. The amendments to the Department of Justice Act and the Statutory Instruments Act would require the Minister of Justice to examine government sponsored bills and regulations to ensure that they are consistent with the Charter. The minister already has an obligation to examine bills and regulations for consistency with the Bill of Rights. The amendments to the Statutory Instruments Act would also provide that a single examination of regulations is sufficient for the Bill of Rights, the Department of Justice Act and the Statutory Instruments Act. That provision is there so that we do not get the silly situation where we are reviewing regulations which are similar in each act.

The amendments in Part VII deal with a variety of charter problems. Under the proposed amendments to the Fisheries Act, the minister would not be able to suspend or cancel a lease or licence if other proceedings under the act had been instituted with respect to that lease or licence. The right of the minister to order forfeiture will be abolished. The Immigration Act will be changed to take into account the right of the media to be present at inquiries by adjudicators. However, important safeguards have been provided to ensure the safety of those claiming refugee status and their families. That amendment was introduced in the committee of the other place by the honourable member for Spadina, Mr. Dan Heap, who was deeply concerned that persons seeking refugee status and appearing before an immigration officer and disclosing their story or that of their family or friends could cause harm or violence to be directed to people connected with the individual or his or her family in the country from which he or she is seeking refugee status. Therefore, with the consent or permission of the person involved, there is provision for in camera hearings to provide protection.

The ban against actions for false imprisonment in the Canada Shipping Act will be removed. In order to ensure that limits on mobility rights are prescribed by law, the Transfer of Offenders Act will be amended to provide authority for regulations setting out the factors the minister must take into account in approving transfers. The right to seal a device for failure to pay an inspection fee in section 22 of the Weights and Measures Act will be repealed.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that this bill is one of a number of initiatives undertaken by the government to ensure that federal laws conform to the Charter. In the months and, indeed, years ahead, I expect we will be seeing more such legislation, not merely as a result of a review of statutes, but as a result of judicial findings as well. The process to ensure consistency with the Charter is a continuing one. Our understanding of the Charter will increase as we get further court interpretations. New problems and new solutions will become apparent. The primary objective of the government is to move as quickly as possible to ensure that our laws reflect the rights guaranteed in the Charter. This is a first step, and I am sure that honourable senators will do everything possible to assist in the implementation of the Charter and, accordingly, in the passage of this bill.

My colleague Senator Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has reported the pre-study of that committee on this bill without suggesting any amendment. I am also pleased to report, having read the speeches made by representatives of the other two parties in the House of Commons, that consent was given to the passage of the bill. Our committee, under the able chairmanship of Senator Neiman, gave this bill a reasonably thorough examination. If I may be permitted a partisan shot, the examination given by the Senate committee was far more extensive and probing and, at least, got down to some of the main issues I was unable to find mention of in an examination of the proceedings of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I hope that after a representative of the other side of the chamber has had an opportunity to speak to this bill, it will receive second reading.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill has done his usual thorough and thoughtful study and presentation. It is fair to say that his presentation was eloquent, because this particular bill is not one that inspires eloquence and it takes some talent to make it as interesting as he has made it. This bill embodies only one principle, and that is whether it is a good idea for the government to anticipate problems with legislation that might be vulnerable to constitutional challenge. I think it is a good idea to do that. Obviously, one cannot anticipate every possible problem, but if there are obvious problems in existing legislation that make the legislation subject or vulnerable to constitutional attack, then it is a prudent thing to do something about that and avoid what could be costly litigation and lengthy delays in establishing whether a provision is constitutionally acceptable or not. That is the principle before us and we support it.

● (1550)

The committee has done a study, as Senator Nurgitz has pointed out. In committee today I asked whether we had had any separate professional advice in examining the bill. I asked that because this is the kind of bill in the study of which the Senate has had to look for technical aspects to ensure that it is as nearly perfect as the Senate can make it. In the past, in studying this kind of bill, we have often found errors because the bill had been put through the House of Commons perhaps too speedily. I was assured by Senator Nurgitz and by the chairman of the committee that, while we have not had any separate professional advice to go through and pick all the nits, it was given a thorough examination. There were two representatives from the Department of Justice before the committee, both of whom are known to me and for whom I have a great deal of professional respect. The committee was satisfied that the bill is in good order. Since the principle of the bill is a salutary one and we are assured that it has received a reasonably thorough technical examination, we should adopt the bill and we will support it accordingly.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Frith and point out to him that we had two experts, as he indicated, from the department, and the committee appeared to be satisfied by the explanations given by them. Another matter that I intended to mention in my initial comments, and did not, is that we usually get some assistance—and I am serious about that term—from representatives of the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Bar Association and others. In this case these groups did not appear. My understanding from questioning officials is that there is no one out there who has concerns about the bill. Some questions were raised as a result of changes to the Immigration Act, but I am informed and believe that the amendments made in committee in the other place removed those objections. Therefore, I am not now aware of anyone in the great Canadian public who has great concern about this bill other than to see its passage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-36, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is ironic that this bill should be introduced today when honourable senators showed quite legitimate concern and were appalled about the events of the past weekend and the concern for aircraft safety in general, which I may return to in a moment.

In August of 1979 the Honourable Mr. Justice Charles Dubin was appointed by the Minister of Transport, Mr. Mazankowski, to investigate and report on incidents involving aircraft and the formulation of laws, regulations and rules necessary for the safe and proper navigation of aircraft.

The Dubin Commission reported in three volumes issued between May of 1981 and February of 1982, and made recommendations in the areas of airworthiness, accident and incident investigation, enforcement, navigational aids, uncontrolled airports and personnel.

Volume 1 of the Dubin recommendations on accident and incident investigations resulted in the passage of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board Act.

This bill implements the legislative recommendations of 190 recommendations in Volumes 2 and 3 of the Dubin Commission, and represents the first attempt at a comprehensive scheme of amendment for the Aeronautics Act since the act was first passed in 1919. The drafters of that act would have to be commended that it stood over those many years. Kitty Hawk saw the first powered flight in 1903 and 1908 was the year of the Wright brothers' first sustained flight. Shortly after that was the first flight in the British Commonwealth in Baddeck, Nova Scotia—the Graham Bell-J.A.D. McCurdy flight. These are the first amendments to that act.

The main purpose of the Aeronautics Act is to provide a framework for a safe national air transportation system that serves all parts of Canada, including areas of the far north that cannot be served practically by any other means of transportation.

The amendments proposed will strengthen the department's enforcement program with stronger enforcement powers and increased penalties. It is to be hoped that these will prevent a recurrence of the unfortunate situations described by Mr. Justice Dubin such as: Unlicensed air carriers that operate in an unsafe manner and undercut legitimate competitors and that are not deterred by the currently applicable penalties; operators who ignore attempts to force them to comply with safety standards and continue to operate unsafe aircraft; and individuals who ignore the rules of the air or the instructions of air traffic controllers while operating aircraft.

The amendments will also increase the administrative powers of enforcement. As well as suspending or cancelling a licence, the department will be able to assess a monetary penalty varying to a maximum of $1,000 for certain regulatory offences. This, apparently, is a relatively new concept in Canada but is used by the Federal Aviation Administration in the United States and has been advocated by the aviation community in Canada.

The proposals for more vigorous enforcement, however, will be balanced by a review of administrative enforcement decisions. The establishment of an independent civil aviation tribunal, as recommended by Mr. Justice Dubin, will provide a vehicle for such a review. This body will hear and determine appeals from administrative penalties in an expeditious and fairly informal fashion. It will provide two opportunities for challenging the department's decision, first, by an application to a single member of the tribunal and then to a panel of three members.

The aim of the tribunal is to provide a system whereby these matters can be decided in an expeditious and informal manner by persons who have technical knowledge of the factors involved.

The amendments permit the consolidation of the aeronautics regulatory system by expanding existing regulatory powers and introducing new ones so that all requirements necessary for aviation safety can be made mandatory, because heretofore some of these matters could only be dealt with by administrative recommendations.

For instance, new areas of regulatory activity will include among others, location of aerodromes so that they will be sited in a manner that will lessen the risk of mid-air collision, and air navigation facilities so that the increasing number of private aids will operate to the same standards as those provided by the Department of Transport.

Provisions in the bill on zoning are aimed at clarifying the purposes of, and procedures used in, zoning and will also extend zoning powers to areas around air navigation facilities. Where zoning is aimed at incompatible land uses, the interest of the province concerned in planning development of areas around airports is recognized by a requirement for provincial participation in the zoning process.

● (1600)

The bill also addresses the issue of civil aviation security. In light of the recent tragic events surrounding Air-India and CP Air, this matter, as I have said earlier, has a particular interest today. The bill provides new regulatory authorities for air carrier security, specifically with respect to the security of aircraft and aviation facilities and the steps to be taken in response to security threats.

The bill adds new regulatory powers respecting security measures to be instituted and maintained by airport operators. These security measures will supplement and complement those measures carried out by the air carriers.

Extensive consultations within the aviation community were conducted on these amendments. I was particularly impressed while attending the sitting of the committee in the other place and hearing witnesses. I realized how much work had gone into this by the department. There have been consultations with the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association; the Canadian Medical Association; the Air Transport Association of Canada; the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association; the Association of Optometrists; and the Canadian Business Aircraft Association. The committee cast a wide net, and I believe they have eliminated most of the bugs in those matters which concern the bodies involved.

As a result of the comprehensive briefing books the department had provided explaining the technical justification for various clauses, the consideration and approval of the bill in the other place was accomplished with a minimum of delay. Only 11 amendments, essentially of a housekeeping nature, except for one, were made.

The non-housekeeping amendment, which I would draw to the attention of honourable senators, relates to clause 5.5 which deals with the medical reporting provision which was the subject of a great deal of discussion. This amendment puts the onus on a pilot or on an air traffic controller—to use the two clear examples—or anyone who holds a Canadian aviation document that imposes standards of medical fitness, to disclose to a physician that he or she holds such a document. If the physician or optometrist believes that such a person has a medical problem likely to constitute a hazard to air safety, the physician must so advise a designated official, a medical adviser, in the Department of Transport forthwith; and, for the purposes of the act, the pilot or the air traffic controller shall be deemed to have consented to the giving of such information. Therefore, no legal or other proceedings shall lie against the physician for anything done by him or by her in good faith in compliance with this provision.

Honourable senators, Bill C-36 was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for pre-study, and the committee has recommended that it receive your favourable consideration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have read most of the material concerning Bill C-36 and I certainly concur with my honourable friend that it is approved by most of the people concerned in the area of aviation.

Until Senator MacDonald mentioned it, I had not realized that the Aeronautics Act had not been amended since 1919. This would account for the fact that Bill C-36 is quite a lengthy, complex document which covers a variety of subjects. Since this bill has been discussed at length both in the other place and here in the Senate I do not propose to make these proceedings any longer than necessary.

However, I would like to raise the question of how far one should go with regulatory powers. I understand that in the area of aviation, because of the nature of that activity, regulatory powers can be changed quickly and without reference to Parliament and that that is an important element.

My honourable friend mentioned the Air-India plane tragedy, and I would like to add my own brief comment on that tragic affair insofar as the question of Canadian airport security is concerned only because I have seen, as I am sure my honourable friend has, comments that would imply that Canadian airport security is possibly more lax than that in other countries. My own observations and impressions have indicated that, compared to somewhere like La Guardia Airport in New York City, the security at Toronto International is much stricter. I specifically mention La Guardia Airport, but I am sure that without much difficulty I could mention other airports in the United States and in other countries.

It is always difficult to stop people who want to blow up an airplane from checking their baggage and then not boarding the plane.

In view of the criticisms directed at airport security, although I am sure improvements can be made, I do not think it is quite fair to say that Transport Canada has been lax in its security procedures to date.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I have read the material and spoken to many of those concerned, and realize that this is not a controversial bill. As a representative of our side, I should like to state that we support the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make just two comments about this bill. One is to support what Senator Stollery has said about standards of Transport Canada as compared with those in the United States.

I was reading the Sunday New York Times yesterday, which did a survey of airport security around the world. They chose various cities, one of which was Ottawa. The comment simply was that the security at all Canadian airports is virtually identical to that of the highest standards in the United States.

The second comment is that when I began my studies at Osgoode Hall Law School in 1946, having graduated from the University of Toronto law school, I was articled to Charles L. Dubin. In those days, we did not have a bar admission course, but we were articled full-time in the sense that we went to law school in the morning and to our law offices in the afternoon. As a result, our principal, that is whoever we were articled to, made quite an impression on us and moulded our legal thinking and our legal careers profoundly.

Senator Doody: So he was the one.

Senator Nurgitz: We have him to blame.

Senator Frith: Yes, but I can assure you that he was otherwise very sound in his choice of students and in their training. C.L. Dubin expanded his well-deserved and respected reputation as a truly brilliant lawyer to include a reputation as an equally brilliant jurist. The report that is the foundation for the legislation before us is just one of his many chef d'oeuvres. Honourable senators can well understand why I am glad to have the opportunity to place this tribute to him on the legislative record.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SUPPLEMENTARY FISCAL EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS 1982-1987 BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to provide for the making of supplementary fiscal equalization payments to certain provinces for the period April 1, 1982 to March 31, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-39 is a brief bill with the single, straightforward purpose of making available additional financial assistance to the six provinces which are eligible for equalization payments under the Fiscal Arrangements Act. Honourable senators will recall that under the act as amended in 1982, certain transitional arrangements were put in place extending over three years, ending in 1985, to cushion anticipated hardships in some of the provinces. Largely due to the recession that occurred in 1982-83 and a substantial drop in the inflation rate, payments were not as high, when transition ended, as some provinces had hoped.

The government recognized this situation and, in the interests of fairness and after much consultation with the provinces, decided that payments of the order described in Bill C-39 were appropriate.

Honourable senators, the government has no obligation to make these additional payments except, as I said before, in the interests of fairness. I believe this underscores the Mulroney government's adherence to the theme of co-operative federalism.

Honourable senators, legislation is required because there is no existing legal authority by which additional payments can be made. This bill does not relate to the broader and more fundamental aspects of the equalization program itself. Honourable senators are aware that the 1982 agreement is currently under review. I believe the historical pattern of five-year reviews calls for 1987 as the next update. The specific amount to each province has been arrived at on as fair and equitable a basis as possible. Specifically, the additional payments for three of the provinces which experienced a significant decline in payments—namely, Quebec, Manitoba and Nova Scotia—have been calculated in each case as if each province were eligible for a 95 per cent floor provision.

Honourable senators, let me try to explain briefly my reference to floor provisions. Under the terms of the 1982 Fiscal Arrangements Act, each of the six provinces was protected against a drop in equalization payments, year over year, below a certain specified limit. Quebec and Manitoba were protected beyond a year-over-year drop below 85 per cent; Nova Scotia was protected below 90 per cent, and each of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island were protected below 95 per cent. The additional payments to which I just referred treated Quebec, Manitoba and Nova Scotia as though each were eligible for protection below 95 per cent.

In the case of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, the supplementary payments were calculated on the basis of giving these provinces the same per capita amount represented by the average per capita payments made to Manitoba, Quebec and Nova Scotia.

This seemed, under the circumstances, to be the fairest way in which to deal with the situation. As I have said, this solution and Bill C-39 is the result of a long process of consultation which the Minister of Finance undertook over a period of several months with all ten provinces and, in particular, with those provinces which are recipients of equalization.

Honourable senators, these funds are badly needed by these provinces but the money cannot be paid until this bill is passed. I earnestly urge speedy passage in this chamber.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise today to make a few remarks on second reading of Bill C-39. Let me say at the outset that I do so in order to encourage its swift passage by the Senate. I think that Senator Kelly has outlined fairly clearly the need for the bill, namely, to cushion the impact on a number of the have-not provinces, the number of provinces receiving equalization under the new equalization formula which was passed by Parliament in 1982. The current equalization formula expires on March 31, 1987. As Senator Kelly intimated in his remarks, there will be further discussion and debate at that time in this chamber about what needs to be done to the Equalization Act. I would like to limit my remarks to the current act, with one or two comments on a couple of aspects of it that are of concern to me.

As Senator Kelly pointed out, the equalization program is renewed every five years. When the 1982 act was passed, that resulted in a couple of things which all of the provinces and the federal government agreed were desirable, one of which was to expand the range of provincial sources of revenue which were included in equalization. Now, effectively, every source of provincial revenue is included and, therefore, the concept of a national average level of taxation was better than it was prior to 1982. The second thing the new act did was attempt to eliminate some of the anomalies in the old act, one of which had been that, because of the extraordinarily high level of oil and gas revenues received by the Province of Alberta, certain arbitrary and rather ad hoc measures had been taken in the period from 1978 to 1982. Specifically, a decision was made to count oil and gas revenues for only one-half of their value to a province.

Senator Kelly will appreciate the humour of this having been done only to avoid the embarrassing situation for what will be, as of tomorrow, the former Conservative government of Ontario being in the position where it is eligible for equalization payments. As a result, the Conservative government of Ontario appealed to the Liberal government in Ottawa and, indeed, an adjustment was made so as to avoid Ontario falling into that rather embarrassing situation.

Other changes were made at the time. One such change was specifically to adjust the notion of the average, so that only five provinces are now used in calculating the average. The extreme rich end of the scale—namely, Alberta—was eliminated in calculating the national average, as were the four

[Senator Kelly]

Atlantic provinces. Essentially, the group of five provinces in the middle of the country are now used to calculate the average.

These changes, however, had an interesting impact. When the forecasts were made regarding what would happen in the period from 1982 to 1987—the period during which the current act is in existence—those forecasts showed that there would be substantial realignment of the amount of equalization paid to several of the provinces. Consequently, a transition provision was put in.

The transition provision was designed essentially to soften the impact of the changes from the 1977-82 act to the 1982-87 act. It was forecast in 1982 that this could be done fairly easily over a five-year period. Because of the recession, the forecasts turned out to be wrong. I might add, parenthetically, that, in the same way, many of the forecasts contained in the budget papers will turn out to be wrong.

The forecasts turned out to be wrong and, as a result, if nothing is done—whether it be along the lines of the proposed act or not—there will be a substantial reduction in equalization received by six provinces, because the transition provisions have expired.

Consequently, there is no floor below which equalization provisions can fall. Essentially, what the current act does is this: It maintains that an equalization-receiving province is guaranteed to get 95 per cent this year of what it got last year, and the same will hold next year. It is a two-year act, only because the third equalization act expires at the end of March, 1987, at which time a new act will be required.

From the point of view of the members of this side of the chamber, one of the advantages of the act—and the reason we would support it—is that it proceeds to give money to the equalization-receiving provinces, particularly the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and Manitoba. Having said that, it seems to me that there are two comments on the bill that are worth noting. The first is that the legislation has an element of unfairness to it, in that the equalization-receiving provinces are treated differently under this bill—because not only was a floor put in of 95 per cent, which is particularly helpful to Nova Scotia and Quebec, but in order not to help just some of the provinces, additional funds were effectively thrown into the pot, so that additional funds go to Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, which they would not have had either by applying the new floor or for any other reason. It appears that it was simply an ad hoc adjustment made on the basis of bargaining between the premiers and the Prime Minister.

As someone who has been involved with this formula for 15 years, I am bothered when I continue to see a series of ad hoc adjustments being made merely to keep people happy; because it seems to me that the principle of equalization, which, as all honourable senators know, was enshrined in the Constitution Act, 1982, should be maintained relatively intact and not be subject to ad hoc changes.

My second concern relates to the larger question of the government's financial and fiscal priorities. When I see, for example, that the elimination of the PGRT—the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax—costs the federal treasury from $2.4 billion to $2.5 billion, and when I see the budget contain provisions that give away an amount of the order of $1.5 billion to wealthy Canadians, I find it difficult to congratulate the government for giving a measly $220 million to six provinces. It seems to me that it is a sad reflection on the government's priorities, and, indeed, reflects a growing view in this country that this is a government that is prepared to give substantial amounts of money to the rich, be they corporations or individuals, and to be tough and hard both on poor individuals and the poorer regions of the country.

It is another indication of the philosophical position of the government in terms of dealing with the poorer regions and the poor or low-income people in this country. It is a subject that bothers me considerably. Fortunately we will have plenty of time during the life of this Parliament to come back to this issue. Budget measures have not yet reached this chamber. The Equalization Act will come back to us. As I pointed out, the act expires on March 31, 1987. So there will be plenty of opportunity to come back to that issue.

Therefore, in closing, I would urge swift passage of this bill, recognizing, as a Nova Scotian, that we have learned since Confederation to take whatever crumbs Ottawa has a tendency to toss our way, and however small that may be, we are, nevertheless, modestly grateful.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Kelly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I will be brief. I was interested to hear Senator Kirby's comments, even including his reference to the current somewhat dangerous and worrisome political situation in Ontario. However, I believe we shall survive that. We have survived worse things.

In more specific terms, concerning Senator Kirby's reference to the difference in the formula used for the provinces, three of whom had the 95 per cent floor with the others being based on another formula, I would have to comment that I do understand the honourable senator's concern over some "ad hockery." Given the fact that he has a doctorate in mathematics—and I respect him for that—he would naturally lean in the direction of blind commitment to a formula rather than necessarily taking into account whether there is need and whether there is a way of meeting that need, and the way that people get together and discuss those things. It is much easier, of course, if one can take it off a shelf and apply a formula; but very often that does not achieve what we all have to try to seek.

With regard to the amounts, the honourable senator commented in the traditional manner on this whole matter of equalization: it is never, ever enough. I might say that it is the only time that I have seen Senator Kirby be somewhat less than graceful. Usually one says "thank you" and will let it go at that, and not add "Well, a little is better than nothing." However, I would again urge speedy passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act.

He said: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: The honourable senator is at bat very often in this legislative inning.

Senator Kelly: I was instructed by my leader that I needed practice, and I have been given this for training purposes.

Bill C-24 provides for the termination of the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. The Home Insulation Program was introduced in 1977, to be terminated in 1987. The bill amends that termination date to make it March 31, 1986.

The original introduction of the Oil Substitution Program was in 1980, for termination in 1990. This bill terminates the Oil Substitution Program on March 31, 1985.

These programs were introduced in a much different market environment from that which exists today. The 1973 oil shock started a rapid escalation in world prices of petroleum. In 1977 when the Home Insulation Program was introduced, relatively little reinsulation activity was taking place, and few consumers knew much about home energy conservation. Canada had had a long history, in relative terms, of very low energy prices and had become substantially greater users, climate for climate, than people, for example, in Western Europe, where costs for years had been much higher.

Existing homes, particularly older homes, tended to be poorly insulated, and there were no standards for the work. No specialized industry existed for insulation or air sealing.

In 1980, at the introduction of the Oil Substitution Program, there was a worldwide consensus that supplies of oil were tightening and that the price of oil would escalate rapidly in the 1980s. I believe one projection suggested that by early 1990 oil could reach $90 per barrel, that at a time when it had gone rapidly through $6, $12 and was in the mid-$20 per barrel.

The situation today is radically different. Consumers are far more knowledgeable about the benefits of conservation, in reduced heating costs and improved home comfort. Conservation products and services are in plentiful supply at competitive prices.

Standards have now been developed for conservation work. Oil, for the moment, in a global sense, seems in plentiful supply at flat or declining prices, and even at existing prices the economics of both conservation and oil substitution have been demonstrated—and, in my opinion, do not require government incentives to remain attractive.

There are some fundamental concerns about grant programs themselves. Grant programs can distort market development and consumer choices.

● (1630)

For example, it is suggested that consumers may be making some decisions as between gas and electricity that are unwise over the longer term. In rural areas, regions where natural gas cannot be supplied economically, the Oil Substitution Program may have inhibited the introduction of higher efficiency oil furnaces.

All in all, honourable senators, certainly in my opinion, the better course for government at this time in these situations is to let the market system work. Government can continue to play a role at far less cost than in past years by supporting continuing research into problem areas, continued improvement in standards, and information transfer to industry and consumers.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has announced that a program of this kind will be introduced in close co-operation with the provinces and with industry. The aggregate funding levels provided for conservation and alternative energy initiatives in the current and subsequent two fiscal years have been protected, notwithstanding the fiscal restraints reflected in the recent budget. This means that more than $300 million can be devoted to cost-effective conservation and renewable energy measures over that three-year period.

Intensive discussions are now taking place at the officials level to identify areas where the governments can work together to pursue opportunities to promote conservation and alternative energy options. This program will build on the work done and the lessons learned over the eight years of CHIP and the four and one-half years of the Oil Substitution Program. It will recognize that consumers need information, not necessarily handouts, as a basis for their decisions on energy use. It will put together the resources and expertise of the federal and provincial governments and will respond to the significant differences in energy priorities from province to province, and it will be delivered in co-operation with industry through industry channels.

Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources conducted a pre-study of Bill C-24 and reported the subject matter of the bill without amendment, and asked for favourable consideration by this chamber. I make the same request at this time.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, Bill C-24 is a very simple bill, as Senator Kelly has pointed out. Its purpose is to discontinue two very good programs. That sounds almost contradictory. In the first place they admit that they are probably the two most effective—and, I might say, cost effective—programs that they know of; and yet, at the same time, they are phasing them out.

It is not quite that simple either, because they are cost effective in terms of what the alternatives might be.

For example, at the committee pre-study stage to which Senator Kelly referred it was at least acknowledged—I was going to say admitted, but certainly it was acknowledged—that the cost-effectiveness of these two programs, the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Oil Substitution Program, probably saved Canadians the expense of buying oil at a cost of about $20 a barrel, which is still somewhere down around 60 to 70 per cent of what oil costs on the market. And if that is so, then why in the name of common sense do we phase them out?

It is also admitted that there were probably two million installations in Canada where these kinds of savings were possible. As well, it is agreed that only about half are completed. The other 50 per cent or one million homes that could be effectively improved in terms of both conservation and oil substitution could be done at the same level of cost effectiveness; yet, the programs are being phased out.

One has to ask oneself why this is being done. Why phase out these programs? Is it because they are programs that the Liberals brought in?

This government is going to learn, and learn at its own peril, that it had better stop discontinuing programs simply for that reason. If there is some practical common sense within the programs and in the application of the programs, they should not be phased out. Simply because a Liberal government brought them in some time in the past is not good and sufficient reason to phase them out.

I suggest to the government that something of the same result will come from this as came from the old age security de-indexation proposal. Again, we have the situation of a person who really does not understand politics giving advice—and I am using “politics” in the best sense of the word—

Senator Flynn: Yes, you had better add that.

Senator Olson: These are programs that the people of this country like and to which they were attracted in large numbers. The government has admitted that the cost effectiveness of these programs was excellent, and yet they are to be phased out.

Those of us who have been watching the political scene for a long while believed after September 4, 1984, that this government was probably going to be in office for a long time. And I remember, too, people rationalizing in the same way following the Diefenbaker sweep of the country in 1958, capturing in all 208 seats, the largest majority in history up to that date. But they forgot one thing while they were in office, and that is that common sense and a practical application of certain programs that are of benefit to the greatest number of people need to be respected. And of course in those days they did the same thing. Senator Flynn was part of that government for a while. He will know that it was the largest number of seats that any government ever lost. In the 1962 election, the Diefenbaker government lost 90 seats. They weren't quite swept out of office, but just about. A few months later the Canadian people finished what they started in the 1962 election, sweeping them the rest of the way out of office. And why? Because they had done some very stupid things, things that were equal in stupidity to the phasing out of these two programs—

Senator Flynn: Your memory is not very clear.

Senator Olson: Oh, wasn't that the reason? I was watching the scene very carefully at the time, because I was right in the House of Commons along with Senator Flynn. We could see one program after the other—

Senator Flynn: They elected Creditistes at the time. Where are they now?

Senator Olson: They did their job and they did it rather well. They swept all of the Conservatives out of Quebec.

Senator Frith: That is in their favour.

Senator Flynn: That is right. It was a big mistake—

Senator Frith: You have to say that that is in their favour.

Senator Flynn: It was a big mistake. They themselves were, in turn, swept away.

Senator Olson: The biggest mistake was that they elected 50 Conservatives from Quebec in the 1958 election. The people realized very quickly, because of the way the government acted, that they made a mistake. That was why the Creditistes got in. I think 26 or so got elected. And the reason was that the people knew they had made a terrible mistake in electing all of those Conservatives.

And here is another one of those programs. Every time you go to a committee, every time you have a discussion, even with Conservatives, you get agreement that these are good programs; that they are among the most cost effective programs. Yet, they are being set aside.

Before I was interrupted by Senator Flynn I was about to say that, at this rate, I do not believe this government is going to last more than four years. The last Gallup poll—

Senator Flynn: That is not relevant to the bill—but go ahead.

Senator Olson: It is relevant to the bill. We have the right to expect to see some reasonable, good common sense in the practical application of and the approach to these questions and we are not getting it when these kinds of programs are being swept away.

● (1640)

Senator Steuart: Will you quit interfering with the speech of Senator Flynn?

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn seems to think that he has an obligation to make a speech every time I get to my feet. He usually does it sitting down.

Senator Flynn: You invited me to participate.

Senator Olson: Your Honour, if you look at the blues afterwards, you will find that he usually makes as great a contribution to my speeches as I do.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Let us get back to the bill.

Senator Olson: This is a very sad day for the reasons I have just explained. Why do we throw out programs which everybody admits are good programs? Senator Kelly has not answered this question. He has said that the government will bring in other measures because we are on the road to conservation and substitution now, that some great and wonderful lessons have been learned from these programs, but we do not know what they are. Surely he should say what they are.

As I said, I do not want to make a long speech, and I guess it would satisfy Senator Flynn if I did not remind him of all these points. However, there is one thing I think we should remember, and it is with regard to the politics of this kind of activity in which the government has been involved for several months now. As a result of the last Gallup poll it looks as if they may be going into a free fall. It is because of these kinds of things. This government has completely lost credibility already. People do not believe them any more.

Senator Walker: Now, now.

Senator Olson: That is true. The senior citizens of this country will never believe anybody in this government any more.

Senator Bonnell: Nor will the women if they are called "babies."

Senator Olson: That is right. The credibility of any government at any given time is important. One thing my honourable friends opposite should realize, including Senator Walker, is that this government was not elected on the basis of its credibility. It had to earn that credibility after it took office. This government was elected because the people of this country wanted change. They are getting a change all right. They are getting incompetence as a substitute for the competent government that was there. They are realizing that day by day.

Senator Walker: You are still a sorehead. You have been a sorehead ever since the election.

Senator Frith: It takes one to know one.

Senator Olson: No, never. Senator Doody is right—Senator Olson has never been a sorehead. I just hate to see programs discontinued when everybody admits that they were good, simply because they happen to have a label on them that does not suit the people opposite. I think that to continue these phasing out activities will lead to what the Canadian people really need, and that is the demise of this government as early as possible.

Senator Frith: If not sooner.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Walker: Don't put up with that nonsense.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I feel obliged to make one or two comments. After that impassioned address by Senator Olson I was quite shocked because I have seldom seen him so worked up.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn caused all that.

Senator Kelly: I would like to put a slightly different light on what exactly is happening here. I said earlier that this government generally agrees that the Oil Substitution Program and the Home Insulation Program were good ones, given the conditions at the time.

Senator Olson: I agree.

Senator Kelly: However, I would point out that it is a little like contracting a disease, taking a medicine and getting better. You are never sure whether you got better because of the medicine or because you would have gotten better anyway.

Senator Olson: But you do not stop taking the medication in the middle of the treatment program

Senator Doody: You do if you cannot afford it.

Senator Kelly: As honourable senators may know, I was associated with a natural gas utility company. We were one of the largest in Canada. At the time the Oil Substitution Program came in, officials of that company advised me that if I had any way of persuading the government not to go ahead with it at that time, they would appreciate it, because they could not handle the demand for conversions they were faced with. Remember, people of the country were faced with a spectre of shortages caused by happenings in the Middle East. There were line-ups at the pumps and people were really concerned. I question whether the apparent result of the Oil Substitution Program was because of the program itself or the conditions that surrounded the advent of the program.

On the question of home insulation, perhaps I did not state my case clearly enough. People in North America in general have been great wasters of energy for years and years, because we have been beneficiaries of very low prices in global terms right up to 1973. And then in 1979 we were reminded that we had better take a good look, and the government decided to remind the public through the Home Insulation Program. It was a good idea, but to suggest that it should be carried on to me demonstrates a startling lack of confidence in the intelligence of the people of the country. I think people will make very intelligent buying decisions without being bribed into doing so, not to mention that they were bribed with their own money. It is not necessary. There is no thought in the mind of this government that I know of that the program is to be removed because the Liberal administration introduced it. I do not know how to put it, other than to say to Senator Olson that, frankly, it is a silly statement.

Senator Olson: You have not given a better reason.

Senator Kelly: I have tried to.

Senator Roblin: It is a silly statement all right.

Senator Kelly: I think we will see a continuation of well-designed insulating programs, designs that were not really in place in 1977. I think people will continue to make good buying decisions about converting from one field to another, with a little less pressure because the oil scene is not quite as uncertain in the minds of people in the 1980s. I think you will see a government committed to monitoring what it does, not merely putting programs in place and leaving them there forever because they worked for the first year and, therefore, they should be left in place for the next 100 years. That is not the kind of government you are dealing with. I do not think that Senator Olson's fears are well founded at all.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN M. MACDONALD

FELICITATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF APPOINTMENT TO SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we go any further with the Orders of the Day, I see that the individual whose achievement we celebrated earlier today is now in the chamber. I think we should thump our desks in his honour again.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: I thank you for your kind remarks about me. However, I am not one who looks back over the years. I want to look forward.

Senator Frith: Another 25.

Senator Macdonald: I do not know how many honourable senators are aware, but on the third floor of this building there are two oil paintings of two senators. I made a point of inquiring as to why they were there. It turns out that both celebrated their one-hundredth birthday. It has been a pleasing custom and a tradition in the Senate that when a senator reaches the age of 100 his portrait is painted in oil and hung in the gallery.

● (1650)

Senator Doody: Get out the oil paints!

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I firmly expect that before I leave this Senate I will see my portrait, painted in oil, on the wall of the Senate and in a prominent place. Thank you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION OF TRANSLATION

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order regarding the official report of the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, June 20.

At that sitting, I tabled two reports. The first dealt with Bill C-36 and the second with Bill C-44. The French version of my first report began as follows:

Votre comité, auquel a été déferée la teneur du projet de loi C-36—. The verb "déferée" was changed to "renvoyée".

And C-44, in the second report, where I found that in the official report the term «renvoyée» was also changed to «renvoyée».

I regard those changes as minor, but I respectfully submit that official reports that are tabled in this House must appear in the Debates of the Senate, exactly as they stand, without any changes whatsoever, not even a comma.

I hope instructions will be given to that effect to the Debates staff.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we shall see to it that the corrections the honourable senator has requested are made.

Senator Langlois: Thank you.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Jean-Maurice Simard has been summoned to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard of Edmunston, New Brunswick, introduced between Hon. Duff Roblin, P.C., and Hon. Brenda Mary Robertson.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, by reason of a precedent recently established in this chamber, I should like to express words of welcome to our new colleague, the Honourable Senator Jean-Maurice Simard, who fills out the complement of the senators for New Brunswick.

I should say to Senator Simard that I am delighted to see him with a red rose and a red tie. I appreciate that I should not read great significance into the colour.

I should also like to say to honourable senators that although the honourable senator Simard is not a native-born New Brunswicker, he came to us and became a part of our province in, perhaps, a unique way. He has served the people of New Brunswick, and most particularly la République de Madawaska, with great honour. He has also, throughout the whole of the province of New Brunswick, fostered and pursued ambitions for the people of New Brunswick, as he saw them, with a great element of success that he has achieved throughout the whole of the province. Jean-Maurice has been, at times, a controversial figure in our province but he has earned at the same time great respect as a person who has ideals and beliefs and is prepared to stand for them. I welcome him here and I am sure that he will be a fine senator representing our province and representing Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am pleased with this opportunity to join the previous speaker, Senator McElman, in extending a cordial welcome, in his mother tongue, to our new senator, Jean-Maurice Simard, a fellow citizen of the legendary Republic of Madawaska.

I was privileged to precede the senator as a member of this august institution. I know he was hoping to join our ranks some day, and I imagine that today, his hopes have materialized to his satisfaction.

Honourable senators, perhaps I could take advantage of this opportunity to publicly refute rumours and gossip that our new senator, Jean-Maurice Simard, and myself are in perpetual conflict. That is absolutely false, and I extend to him the hand of friendship as a fellow citizen. And as Senator McElman said so eloquently, Senator Simard holds certain ideas very dear and has always defended them with great vigour and energy. That is not to say that one must always agree with his choice of political orientation. As they say, in politics only the results count.

In any event, I am very proud to be able to count on the support of Senator Jean-Maurice Simard, if I may take this liberty, in defending our rights and demands. In return, the senator can rely on my full co-operation in any initiative aimed at improving the lot of our fellow citizens in New Brunswick.

Welcome, senator.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I hope you will let an old friend of Senator Simard tell him, on behalf of the group we represent here in the house, how happy we are to welcome him within the party sitting on the government side in this chamber.

I have known Senator Simard for quite some time, and we met quite often when we were working together on activities connected with the international francophone community. The senator has always shown a great sense of responsibility in discharging his duties.

We also remember his courageous struggle for the recognition of bilingualism in New Brunswick. Senator Simard, I am sure Acadians are delighted that you succeeded in defending their cause in the exemplary way you did in New Brunswick, as a member of the legislature and also as a minister of the Crown.

We extend to you a cordial welcome and are counting on your talents and experience as a parliamentarian to help the Senate meet its age-old commitment to protect regional and minority rights.

Congratulations, Senator Simard.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would not want to miss this opportunity to say to Senator Jean-Maurice Simard how delighted I am to see him among us today. As somebody said earlier, he has always had the greatest respect for the Senate and has been wanting to sit in this institution for a long time. As a senator I can assure him that he will find this place more peaceful than it was when he joined the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly in 1970.

I would point out to my colleagues that the timely arrival of Jean-Maurice Simard in the Senate increases to six the number of New Brunswick residents who sit in this institution and who were once members or ministers of the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly.

Each one of us has been able to put to practical use the experience acquired as member of another legislature.

I particularly want to tell Senator Jean-Maurice Simard that I recall the spirit he showed at the Legislative Assembly when he arrived for the 1971 spring session as new member and new Minister of Finance.

I remember hearing at the time—we hear that these days in the other place—about the sorry mess in which the Minister of Finance had found the New Brunswick government. I will say no more about it. I remember as well the energy and idealism of Jean-Maurice Simard.

I sat during eight or nine years across from him on the opposition benches in the New Brunswick legislature. Although I did not always agree with some of the policies advocated by his government, I always saw in him a worthy defender of the rights of French-speaking New Brunswickers.

He was able to build upon the foundations left by the previous government. Jean-Maurice, I am glad for you and your family. You will find life somewhat more peaceful here. You will have interesting work to do. As my colleagues from New Brunswick and others said, you know as I do that we have always had the same ideal in politics, to promote the well-being of our fellow citizens with every means at our command. I promise to continue to do so with you. Jean-Maurice, it never occurred to me that one day you and I would be sitting on the same side of the house.

[English]

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I wish to add my words of welcome and congratulations to those which have been expressed to a former colleague from New Brunswick. Jean-Maurice may find that the pace is a little different here from the rough and tumble of the New Brunswick scene, but, knowing Jean-Maurice, I am sure that we will all see that he can shift gears adroitly. He will soon find himself perfectly at home with all honourable senators.

● (1410)

I join with the remarks that were led off by Senator McElman, and with all of the other nice things that have been said. I note that the honourable senator's family is in the gallery, along with other good friends and supporters from New Brunswick. It is very nice to see them here, Your Honour.

Honourable senators, again I offer a warm welcome and congratulations to my former colleague.

OLD AGE SECURITY

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition to the honourable the Senate of Canada, here assembled, on behalf of 201 residents of the federal riding of Madawaska-Victoria, in New Brunswick, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that the Senate will therefore provide a remedy, and who humbly ask that the Prime Minister of Canada, the Honourable Brian Mulroney, respect his commitment of the 1984 election campaign to maintain full indexation of old age pensions.

Senator Haidasz: Well put.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before presenting my petition, I trust that you will allow me to join with my colleagues in welcoming the honourable Senator Simard from New Brunswick. The fact that I am speaking in your mother tongue probably shows that I am very happy that you are here with us. I may speak in Alberta French, but I am very happy that you are here and I hope that, as a member of the Senate of Canada, you will be free to serve your province and your country.

Some Hon. Senators: Very good.

[English]

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a series of nine petitions from 2,000 citizens of the province of Alberta. If it is agreed, I will read the first petition, with the rest appearing in Hansard as though they had been read.

Senator Frith: No, rub it in; read them all.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Hastings: Certainly.

Senator Barootes: Would the honourable senator confirm and comment on reports that at two meetings of old age pensioners, held in the city of Calgary—to which he has just referred—on Saturday last, there was considerable uproar when one or two old age pensioners rose to protest the partial de-indexing of pensions and were asked by the large majority—the huge majority—present to sit down and to please be quiet?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I cannot confirm what happens at Tory meetings, because I do not usually attend them.

Senator Flynn: But you can comment on Liberal meetings.

Senator Hastings: But I can comment on the meetings held at Calgary Centre and Calgary West, when 50 per cent of the people took on their members of Parliament and criticized them bitterly for supporting the de-indexation of old age pensions—50 per cent of the people who attended those meetings.

It is true that some of them urged their member of Parliament to hang tough on the proposal. I can tell the honourable senator that I hope they will hang tough, because they will all hang together!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: Would the honourable senator—

Senator Flynn: You just want to gain political advantage.

Senator Hastings: I just want honesty. Keep your promise!

Senator Flynn: You're a hypocrite. I'll get even with you in due course.

Senator Frith: Senator Walker wants you not to be a sorehead, Senator Flynn.

Senator Walker: I support whatever Senator Flynn does.

CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA

REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. George C. van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, tabled the following report:

Wednesday, June 26, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Tuesday, December 18, 1984, to continue its examination and report on Canadian relations with Countries of the Middle East and North Africa, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference, proceeded with the study and now tables the report.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE C. VAN ROGGEN
Chairman

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

If the motion is agreed to, I will make some brief remarks now and will save more specific comments for a later date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. If my honourable friend speaks now on consideration of the report, he will use up his opportunity to speak. Therefore, I am not entirely clear that he will have an opportunity to continue his statement unless he adjourns the debate. Other honourable senators on this side may wish to speak in the meantime. We may therefore have a procedural problem.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, if that should become a problem next fall, I would certainly defer to other members of the committee, who could speak quite as eloquently on this matter as I, following my remarks today.

• (1430)

Honourable senators, in June 1982 my committee received a reference from the Senate to study and report upon Canada's relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa. We commenced taking evidence in the fall of that year. In the spring of 1983 a subcommittee of the committee was formed consisting of Senators Buckwold, Hicks, Lapointe, Macquarrie, Roblin and myself to visit the Middle East in connection with our study. I regret to report that on the very day we were to leave I took ill. I was taken to the hospital and was unable to join the group, in spite of the exciting arrangements that had been made for the trip. Senator Hicks acted as chairman of that subcommittee in my absence. The subcommittee visited Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Jordan and Israel. In every one of those countries it was received at the very highest level by a large number of government and other representatives. The report of the subcommittee, approved by the full committee, was attached to the committee's proceedings in March, 1984 and thus became a public report. I shall digress here to say that the Canada-Israel Committee made a comment in its publication to the effect that for the most part the subcommittee report was sensitive and perceptive.

More evidence was taken during the spring of 1984 and drafting of the report was under way when Parliament was dissolved in June of that year. As you know, we did not come back until October of 1984, a time when once again I was ill. However, the committee was re-formed with several new members who had not been present to hear the evidence that had been given up to that time. Senator Macquarrie, my deputy chairman, obtained a new reference from the Senate in September 1984. We continued working into the spring of this year and then commenced drafting the report, which was concluded after the Easter break. I might say that because of the time taken for translation and printing, the report became available only yesterday afternoon. Therefore, I am tabling it at the first possible opportunity. The report begins with a summary of conclusions and recommendations which runs to about eight pages.

I move, honourable senators, that the summary be included as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. If that is agreeable, I have the summary in both French and English.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, I rise on a point of order. Should we express our agreement on whether the summary should form a part of the Debates?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I am at a loss as to why the motion should be moved at this time. The motion before us is that the report of the committee be taken into consideration at this time. How do we fit this second idea into that motion? Perhaps it should be done at the conclusion of the discussion on the consideration of the report.

Senator Frith: It is normal practice for a senator in the course of a speech, even though it may be on a motion, to ask that a certain part of whatever he or she is dealing with be made a part of the Debates. Of course, if there is any objection then Senator Roblin is quite right. When an honourable senator makes such a request during the course of a speech, the Speaker usually says, "Is it agreed, honourable senators?" If we say, "Agreed," then it is done. If there is some objection, it is another matter.

Senator Roblin: What caught my attention were the honourable senator's words, "I move." Perhaps if he would simply ask for the unanimous consent of the Senate that the summary be appended to the record, I for one would have no objection.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is right, "ask" is the better word.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on a point of order, may I ask Senator van Roggen how many pages are involved?

Senator van Roggen: Approximately seven pages.

Senator Flynn: Less than seven.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of summary see Appendix A, p. 1159.)

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, by requesting that the summary be appended to the Debates of the Senate, I was not suggesting in any way that it was being adopted by the Senate. It is just that the report itself is now in the public domain as a result of my tabling it today, and it seemed to me that the Debates might as well include the summary.

After careful consideration of widely divergent views presented by witnesses, the committee report in every instance concurs with the position taken by different Canadian governments and which have evolved over recent years. The first thing that we endorse, of course, is the continued existence of Israel as a free and democratic country within secure boundaries. This matter was never in question. I might say as an aside that many senators, and, I am sure, many Canadians will be most interested to read in the report about the role Canada played at the United Nations in 1947 when the State of Israel was created. I certainly did not know until we carried out the study that Mr. Justice Ivan C. Rand of Canada was credited with being the principal author of the majority report of the United Nations Committee that was the basis for Resolution No. 181. Our former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, was at the time referred to by some as the Balfour of Canada. I was not aware of this background until the study and I found it most interesting.

The report also concurs in Canadian positions, as we understand them, taken by the past government and, it would seem from statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, taken by the present government to be carried forward. The report agrees with those positions taken by Canada on questions such as the sovereignty of East Jerusalem, the West Bank, the Gaza, the Golan Heights, and the settlement policy, the PLO and the re-establishment of full relations with Iran. The Iranian Government is insisting that we apologize for our part in the American hostage incident, and we, quite correctly, refuse to do so.

One specific recommendation made to the government in the report is that it establish a Canadian embassy in Damascus, Syria. There were rumours a month or so ago that the report had been leaked. I guess the Department of External Affairs got hold of it because they announced two days ago that they were establishing an embassy in Damascus. I think it was Mr. Kissinger who said some years ago—

Senator Leblanc: It was a leak.

Senator van Roggen: —“no war without Egypt, no peace without Syria.” We felt it was appropriate for Canada to have a full embassy in Damascus and we applaud the present government for taking that action. I think it is only fair to say that the lack of an embassy there was not a glaring hole that had existed for a long time. Canada had few embassies in many of these countries up until 10 or 15 years ago and since then, there has been an ongoing program to establish embassies in these countries. This is certainly a further step, which we applaud, in that direction.

The report goes on to deal with peacekeeping—in which Canada is heavily involved in various areas in the Middle East—diplomatic representation, trade, development assistance, immigration, and so forth. The body of the report—and I think this is very important—frequently records opposing perceptions of witnesses and should be read in its entirety, when, I believe, most people will agree that it is a fair and balanced report.

● (1440)

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise today out of a deep sense of regret and concern. At the outset, I wish to state for the record that I and one other honourable senator did not vote in support of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has just been tabled by Senator van Roggen.

I will not try the patience of honourable senators by speaking at any length on this matter at this particular time. In fact, I propose to move the adjournment of the debate in a moment.

I do feel obliged, however, to say now that I sincerely regret the manner in which this reference, mandated to the Foreign Affairs Committee, has been, I believe, horribly abused. Honourable senators may recall that in the debate on the reference that took place in this chamber on June 15, 1982, Senator van Roggen said:

We are not launching upon this particular study on the basis of trying to arrive at a solution to the serious problem that exists between Israel and the Arab states . . . we wish to address ourselves to the overall relationship between Canada and the Middle East from the points of view of trade, diplomatic representation, immigration and other matters involving the countries in that part of the world.

In the event this particular study evolved as an abortive Camp David North and contributes very little, in proportionate terms, to the overall relationship between Canada and the Middle East, and even less, if anything, in terms of North Africa. I am appalled.

Reference has been made by Senator van Roggen to two matters with which I will deal in substance later. One is the question of the treatment by the Canada-Israel Committee of the subcommittee's report; and secondly, at a later date I wish to deal at some length with the question of the subcommittee itself, which I was excluded from and therefore was unable to travel with, for reasons I will explain.

The report's treatment of matters pertaining to the Arab-Israeli conflict is, in my view, offensive, in that it is characterized by the use of much ill-deserved rhetoric directed against a country, Israel, with which Canada has enjoyed an important, long-standing and mutually beneficial relationship. I know that this relationship will endure despite what I consider to be this unfortunate offence.

Finally, we must consider that there is in this country a community, of which I am, to the deepest reaches of my soul, proud to be a part, which will also feel offended by this report. I am profoundly sorry for this. I am equally sorry that Senator Grafstein, who is also a member of the same community, and I were isolated in our opposition to the report. I hope, and indeed I believe, that our isolation in the committee is not reflected in this chamber, or, for that matter, outside of its precincts. To believe otherwise would be to negate everything that I have strived to achieve, everything that I have ever stood for during my public life and in my private life.

I refuse to accept the notion, notwithstanding this report, that I have misread or been deceived by so many people whom I have known and respected as friends and colleagues alike.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the motion for adjournment, which I assure Senator Nurgitz we have no intention of refusing or denying—

Senator Flynn: It is not debatable.

Senator Frith: All right, I am not debating it.

On a point of order, honourable senators, if Senator Nurgitz's motion carries now rather than later, it means, of course, that no other honourable senator who might want to speak on it can do so today. If that should happen, we only have on the record today with regard to this report the speech of Senator van Roggen and the speech of Senator Nurgitz, and their positions are quite clear. However, it occurred to me that some other senators might want to indicate their support or non-support of this report, from either side, because, if I understand the situation correctly, the report was adopted by the committee on a bi-partisan vote, that is, the committee did not divide on party lines. We do not want, I hope, to leave the impression that if there is any dissension it is in party lines. In fact, the abstentions were bi-partisan as well, if we understand Senator Nurgitz correctly.

So I raise that question to see if someone else would like to speak to it today. Then, of course, we will grant Senator Nurgitz his adjournment of the debate, unless anyone wants to deny that what I said about the bi-partisan nature of the report is correct.

Senator Flynn: Question!

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix B, p. 1163.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Wood, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY
COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-25 TABLED

Hon. Jack Marshall, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, tabled the following report:

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-25, intituled: "An Act to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 12, 1985, examined the said subject-matter and reports as follows:

That your Committee agrees in principle with the intent of the legislation, to rationalize the price stabilization of agricultural commodities, but believes that the proposals can have an adverse effect on producers of certain commodities in certain regions. Furthermore, your Committee is concerned by the fact that while the intent of this legislation is aimed at rationalization within the industry, decisions impinging on the agricultural industry made by other departments, can have the effect of weakening the intent of the legislation under consideration.

Your Committee would appreciate the opportunity of studying the legislation further when the Bill comes before the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

JACK MARSHALL
Chairman

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

IMPACT OF CUTS ON AGRICULTURE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government respecting some matters that we have been asking questions on for a number of days, but to which we had not had answers. I hope he can provide the answer today. If not, I certainly hope he will be able to give the answer before we adjourn for the summer.

We were notified when the budget came down that there would be a further $50 million cut to the Department of Agriculture. The problem is that that is as far as it has gone. As far as I know, they have not identified what is going to be cut, so we do not know whether it is the dairy program that is going to be reduced by $50 million, or some portion thereof, or the Crop Insurance Program. I tried to get some answers from the Leader of the Government and from Senator Balfour when that matter was brought in here, but there is no answer as to whether or not they are going to load part of the cost of these programs on to the producers, the research program, the inspection service of the Department of Agriculture, or whatever. What happens is that all these groups are apprehensive about where the cuts are going to be made, because while the announcement of the cut has been made, where it will take effect has not been specifically identified.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could tell us today, or if not, if he could give an undertaking to give a reply before the recess begins, specifically where these cuts will be made.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to make the observation that I do not think that is the kind of question that can be dealt with adequately during Question Period. I certainly do not have information on that scale available, because it might cover a broad front, as my honourable friend has indicated. I will have to consider the question as an order for return.

● (1450)

Senator Olson: Will the Leader of the Government give some undertaking that we are going to get the answer before we recess? It is not a matter of giving notice today. I have asked this question many times, and I have asked for specific parts of it or for the whole answer. What he is going to do is to leave all of the agriculture producers wondering whether they are facing a $50 million cut or not. Could he give us an undertaking that he will give us the answer before the recess begins?

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I cannot give such an undertaking because of the nature of the question involved. However, I will make an urgent appeal to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, expressing my honourable friend's concern to see what we can do to expedite the matter. A firm undertaking is another matter.

LABOUR

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR ACT—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARDS PROVISIONS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate pertaining to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act of 1970. Does the government fully subscribe to and support the intent and spirit of that act?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the government is duty bound to carry out any legislation that is on the books of the country.

Senator Hastings: I have a supplementary question which I put to the Leader of the Government. I appreciate that he will have to take it as notice. Could he explain why the act is not being invoked in respect of the construction of the Olympic speed skating oval which is part of the Olympic installations at the University of Calgary to which the government has contributed $35 million? Why is that Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act not being applied to that project?

Senator Roblin: As my honourable friend has assumed, it is not a matter with which I am familiar. I will have to take the question as notice.

Senator Hastings: I thank him for the answer, but could I urge the government leader to provide a reply as quickly as possible because it is a matter of urgent concern to the city of Calgary? I would appreciate having that information so that I can communicate it to those people most closely concerned.

Senator Roblin: My friend makes a difficult request because answers to questions and orders for return really have to be given first in the Senate. I am not sure that it is constitutional for me to promise to do something else. However, I know of his interest and if I can find some appropriate way of letting him know, I will see what I can do about it.

Senator Olson: Try a letter. It works.

TRANSPORT

AIRPORT SECURITY

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I read in an article this morning that the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, had postponed plans to replace the RCMP until a full-scale review of airport security was completed and that this inquiry will be conducted by the very people who are responsible for the present system.

While watching Canada A.M. this morning I listened in horror as the captain of a CP flight out of Toronto yesterday told how a passenger with a hunting knife hanging from his belt passed the security scanner and boarded the plane. Fortunately, the stewardess noticed the knife. It seems that he had already passed two security checkpoints with this knife.

In view of this incident, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to urge the government that an inquiry be conducted as quickly as possible but by an independent agency.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think my honourable friend is correct in saying that the RCMP are going to be the judges of their own action insofar as the checking of baggage is concerned because up to the present time that has not been part of their responsibility. They will be looking at the question de novo and looking at it from an impartial point of view. They will also be assisted in their studies by an organization which, for lack of recalling the proper name, I will refer to as the secret service. They are also part of this investigation and it may well be that the Committee for Aviation Safety that operates under the Department of Transport will be looking into the matter as well. I think it will receive a thorough consideration.

The incident that my honourable friend speaks of where people get by the security guard is one of the most worrying problems of the whole system. I hope that we can find better ways of minimizing that kind of thing, although I am afraid I have to admit that there is no system that I know of that is going to be completely foolproof.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government and it is supplementary to that of Senator Wood. Both ICAO and IATA have called special meetings for later this week to look into the matter of security. Could the leader inform honourable senators as to what position the government is taking in regard to their representations at ICAO, and are they giving the Canadian members of IATA any directions as to the position they should take in regard to security?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can only answer in general terms. Since the announcement has been made only in the past few hours, my honourable friend will understand that I have no terms of reference immediately to hand. I can tell him that the Minister of Transport in the other place has been a moving spirit—I almost said the moving spirit—in ensuring that the international aviation bodies are convened or being challenged to deal with this matter of terrorism directed against the airlines. Therefore, he is taking a leading part. I feel quite confident in saying that one of the major points that he will be discussing and giving a lead to will be the necessity of improving the standards that have already been set by these international bodies. These bodies are the ones which set the standards for aviation security of all kinds and Canada's record of conformity to those standards is very good. It is quite clear, I think, to most people that there is a serious question as to whether the standards are high enough. I would hazard an opinion that they are not. The Government of Canada will be trying to take the lead in trying to improve these standards on an international basis.

Senator Sinclair: I have a supplementary question. In view of the connecting flights that go through our international hubs, would the Leader of the Government give us some insight as to what action has been taken in that regard? What I have in mind, of course, is baggage being inter-lined through international airports such as Mirabel, Toronto and even Winnipeg, which is also an international airport.

Senator Roblin: That matter is being addressed along with the others.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Frith asked me a few moments ago whether we would be sitting on Friday and I think this might be the appropriate time to have a look at what we might expect from the other place. The two loan improvement acts are before us now and we hope to commence dealing with them today.

Yet to come, today or tomorrow, we have Bill C-53, dealing with Northern Transportation, Bill C-58, dealing with Crop Payments Advances, Bill C-44, dealing with Western Grain Transportation, and Bill C-25, dealing with the Agricultural Stabilization Act which Senator Marshall reported a pre-study on earlier.

There is also a House of Commons Act, which I believe is C-59, and I suspect that we will be receiving it as well. Of course, we will be receiving Bill C-51, the borrowing authority bill. If the pace at which these bills have been reaching us continues, it may very well be that we will be sitting on Friday. We may clear them up tomorrow, but I think it might be wise for all of us to look forward to a Friday sitting. If we can anticipate when we are going to receive them, we can think in terms of whether we will be sitting Thursday evening, Friday morning or whenever. Obviously, we will deal with them as soon as they arrive. I think it is only fair to tell my honourable colleagues what the agenda and the schedule might be.

[Senator Roblin.]

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Indian act.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, we have before us a bill similar to one that we considered last year. Through the investigation of Bill C-31, in terms of questioning the minister with respect to the content of this bill, many of us in the Indian community feel that we have examined it to the fullest extent possible, but a lot of us do not understand clearly what it is all about. I do not think that the women who will be affected by this bill fully understand what is really contained in it. Many of us—and I am referring to Indians in the communities that will be at the receiving end of this bill—have different feelings about it.

● (1500)

For that reason, honourable senators, I have serious reservations with regard to Bill C-31. My reservations may not be directly related to the legality of the bill, although, in some ways, they are. However, I will not go into that. I will try to restrict my comments to the general aspects of this legislation and what it means, in my view, to the people who will be at the receiving end of it.

When a whole influx of new people is taken into a small reserve or community, a clear understanding of the conditions under which that is done is necessary in order to maintain respect and peace in the community over the long term to come. I question that aspect of the matter. Are we handling this bill in the best way it could be handled? Why are we rushing this bill through?

I think that we of the Indian community have stated in the past that we do not disagree with the removal of the discrimination provision under section 12(1)(b). We do not deny that that has to be removed. Over and over again, Indians themselves have made that clear—that we do not disagree with the removal of the discrimination provision. The question is: How do we go about it? How do we begin?

I know that a lot of Indian people who will be affected by this bill do not even know how many new people are going to be brought into their communities. Even the minister himself stated that he does not know. That is why he cannot state in explicit terms how much money is to be used and the purposes to which it will be put. He cannot say that because he does not know. Who knows? Only time can tell. If we were to allow the Indian communities a little more time to do their homework, they could identify the number of people involved. But we are rushing this bill.

Honourable senators, I was able to get only one thing out of the minister, and that was a political commitment that was given to me by him in writing. If this bill is going to be voted on favourably in this chamber, I would like to read to honourable senators the letter I received from the minister to make sure that it will be on the legislative record. I would prefer, however, that some time be given before this bill receives third reading.

Honourable senators, the Indian communities are not asking that we kill this bill now. All they are asking for is a little more time so that they can have a full understanding of what really is contained in the bill. Give us at least the summer. We are not asking for amendments; we agree with the removal of the discriminatory provisions. The Indian communities all agree with that aspect of this legislation, but they need time to understand—they need time to go to their people; they need time to find out who those people are who will be coming into their communities. Are we going to give them that time? If not, what effect will that have on those Indian women who are so keen to go back to the community? Are they going to live there in a peaceful fashion? Are we approving something that will destroy not only the community that exists today but also the people that will go into it tomorrow?

Honourable senators, that is my philosophical concern. That is the argument that I feel I must put forward today. I feel that I have to say that, if this bill goes to a vote, I will not vote in favour of it.

I, too, understand what it means to live in a small community. I understand what might happen when that community has a whole influx of new people. It may be that more than 50 per cent of the people who were enfranchised before will be returning to those communities. What will that do to the society that is already there? It may mean a lot of disturbance; it may mean a total imbalance. Honourable senators, are we going to destroy the communities or are we trying to improve the living conditions in them?

I know that some women are going to say that I am a male chauvinist, but that is not the case, and I will repeat it—that is not the case. I simply want to make sure that peaceful attitudes develop between the people as a result of this bill. I simply want to make sure that the people at the receiving end of this legislation will benefit.

At this point, honourable senators, I will read the letter written to me by Mr. Crombie, the Minister of Indian Affairs.

Dear Senator Watt:

I am writing to confirm the results of our discussion today. As you know, Clause 22 of Bill C-31 requires the Minister to make a detailed report to Parliament on the implementation of the Bill two years after Royal Assent. Clause 22 also provides for a review of the report by a Parliamentary Committee, including a review of "any provision of the Indian Act" enacted by Bill C-31.

For greater certainty, I would like to confirm that I will be prepared to recommend further amendments to the Indian Act at that time, if practical experience with the implementation of the Bill indicates this is warranted.

Sincerely,
David Crombie

Honourable senators, a letter such as this may help, in a political sense, but, as far as I am concerned, it cannot be legally enforced. The minister does not have to exercise this if he does not want to. Further, what happens when the Minister of Indian Affairs is no longer the person who has written this letter? What if he is replaced by another minister in a cabinet shuffle? What happens if an election takes place? There are many uncertainties. What guarantees those political commitments that the minister has made with regard to the financial assistance that will be provided to the Indian communities? Honourable senators, there are no guarantees because the minister does not know the numbers that are involved.

Honourable senators, I regret that what I have to say may not be regarded by some as a favourable speech, but our job is to make sure that justice is done. I do not feel that justice will be done by shoving Bill C-31 down the throats of the Indian people when they are not quite prepared to deal with the influx of people who will be coming into their communities. I ask that we give them a chance to become prepared.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before speaking on third reading of Bill C-31, I should like to commend Senator Watt for his remarks to which I listened carefully. I respect very much the personal struggle that this debate has generated for some of our colleagues: Senator Watt, Senator Adams and Senator Marchand. I want to thank them for their tolerance and their great patience in educating me and other senators as to the real implications of the provisions of this bill for the native Indian people in Canada.

Last week I outlined a variety of thoughts and concerns about the conflicting purposes of this bill, some of which remain today. Honourable senators have now completed the process of committee study which is often viewed as the most productive activity of this chamber. There were some 10 sessions of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs where we heard witnesses from the Indian community from all across Canada; from women's groups, from the legal community, and from the government during the pre-study stage of the legislation. Every aspect and conflicting view was listened to.

Lengthy briefs were submitted and read. As the process of amendment proceeded through the House of Commons committee, additional briefs, opinions and legal points of view were received, read and discussed again among members of our committee and, indeed, among a number of senators who were not members of the committee. This continued through our final hearings last week; through conversations, letters and telegrams from Indians across the country. Indeed, some messages were still coming in to some of us today as this bill reaches the third reading stage.

The minister, Mr. Crombie, appeared and gave the committee as much time as it wished to question him. As he had already made clear to us, the substance of the bill was firmly cast and would not be changed. However, he studied our concerns and responded to some of them.

Last week, I suggested that the government should use its power, under section 55 of the Supreme Court of Canada Act, to refer Bill C-31 to the Supreme Court for an opinion on whether the proposed legislation complies with the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Many people think the bill fails to do that. The minister and his legal advisers remain convinced of its constitutionality.

In turning down the suggestion, the minister noted that it was not a normal practice for the federal government to make such references to the Supreme Court of Canada. He noted the Constitution Act of 1982 as an exception. I agree with him: It is not the normal practice. Indeed, that was the reason that I suggested it. In my view, the issues involved here are of such fundamental importance to the lives of Indian people that they warrant extraordinary care, such as a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada before the government implements the provisions of Bill C-31.

However, while making this suggestion very seriously, I had a feeling that I might not receive a positive response from the government. The next practical concern was to seek a guarantee that some kind of assistance would be available for the Indian people to defray the cost of court challenges which will, inevitably, follow passage of this bill.

The minister was extremely forthcoming on this question. There is, as honourable senators know, a litigation support fund in existence in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which has been used primarily in the past for test cases of Indian land claims. This will now be supplemented, as required, with funds for test cases relating to Bill C-31.

At our committee meeting, the minister said:

I am prepared to set aside funds for the next couple of years for a litigation support program and, indeed, increase the moneys available to the program already in place.

He talked later in terms of perhaps an initial additional outlay of $2 million to $3 million.

There are specific criteria for cases to qualify for this assistance, and we are assured that they are broad enough to encompass the key questions that Indian groups may wish to test before the courts. Also, this special litigation fund is normally used for assistance when a case reaches the appeal stage of the legal process. Mr. Crombie again assured us that, in terms of Bill C-31, the fund is flexible enough to apply at the initial stage, that is, the court of first instance. This can be of significant encouragement to those who wish to launch a court action but lack the means to begin.

I want to thank the minister for opening this door. I know he is confident that this bill is in harmony with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but he acknowledges the opposition to that point of view and, given the nature of this issue, is prepared to provide assistance to permit an appropriate court challenge to take place.

The minister also clarified another important question concerning assistance to bands in implementing Bill C-31. No resources currently provided to Indian bands for federal programs will, in any way, be used to finance the consequences of the restoration of Indians to status and band membership under this bill.

The resources for Bill C-31 will be a separate expenditure. As it becomes clear—and I share the concern of Senator Watt at the imprecision of that statement—who and how many wish to take advantage of restoration, particularly to the extent of wishing to return to the reserves, this expenditure will have to proceed through supplementary estimates in Parliament and, automatically, through public scrutiny.

In the case of possible strains on the current infrastructure on reserves caused by dependent children returning with their mothers who have regained their status and band membership—for example, strains on the educational facilities—it will be the government and not the band which will be responsible for meeting these extra requirements.

On the question of possible federal spending cutbacks on Indian programs, as suggested last spring in the leaked document from Deputy Prime Minister Erik Nielsen's task force on cost-cutting, we heard with our own ears from the minister that the government will fulfill its commitment in substance and in spirit to the Indian people. Mr. Crombie felt compelled to put Prime Minister Mulroney's assurance in this regard on the record of the committee, and I can do no less here in this chamber.

• (1520)

I quote the minister:

He (the Prime Minister) indicated that the government's commitment to Indian programs was, first, related to strengthening the relationship between the federal government and Indian communities; and secondly, that any change in any policy affecting Indian people would only be done on an open public and community level basis; and thirdly—

And I underline the third one.

—that there would be no cut in Indian programs.

Mr. Crombie then went on to say—and again I quote:

That, I believe, is quite clear. So the funds about which I am talking, that are related to any impact of Bill C-31, are in addition to existing programs.

• (1520)

I listened to Senator Watt as he noted that these are not legal and binding commitments but paper commitments. Nonetheless, they are solemn commitments to a committee of this chamber and now are on the record of this chamber. The minister said it; we heard it. And we will remember. I personally accept the pledge from this particular minister.

Finally, Mr. Crombie outlined part of his communication and implementation program for this bill. I will not repeat all of the points, because he went on at some length. However, efforts will begin immediately to explain, in layperson's language, the changes contained in the bill: What they mean to each band; how they will apply; and the process to be followed by those who wish to seek restoration of their status and band membership.

The minister has written this week to all Indian chiefs across the country. A toll-free telephone number will be maintained so that anyone seeking explanations can call in. Public service material will be provided to all areas of the media. Departmental officials will travel to the bands offering whatever personal assistance is asked for. Of great importance, the government will actively seek the help of Indian groups which have steeped themselves in this issue for many years. These groups will be asked to play a key role in the process. And finally, the minister himself intends to take to the road to give his personal explanation some time in the fall.

If the bill passes, during the two years following Royal Assent, as Senator Watt has said, bands will establish their membership codes to give practical application to the provisions of the new law. The minister is obliged at that time to report back to Parliament for a review of the process by committees of both houses. There will be an opportunity given in writing to Senator Watt to propose amendments to correct flaws at that time.

As of today, many of the fears, anxieties and hostilities surrounding this bill have not been diminished. They are not diminished in the minds of the families who protest the fact that, even though women discriminated against under paragraph 12(1)(b) of the current Indian Act for marrying non-Indian men will regain their status and band membership, their children will not be admitted automatically back into the bands.

This is one issue that has caused tremendous personal and emotional sadness and grief to some of my colleagues.

And the anxieties are not diminished, either, in the minds of those bands which equally resent the fact that, while recognizing Indian control over band membership for the future, the government is imposing the membership of a potential of thousands of "12(1)(b)" women on the bands right now.

However, this bill has now come through our parliamentary system, and this is its last stop. It is time for us to decide. Basically, we are being asked to decide four things:

(1) Will we cast aside forever the intolerable sexual discrimination provisions of the Indian Act?

(2) Will we restore the rights of status and band membership to those women who have suffered under that discrimination?

(3) Will we restore status to those other Indians who have lost it for a number of untenable reasons in the past, such as voting, entering military service, graduating from university, or simply being absent when the band lists were drawn up?

(4) Will we take a first major step on the road to Indian self-government by recognizing the rights of bands to determine their own membership?

Honourable senators, I suggest that these four points are worthy of support.

The compromises required to enact historic change inevitably distress as many people as they please. In reflecting on this bill, I recalled an occasion a few years ago when my friend, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, was besieged by journalists after the Constitution Act, 1982, passed through Parliament.

How did he feel on that historic day, they asked—perhaps expecting to hear an expression of elation, of relief, or of great personal achievement. Instead, he was quiet and subdued. He took no great personal joy from what many regarded as a great historic moment in Canada. And why? Because he remembered where he had started from. He remembered what the initial hopes had been for all Canadians in a perfect world, and how step by step some were eroded and even lost in the process of compromise, and would remain for other Canadians to fight for in future constitutional battles.

However, the basic principles were not lost and we gained not only a patriated Constitution but our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Indeed, without it there might not have been the same impetus for the bill that we have before us today. As with the Constitution, this bill, too, is a product of compromises.

Honourable senators, I should like to conclude with this thought: When dealing with difficult issues, the bargaining process, of necessity, often focuses on the worst possible result in order to negotiate the best possible deal.

With Bill C-31, on occasion the debate has focused on such extreme premises as:

—The government will not live up to its end of the deal; or —All the women and their descendants will want to come back to band membership and many will want to live on the reserves, thus disrupting the material, social and cultural stability of Indian communities; or —The band councils will use their power to reject many new applicants for membership, rather than welcoming them back, and thus cause grievous divisions among families.

Honourable senators, let us hope that there will be little extreme rhetoric and no extreme action.

Should this bill pass and become law, I believe all of us in this chamber would plead that all of those involved should suspend their pre-judgment and let the process of adjustment and reconciliation begin in good faith, with open minds and generous hearts.

● (1530)

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, as a parliamentarian, both in the other place and now here, there has not been an issue that has been closer to me, nor one about which I felt more strongly.

First, I should like to thank honourable senators who have expressed understanding of the issue, particularly following my remarks on second reading. I should like to pay particular tribute to Senator Nurgitz, and also to Senator Fairbairn who has just spoken on the issue with great sensitivity.

This is not an easy matter to deal with. As Senator Watt said in the course of his remarks, there are many aspects to it.

I have not approached this matter on a personal basis. I could have placed a lot of personal comment on the record, had I wanted to do so. I have lived a number of these things. I am proud to have been a member of the Okanagan Indian Band for over 50 years. Perhaps that is enough for me to say on the personal side. If I wished to get carried away, I could go quite far.

The basic fundamental which I wish to emphasize concerns the treatment of women—that is the basic fundamental of justice and equality of treatment for women. In my opinion, that is the paramount issue.

The only reason why Indian women lost their band membership and status under section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act—which has now been repealed—is because they were women. The only reason why their descendants did not have band membership and status was because they were the descendants of women.

That is the central issue involved here. This bill brings back the women into band membership and status. But it gives status to first generation children only.

A number of chiefs and several of my friends with whom I have spoken are in agreement with the position I have put forward. We really would have liked all of those people brought back into membership and status—the descendants and the women together—and not split the families in the way that this bill does.

During the course of my remarks on second reading—I will not take up too much of the time of honourable senators, because a number of my thoughts have already been expressed and are already on the record—I said that I would probably vote against the bill if certain things were not done.

After giving the matter a good deal of consideration and sober second thought—and also some commitments—I now tell honourable senators that I will be prepared to let the bill go through on division. I cannot vote for it.

I am prepared to let the bill pass on division because many of the native women who are affected by the provisions of this bill, and a number of Indian organizations, have said to me “We want you to pass this bill. We do not want senators to block it. Please let it go. We will take half a loaf. Half a loaf is better than nothing. It is at least a starting point. We have been waiting for so long to get at least some kind of redress in legislation for the very dehumanizing situation that we have faced for so long.” But they also said, “We will fight on.”

The other reason I will let the bill go through on division is because of the commitment we received from the minister that court cases will be funded. From talking with Indian women and Indian organizations, there will be cases going forward, challenging the bill on the basis of its constitutionality, relating particularly to section 15 of the Charter.

The main concern of Indian women is the way that families have been split, and also the fact that discrimination against women will continue as a result of this bill. By “women,” I refer to those women who are involved today.

[Senator Marchand.]

I want to make that distinction, because in terms of the future the bill is pretty good. It does some good things. It removes the discriminatory sections where people lost their membership and status because they were educated and obtained university degrees; or because they joined the Armed Forces; or because they wanted the same rights that other citizens had, such as voting in provincial and federal elections—those kinds of things.

Those discriminatory sections have gone from the old act, and that is good. But we could have done better. We could have done better had we started from the base that I would have liked to see us start from, which is fundamental justice and equality of treatment for women.

I will not rejoice in the passage of this bill. But I hope that with diligence—and certainly there is a lot more understanding in this chamber on the issue—all of us, as parliamentarians, will watch and see how things go; that we will follow the court cases and will watch to see how individual communities welcome the people back. I hope that the reservations and the bands will welcome back their sisters, their aunts and their cousins with open arms.

I hope they will not listen to people such as Fred Cardinal of Saddle Lake, who, on CBC television, talked in terms of “Well, we might have to have Judge Colt make a decision.” I don’t know how many honourable senators saw that program, but I am sure that he does not represent very many people in the Indian community when he speaks in those terms.

I will conclude by repeating that I am prepared to let the bill go through on division.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, in rising to speak in connection with Bill C-31, may I point out that when the bill was being studied in committee we heard from some very interesting witnesses. I can see that this bill will have a major effect on some of the small Indian communities. This bill does not help people return to these communities, particularly people who have been living off the reservations for a number of years. I think that many of these people will decide not to go back to the reservations, in spite of or simply because of this bill. They are out of touch with these communities, and they are not going to settle back into these communities simply because this bill has been passed.

● (1540)

As a result of this bill, there will be two controls—the Department of Indian Affairs in Ottawa and the band councils on the reserves. The review process will take a long time. There is also the possibility that some people may not be accepted into the band simply because he or she is not liked by some members of the band council. In many of these communities housing conditions are poor. How can we expect people to go back to the communities if there is no place to live? Government assistance will be necessary to build houses for those people who wish to return. Also, even though people are registered on the band lists, they may not be recognized by the band and they may have to take court action as a result. This takes money.

Some children will be affected by this bill. For example, what about those children who were taken away from their mother by their white father? Even though the mother may wish to come back to the reservation, the father may not accept it. According to some witnesses, even Indians adopted by white people are entitled to return to the reservations. I do not know how many people will return to the reservations.

What about blood Indians who have never been registered on a list? There are many such people who have spent all their lives in the city. Senator Marchand referred to Indians who have been discharged from the army and who have never returned to the reserve. Senator Fairbairn has said that the bill is a good thing. Senator Marchand thought that at least the bill was a good start. We have to start somewhere. Canadian Indians have been governed by the Indian Act for a long time. This bill introduces change and a new start. There was not much debate in the House of Commons on Bill C-31. Some elected members who are well informed on Indian Affairs could have at least said something about the Indian Act.

I would like to see the bill pass. However, if it comes to a vote, I am afraid that I will have to vote against it. I do not like the effect this bill will have on families. It will take some time to determine whether this bill has been good for the people.

The bill comes up for review in two years' time. Perhaps at that time some clauses will have to be changed. There have been many changes to the bill since it was introduced in the House of Commons on April 17. Politicians always say, "It is good for the people." However, that is no indication of what effect the bill will have on our people in the future. Many Indian organizations would like to have seen amendments made in committee. We can do nothing about it now, because we do not want to have the bill go back to the other place and then come back to the Senate.

Some very good recommendations were made by certain organizations appearing before the committee, but when the chairman, Senator Neiman, asked the ministry representatives whether certain amendments could be made to the bill we were told it could not be done.

In any event, in a couple of years I think we will still be here, and perhaps we can change the bill next time it comes before the Senate. At least we might then be able to make some amendments. However, on this occasion we do not have too much time left, and I can only say that for now I hope Bill C-31 passes in the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I sat on the committee which considered that piece of legislation. Thank God, it is an improvement over the legislation they wanted to push through during a previous Parliament. This is a consolation, and I endorse everything that has been said by the honourable senators who spoke before me on the positive aspects of the bill. I endorse specifically the quest for justice towards Indian women. It was about time we remedied the injustice that had been imposed by white governments for all practical purposes on aboriginal communities.

However, there is something I do not like in the effort made by the minister and the government in the legislative process, and that is the disgusting amount of paternalism that is still to be seen there.

Indians are told:

[English]

"We know what is good for you and you are going to lump it, whether you like it or not. Oh sure, we will deal with self-government some time in the future," but this is a mild step.

[Translation]

It has also been acknowledged that the legislation could have a negative impact, that it will be hard to swallow for many bands, that it will generate unnecessary stress among many individuals, that it may also result in the development of a new caste of Canadians. Time will tell.

Indians have asked for more time, and Indian women have urged us to pass this stage. Well, I had said at the beginning of this exercise that I would rise with my colleagues Len Marchand, Willie Adams and Charlie Watt, and I said I would do this willingly if they gave me the O.K. because I know what it means to live as a minority and to get reforms a drop at a time. We are doing this to Canada's first nations in this age of "Star Wars." We are still in the process of making mini-reforms, drop by drop. Too often we use a paternalistic approach, as in this case.

Surely I will commend the minister and his government for taking that step, because it had to be taken. But as I said, the way they went about it will create unnecessary stress in that community. I am referring in particular to the family reunification aspect, which Senator Len Marchand has dealt with. This is the most disgusting aspect of it all.

As a nation which signed an international convention on the reunification of families, I feel we could have done better. It is my feeling that, had we been willing to give ourselves some more time and consult further with Indian communities, we could have done better. We chose to do otherwise. We said: "It is time to decide." Unfortunately, the taking of such a decision does hurt.

I am not a prophet of evil, I never was and I would not like to be one today, but I foresee very serious complications in the implementation of this act. The Minister and the officials admit it. Once again, we have taken a shady road as regards the constitutional legitimacy of what we are doing now.

The Senate role is a special one: it has to safeguard the interests of aboriginal peoples and of all minorities. So, I am not rising to ask for a vote on this, but I would like to say for the record that I oppose the legislation. I am letting it pass, but with a sorrowful heart. I can foresee what the course of events will be over the next few months.

We will have to bring in changes, and I hope we will have the courage to do so within the shortest time frame possible.

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have listened to all of the speakers in this debate. I might say that I was greatly impressed with the position taken by Senator Watt. I realize that this bill provides some justice for Indian women, and that there are many elements that spell out progress. I thought Senator Fairbairn made an excellent speech; I thought it was well balanced, and showed an extensive and intimate knowledge of the subject and the problems.

I thought that Senator Fairbairn and the committee did well to elicit from the responsible minister a commitment that the minister would help provide for a constitutional reference and that there would be special funds, additional funds, to help defray some of the costs to the bands and the reserves that will follow the passage of this legislation.

Some of us, yes, many honourable senators, have taken an interest in our native Canadians, in our aboriginal people, in their ambitions, their problems and the principles they have advanced.

I thought that Senator Watt's propositions were very reasonable. I think that we should give support and a boost to the natives of this country who are on the road to self-government. I agree with Senator Watt and I want to support him in saying that this legislation should not be passed at this time and that further consideration should be given to it. He said that with additional time there might be reconciliation of the views of the bands and their leaders and of others in this country. While I recognize the importance of this legislation, I support Senator Watt in the propositions that he has put before the Senate today.

• (1600)

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I will not detain you long, but I should like to pay tribute to the hundreds of persons, particularly the Indian women, who fought so long to end that discrimination that has been a blatant part of the Indian Act for almost a century.

A couple of weeks after I was appointed to the Senate, which is almost 13 years ago, I became involved in the struggle with regard to problems arising out of the provisions of section 12(1)(b) of the act.

Mary Two Axe Early was my mentor in those early days, but I also drew inspiration from other people such as Jenny Margetts, Nellie Carlsen of Alberta and Sandra Lovelace of New Brunswick. These women and many others—and men as well—have worked for many years on this question. It has been a long, arduous, and often a very disappointing struggle. I regard Bill C-31 as a victory, not a total one but a partial one, and a very significant one, indeed.

I received a letter today from Jenny Margetts which had been written approximately a week ago. She represents the Indian rights for Indian women in Alberta. She says that they are able to give their undivided support to the legislation in Bill C-31 but she goes on to record the grave importance they attach to the sections which, in effect, deprive their children and grandchildren from being treated in the same manner as the children and grandchildren of Indian men who have married white women. She also says in her letter that the cost of litigation could be astronomical and quite out of the question for many women if they wanted to challenge these sections. Personally, I have reservations about those particular sections. I believe that they can be challenged and done so successfully on a constitutional basis, because I do not think that the children and grandchildren of the women who will have their status restored are being treated equally with other children of other status Indians.

However, the minister has, as Senator Fairbairn said, given an undertaking that, I believe, has reassured many of us. I hope it will also reassure the persons most directly concerned. He has said that funds will be available to help in certain court challenges which will be of general application and importance to all native bands. Therefore, I welcome that assurance. At first I thought that I would abstain when this bill came to a vote simply to record my unhappiness with those particular sections, but on further reflection I feel very strongly that this is an important milestone and I cannot agree that the bill should not be passed. I think we would be doing a great disservice to thousands of Indian women—and, we must not forget that there are some Indian men who are getting their status restored under other clauses of the bill as well—if we did not pass this bill today.

I should like to say a few words to those non-status natives whose rights and claims have not been addressed in Bill C-31, and there appear to be thousands of people in that category who feel that they have very just claims. There are still parts of the Indian Act which are seriously flawed and, certainly, over the years the interpretations that have been put on the act itself by Indian agents and other persons have caused grave injustices to many people.

I was given a copy of a motion which one group would like me to have incorporated somehow into our debate and then into Bill C-31, but I said that it was not possible or appropriate. However, it was to the effect that the Senate should establish a special committee to examine the claims of other persons with respect to recommending for registration as status Indians certain classes of people whose claims and rights have not been addressed here. I would like to put that suggestion forward, and perhaps we can deal with it when we reconvene in the fall.

In the meantime, I am very happy to see the debate on this bill concluded today. I want to congratulate all those people who have worked so hard, and certainly the minister who, I think, has tried very hard to accommodate a number of conflicting claims. Obviously, he has not been able to satisfy everyone, but that is the nature of life. Now we can proceed with the implementation of this bill. As Senator Fairbairn said, it is going to take infinite patience, time and goodwill, but I think it can be accomplished, and then we can go on to rectify some of the other wrongs that have been perpetrated on our native people.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill, I should like to make a couple of comments. First, not taking anything away from the concerns of Senator Watt, and those later expressed by Senator Argue, there were two matters that he raised. He said that we do not know the total number of people to be brought back on to the list. In fact, we do know and the evidence has been that it is approximately 18,000. With respect to the concern for how it is regulated, the bill provides for band by-laws to regulate residency. With respect to the concern raised by him that we are rushing this bill through, this has been a matter of debate for a decade, and has been a matter of active parliamentary debate for almost three years.

I am pleased to report that the debate on this bill had no partisan element and honourable senators brought to it their special talents and special concerns.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, is Senator Nurgitz closing the debate on this matter?

Senator Nurgitz: No. I was about to indicate that I was most touched and moved by Senator Marchand, whose special sensitivity and intelligence was most helpful in considering this matter. I am sure that most of us viewed him not just as a probing parliamentarian, but, in many ways, as a virtual witness.

● (1610)

Honourable senators, I think that this bill is a classic Canadian compromise. Both sides regret that it does not go further, but they value increasingly what it does provide. The key women's groups, in particular, while still wishing that the bill could have gone further, nevertheless urge us to act quickly on its passage.

Honourable senators, whatever its imperfections, Bill C-31 marks a turning point in federal Indian policy. It eliminates a sexist and assimilationist orientation which has permeated the Indian Act since its inception. Starting as soon as the bill receives Royal Assent, thousands of those who have struggled for years to regain their rights will finally have achieved their goal. Finally, in terms of the future, the bill takes a first and important step towards restoring Indian self-government by recognizing band control of membership.

Honourable senators, these are solid achievements. I venture to predict that when we review the implementation of this bill in two years' time, the essential fairness of its provisions will have been confirmed by experience. If not, we have all had the assurance of the minister that we will be back to the drawing-board. I am sure that, on that basis, we ought to proceed. The minister gave many practical undertakings with respect to implementation, and I will not go into them. I thought that Senator Fairbairn outlined ably what they were.

I urge all honourable senators to give their support at third reading so that the urgent work of healing old wounds can start immediately.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I realize that I have already spoken and that I can only speak once on third reading of this bill. That is according to the procedures of the Senate. Will the honourable senator, however, accept a question with respect to the bill?

Senator Nurgitz: I would be delighted to hear the question.

Senator Watt: There are two questions I would like to ask. Is the honourable senator aware that there were 19 different organizations which appeared as witnesses before the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and that they have wholeheartedly indicated that they would like to have further control in terms of membership?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, I am aware of that.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I have another question in relation to this bill. May I ask it?

Senator Nurgitz: Of course.

Senator Watt: Would honourable senators accept further debate on this bill tomorrow?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, we cannot.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my understanding is that this bill is to proceed to third reading today. However, I do not want to get into an argument with my friend. If he has asked whether I would be prepared to continue debate on this subject following the passage of the bill, my answer is yes.

Senator Watt: In that case, I move that the debate be adjourned—

Senator Nurgitz: No, that is not what I said. I said that I would be prepared to continue debate following passage of this bill. Honourable senators, I think there is no great dispute here on the matter of accomplishing what Senator Watt would like to accomplish. I regret that we cannot do so.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the second reading of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act".—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall outlined yesterday afternoon the virtues of Bill C-26, to amend the Old Age Security Act. We believe that those virtues are clear, and I will not repeat them. As my colleague has already indicated, we intend to support this bill.

Senator Bonnell raised certain questions yesterday afternoon regarding the costs and other aspects of this bill, and I will not repeat his points either. I would like, however, to speak to the spirit of this bill—the very limited provisions containing the spirit of the bill—which were referred to, indeed, by its proposer.

● (1620)

In the other place, Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart has waged an inspired campaign to attempt to persuade the government to extend the provisions covering the spouse's allowance. When the bill was introduced, he pointed out the central inequity of this bill. His example was three women from his riding, all aged 62, all receiving $427 in social assistance and all paying $250 per month in rent. These are real women from his riding. However, only one will benefit from the provisions of this bill, the widow.

On what basis does this discrimination occur? It is not on the basis of need, because all these people are in need. It is not on the traditional, though, perhaps, now under the Charter, discriminatory basis of age; all these people are the same age. It is not on any publicly recognized basis except marital status. This is, indeed, a widow's mite. Eighty thousand never-married, divorced or separated Canadians, mostly women, are excluded from the provisions of this bill.

This issue of unfairness has been raised, as I said, from the very beginning, but the government, unfortunately, put the

[Senator Kelly]

House of Commons in a fearsome fiscal lock. "Alas," the members of the government sighed—who only very recently were berating the previous government for not extending the allowances—"we cannot afford to help anyone who did not get married in the first place or who even though separated remained married." On the Sparks Street mall, right behind the Langevin building, someone has scrawled on a letterbox, "Down with the Blue meanies." I believe that the graffiti artist had the spirit of this bill in mind.

Who are these 80,000 Canadians excluded from access to the extended benefit? Most of them are women, as we all know, and women whose lives are already difficult. They find themselves in economic need as they approach age 65. This has never been a universal provision, but why are these women alone and poor?

Honourable senators will recall what was entailed in divorce in Canada 30 to 40 years ago—the scandal and the extremes of misery to which most couples had to be pushed in order to face the divorce courts. That is why a very good proportion of these excluded people are separated, self-supporting but not divorced.

What about those never-married women who also will not be served by this bill? Some women, it is true, did not ever want to marry. For many women, there was a choice to be made in those years between having a career and being married. One excluded the other. In addition, we all have among our families and friends women who were pledged to marry young men who went off to war and who did not return. Many of those women wanted and expected husbands and families. They knew all the heartbreak but none of the social recognition which widows, for example, received. Now we have excluded them from economic support in their older years. Honourable colleagues, this will be judged as a mean-spirited act.

We support this bill with only half our hearts and urge our colleagues in government to undertake two campaigns, first, to extend this allowance beyond spouses to all 60-year-olds, men and women, as soon as possible; and, second, to propose strong measures, as Liberal governments have done, to prevent the next generation of women and men from being so unprotected and so poor in their older years; pension reform; affirmative action; employment opportunities; and positive measures so that "down with the Blue meanies" can no longer be applied to bills emerging from this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Marshall speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-26.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I commend Senator Marsden on her remarks. As a member of the Social Affairs Committee, she is a welcome addition. The knowledge she has brought with her as a result of her involvement in the Ontario Committee on the Status of Women, contributes a great deal to the work of our committee.

Coming from Newfoundland and having been a member of Parliament for ten years, I can understand her concern for those three women, all aged 62, who fall into different categories. I am sure that, if she were to visit Newfoundland, she would encounter many women in that unfortunate position. However, these women could not be included because of the problem of financing. This problem has existed over the years not only for the present government but for other governments.

I have appealed on many occasions to governments to include those 80,000 people who are not now included and who should be.

Senator Flynn: Is it only women or both men and women?

Senator Marshall: Single men and women.

Senator Flynn: They want to lower the age to 60?

Senator Marshall: It is hoped that, with a better economy, more people can be included, including those Senator Marsden and I wish were included.

Senator Bonnell, who, unfortunately, is not here today, asked several questions to which I now have answers. He asked, out of an estimated $50 million in War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance benefits, how much would be saved as a result of this amendment. In regard to this figure of $50 million, he asked how it would be distributed by province. The response is that an estimated savings to the Department of Veterans Affairs would be of the order of $54 million in 1985-86 and $64 million in 1986-87. The estimated distribution of possible savings by province is not available.

However, I would like to make an observation on that question, which has to do with the fact that the war veteran who is entitled to War Veterans Allowance at the age of 60 is much better off on War Veterans Allowance because of the other benefits he gets that the OAS citizen does not. As an example, he is allowed to earn an extra $4,200 per year and is entitled to all of his drug benefits. This question would not apply because I do not think it would be beneficial for any widower, who qualifies after age 60, to go on the OAS or GIS when he is better off with WVA.

Another question asked by Senator Bonnell referred to how many of the new 85,000 spouse's allowance beneficiaries will be in receipt of Canada Pension Plan benefits. The answer is that it is estimated that approximately two-thirds of the 85,000 new spouse's allowance beneficiaries are in receipt of a surviving spouse's benefit under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan.

He also asked how much the provinces would save as a result of this amendment. Under the CAP, the federal government shares with the provinces the cost of financial assistance and social services provided to persons in need. Federal and provincial costs, under the Canada Assistance Plan, may decrease as much as $30 million.

His last question was: How will the 85,000 spouse's allowance beneficiaries be distributed by province? Based on the current distribution of spouse's allowance beneficiaries, the response is as follows: Newfoundland, 3,200; Prince Edward Island, 800; Nova Scotia, 4,500; New Brunswick, 3,900; Quebec, 26,000; Ontario, 24,000; Manitoba, 4,200; Saskatchewan, 3,900; Alberta, 5,400; British Columbia, 8,800; Yukon, 100; and Northwest Territories, 200.

Honourable senators, I thank both Senator Marsden and Senator Bonnell for their interest and for their input regarding this bill.

I believe we should now be prepared to complete the debate and pass this bill because of the need to pass on its benefits to those who will qualify.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FISHERIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Fisheries Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the second reading of Bill C-32, which proposes a number of very necessary changes to the Fisheries Act, one of Canada's oldest acts, extending back to the early days of Confederation.

Bill C-32, as most honourable senators will be aware, was the subject of many hours of debate in the other place over a period of nearly four months. It was the subject of a very extensive debate at the second reading stage and underwent even more intensive scrutiny during committee discussion, with one marathon session lasting right through the night. This bill was also discussed during seven days of hearings by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of the House of Commons in the course of visits by that committee to various communities on the west coast. And, of course, the bill has already undergone pre-study by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

The amendments proposed to the Fisheries Act in Bill C-32 are essential to the effective management of Canada's fisheries. Recent court decisions have called into question the government's traditional power of allocating fish to particular users so as to protect their supply. These amendments reaffirm this management authority for the immediate future and otherwise clarify the scope and intent of the act.

The amendments also refine the federal government's management practices. They will give fisheries officers more flexibility to make on-the-spot openings or closures, in response to local conditions. In another important change, the amendments recognize the role in fisheries management of consultation with user groups.

And finally, honourable senators—and this is a revelation which arose yesterday—we are being asked to approve these amendments only through the remainder of this year and the year 1986. This was arrived at by agreement yesterday in the other place. The government intends, during that time, to review more thoroughly the provisions of the Fisheries Act and to put forward further legislation. If we should fail to do so, the Fisheries Act will revert in 1987 to its former wording.

As I have indicated, honourable senators, there has been much debate on this bill. The minister, in his wisdom, and with the agreement of all parties, has agreed, as I have mentioned, that the amended act will extend only through the remainder of this year and the year 1986.

The clarification of the scope of the act is of vital importance. The government must have the necessary authority to manage the fisheries, not only to protect and conserve the resource but also in the interests of fishermen, plant workers and communities that rely on this resource for their livelihoods. There is a clear relationship between sound fisheries management and the social and economic health of these communities.

Apart from the time limitation, the amendments in Bill C-32 fall into two categories. The amendments contained in clauses 1 and 2 clarify and confirm the scope of the Fisheries Act and are made in the interests of clear expression and adequate definition. For the most part, they merely confirm what most people assumed the Fisheries Act said. It has only been since two recent court decisions have come down that there has been any doubt. The second category of amendments deals with the workings of management.

Let me first speak to the first category, those clarifying the scope of the act. Honourable senators, the Fisheries Act was passed in 1868, and except for changes made in the 1970s to permit the protection and management of fish habitat, it has remained almost untouched for 117 years. Not surprisingly, parts of the act are now obsolete. New needs and issues and more complicated management decisions have arisen that could not have been foreseen by those who drafted the act in 1867. As a result, the definitions supplied in the act do not always reflect the realities of modern fisheries management.

At present, the definitions for "fish" and "fishery" are too narrow. The amendments expand the definition of "fish" to include the larvae of fish and portions of fish, as well as marine plants. This will enable better control of fish processing conducted at sea and will allow seasons to be set for the harvesting of marine plants.

In the case of "fishery" it is confined in the present act to gear and fishing area. The fisheries management and the federal responsibilities for it are much broader. They include, for instance, the inspection of fish, the licensing of vessels, and the prescription of fishing plans that differentiate between user groups. The ability to accomplish this is essential in maintaining order in the fishery, and the amendments confirm the federal government's authority to do so.

The next amendment is in clause 2 of the bill. As the act has been interpreted by one judge of the Trial Division of the Federal Court of Canada, the Minister of Fisheries and

[Senator Marshall]

Oceans has the power to manage the country's fisheries only for reasons of conservation and protection of the resource. However, as we know, fisheries management necessarily involves management with additional goals in mind. If one managed for conservation only, vessels and fleets could come from anywhere in the country to take away local supplies of fish.

As honourable senators well remember, Canada's 200-mile zone came into place not just for conservation but to ensure the availability of a supply of fish and an income for the coastal state's own fishermen.

By the same token, many regulations within Canada have protected the supply of fish for a particular area or a particular fleet. Fisheries management is for the benefit of fishermen, plant workers, other people in the community, and the country as a whole. It is important that the act recognize that fisheries management is aimed not only at resource goals but also at social and economic goals. Clause 2, which creates a new "purposes" section in the act, remedies this shortcoming and makes it clear that the act is intended to provide for management of the fishery in all its dimensions.

At this point it is perhaps appropriate that I draw the attention of honourable senators to two changes in clause 2 from the wording contained in the original amendment. In clause 2, the new section 2.1(c) sets out the minister's responsibility for the socio-economic management of the fishery. In response to opposition representations, this paragraph now provides that the government will reflect the interests of user groups on the basis of consultation with those groups. The amendment reflects existing policy. Extensive consultations already take place on fisheries management, and this government is strengthening the regional consultation mechanism on both coasts. Of course, the minister also has to answer to Parliament and to the voters for his actions.

● (1640)

For those reasons, honourable senators, the government had some doubts about the necessity of spelling out any consultation requirement in the act. But sufficient representations were made that the government decided to give consultation a place in the act. After all, we do believe in it. We believe that this amendment reflects both our concern for the citizens who use the fish, and our co-operation in dealing with Parliament.

Secondly, section 2(1)(d) has been reworded to read as follows:

To provide for the proper management and control of the inland fisheries of Canada and subject to the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces, for the allocation of those fisheries.

This revised wording more clearly delineates the respective roles of the two levels of government, and thus more accurately conveys the original intent of this paragraph of the bill.

On another aspect, some representatives of native groups who appeared before the House of Commons standing committee expressed concern that there was no explicit recognition in the bill of native rights or the native role in the fishery. On this point, it should be made clear that under the Constitution Act a process has been established in consultation with aboriginal people and the provinces with a view to defining aboriginal and treaty rights; and it is in that context, and not through amendments to the Fisheries Act, that such rights will be defined.

Furthermore, existing aboriginal and treaty rights are already protected by the Constitution, which takes precedence over all statutes, including the Fisheries Act.

However, in view of the concern that has been expressed, the government has added at report stage a qualifying clause—it appears as clause 4 in the bill—which explicitly states that nothing in the bill shall be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal people of Canada.

This has been done to make it crystal clear to native peoples that there is no attempt on the part of the government to alter their rights through the passage of this bill. It is worthwhile adding that at no time has this been the bill's intent or purpose.

I would like now to pass to the second category of amendments, namely those in clause 3 of the bill. Rather than affecting the scope or definition of the act, they affect the actual workings of fishery management.

The essence of good fisheries management is control. To avoid overfishing, we must be able to turn fishing effort on and off, and we must be able to do it quickly—because if we are too slow, weak stocks can be wiped out.

As the act is currently written, fishery officers now have on-site authority to open and close large areas to fishing. But to open or close sub-areas, they must obtain an order in council, and that is a slow process. By the time the order in council comes through, the need for it has passed. So the officer on the spot—he is the fishery officer—really is left with only one option, aside from letting the fishing continue, and that is to close the entire area. That could mean that fishing is prevented in parts of the area where the stocks are not endangered.

Clause 3 of the bill gives fishery officers the authority to open or close portions of a management area and to vary the size and weight limits of the fish that can be caught. This provision will allow more flexible site specific management throughout the country.

For the Pacific coast, this amendment has special urgency. Besides improving management of the Pacific coast commercial salmon fishery, it lets us meet our commitment under the Canada-U.S. salmon treaty. The treaty, ratified by Canada and the United States in March of this year, calls for a coastwide management plan, under which Canada and the United States will restrict catches selectively, by species, area and gear; and for Canada to honour this commitment in future years, it must rely upon the management powers specified in the bill.

These management powers will be welcomed not only in connection with the treaty, but also by fishery managers across the country, including those who work for provincial governments and to whom authority is delegated under the Fisheries Act.

As I have noted, these amendments will apply only for this year and in 1986. Again, this time limit emerged as a result of representation by opposition members in the other place. But we recognize that it provides an opportunity for a fuller review of the Fisheries Act and further working out of the means of consultation, which Parliament may then spell out more fully in legislation. Meanwhile, these amendments allow us to get on with the urgent business of managing the fisheries.

In summary, I am confident that the amendments proposed to the Fisheries Act are of benefit to all Canadians, and I hope, indeed I know, that I can rely on the support of this chamber in agreeing to them as expeditiously as possible.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I do not expect to speak at great length, because I was heading for the showers when suddenly I was asked to use baseball parlance, pinch-hit and to become the designated hitter in this debate.

I believe that we can support the principle of the bill and the amendments, including some of the rhetoric which I understand makes good speeches but, I am told by my legal friends, makes bad laws.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would be remiss in not welcoming the new senator, our colleague from New Brunswick, Senator Simard.

I had the opportunity to read tributes made at what I was going to describe as the end of a career. I must say that his opponents were quite generous in wishing him more peaceful moments in this house than in the forum where he used to be heard.

I understand now why on the evening of September 4 last, when we spent a few hours together on a television program, he smiled on leaving the studio. This is no longer a deceptive smile, since the announcement was made a few days ago. We greet him and extend to him our heartiest welcome.

[English]

Honourable senators, Bill C-32 follows upon a court decision and the powers of the Minister of Fisheries to regulate as to time, place and particularly as to fleet type, seem to have been put in jeopardy.

I must confess, as one who has exercised the powers of the Minister of Fisheries for a number of years, that the one word that describes them is the word awesome. Yet to contend with all of the problems of the industry—even with the very real and great powers that have existed since Confederation—we felt that as late as the 1977-78 period we had to go back to Parliament and ask for additional powers to protect the fish which were still eggs in the spawning grounds.

In fact, one has to look at the origin of the Fisheries Act, going back to the very beginnings of this country, to understand that the Fathers of Confederation had an extraordinary understanding and knowledge of the particular problems of the fishery; and I might say that I wish some present day judges had as much understanding of biology as they had in those days. There is no doubt that without an understanding of the peculiarities of fish, it is very difficult to have a public debate which is fully enlightened.

In fact, I remember one very great adviser with whom I worked, a very reputable and knowledgeable man—Joe Carton, who was legal adviser to the Department of Fisheries for many years—always warned me, “Never open the Fisheries Act unless you have to, because the lawyers do not understand what it is supposed to do.” With all due respect to the lawyers of this house, I have found over the years that many of them have been confused as to the peculiarities of the fisheries.

● (1650)

Senator Frith: Most fishermen do not understand lawyers, so the comment is a fair one.

Senator LeBlanc: Perhaps I may be allowed to give a land-based comparison to illustrate the point. Let us assume for a moment that our public parks were turned into public gardens in which people could grow vegetables and small fruit; manned, cared for and cultivated by our municipalities, but open to the citizens to take vegetables or fruit when they wanted to in the quantities they wanted with whatever equipment they preferred to use. I suggest that a battle would result and that in the end human greed would have done away with an interesting idea but an unmanageable one unless there were very strong powers in reserve to make citizens behave.

I am worried about Senator Marshall's statement that in a year and a half the Fisheries Act will be fully reviewed. I suggest that if the government intends to go this route it should do so with great care, and that it take all the time necessary to understand the problem and to educate itself and that it allow the managers on the scene who are trying to regulate the fishery full scope in explaining the peculiar problems they face. I suggest that the amendments in this bill are essential and are required immediately. Without them there would be serious concern, as we heard during our recent tour of the Atlantic provinces, over a possible breakdown in the management of the fishery.

The powers required by the minister are improved as a result of the amendments contained in this bill. However, I would caution the minister and this government, which seems to have elevated consultation to a mythology with its own momentum, to be extremely careful to respect provincial jurisdictions and to go no further. I worry about the tendency of this government to give provincial ministers added authority which is presently held by the federal minister. I have been painted as “Mr. Ugly” because I refused to be co-operative and helpful to provincial ministers who were pressed, for example, by their Ministers of Tourism to increase the number of salmon licences in an almost unlimited way. We must remember reality, particularly as it relates to fish that travel along the coasts of several provinces. Imagine for a moment the salmon which swims by Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and ends up in a Quebec river. I suggest that if we were to allow each provincial minister to take a slice, there would be nothing left for the spawning grounds. The minister must read carefully the history of the act and understand its interpretation. He must not give in to the temporary popularity of delegating some of his authority to his provincial colleagues.

There are provincial jurisdictions in freshwater areas which are beyond dispute. I suggest to the minister that the popularity he achieves will evaporate as soon as he has to say no to one of his provincial colleagues. He will find that the fishermen will not forget such action, and that perhaps he has not discharged his duties with regard to the fishery, over which he is charged by law with full responsibility. I worry that this consultation process, although it is successful on the west coast—and I give full credit to my former colleague, the Honourable James McGrath, who was instrumental in organizing the minister's advisory group there—will be instituted on the east coast. To think that you can marry one consultation process with a large number of species which are as different as oranges and apples—probably more different—and I am thinking particularly of scallops, salmon, lobster, herring and cod—into one great process is naive. That is what I refer to as the rhetoric contained in this bill. For example, there is at the moment a great debate and a great issue surrounding the crab in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The people involved with this one species must understand that nobody will win it all, and that in the last analysis there is one referee, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of Canada, and he is charged with powers bestowed upon him by Parliament.

When competing and conflicting groups realize that there is one person beyond whom the buck cannot be passed, they will sit down together at the table and try to arrive at a consensus. They will know that Parliament has given the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the final power to conserve and preserve our fish.

This bill introduces an amendment which confirms the minister's power to allocate fish between competing groups, between competing fleet types and between competing regions. Perhaps it is one of the most pessimistic developments of the past few years that increasingly we are seeing a provincial definition of what is basically a Canadian resource that simply happens to be living near the coasts of this or that province at a particular time of year. Let me give you an example. If we were to allow total freedom as to time and place in the fishery, the stocks that live in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on which thousands of fishermen depend could be wiped out in January or February by the large fishing vessels off Sydney because that is where cod schools and the whole cod stock, this critical mass, assembles. I use that example to illustrate that the minister must have all the powers necessary to arbitrate in these cases.

I commend the minister for bringing forward the amendments contained in this bill because they gave Parliament an occasion to reconfirm his powers. I worry about some of the eventual interpretations flowing from the Bill of Rights in that they may curtail or limit the minister's power to regulate the fishery. However, if that were to occur, I am sure that this house and the House of Commons would be ready to act.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should say at the outset that I know nothing about the fisheries.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: Nor am I a member of the committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: I am not qualified in any way to comment on the merits of this bill. However, there is one aspect of it that I drew to the attention of the committee, and I would like to discuss it this afternoon.

● (1700)

I must remind my fellow senators that on February 26 a motion, which I had moved some two years and nine months before, was approved by the Senate. That motion provided that the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments could examine the subject matter of bills to ascertain whether or not the regulation making power in those bills infringed upon a cabinet directive that was passed back in 1981, originally proposed by John Turner when he was Minister of Justice in 1971, and that had been followed all those years. I will read part of that cabinet directive. In fact, I am going to be doing a fair amount of reading this afternoon, because I want to get certain things on the record. Of course, the minute I say I am going to start talking about regulations everybody starts to yawn.

This cabinet directive states:

In the preparation of proposals for legislation, departments and agencies should observe the following principles respecting regulation-making powers:

(1) When bestowing the power to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority, care must be taken to ensure that the statute is not couched in unnecessarily wide terms.

(2) Specifically, certain powers are not to be granted unless the Memorandum to the Cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically requests authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that is sought. These powers include the following:

I will refer to only three of those mentioned:

- (a) power to make regulations that might substantially affect personal rights and liberties;
- (b) power to make regulations involving important matters of policy or principle;—
- (f) power to subdelegate regulation-making authority.

Bill C-32, as we have heard, was enacted really because of a decision of Judge Collier, and it provided, which is rather unusual, a specific purpose clause. Section 34 of the Fisheries Act, which deals with regulation—making powers, says:

The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Act and in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations.

Then it lists various ones. The result of putting in a specific purposes clause in the bill was that it greatly widened the regulation making power of the government, and in fact was a contravention, in the opinion we got from our counsel, of the cabinet directive.

This was drawn to the attention of the committee by the counsel on regulations, and I therefore appeared at several meetings of the committee and drew the committee's attention to that fact. At the second meeting I went to there was a legal opinion given by Mr. Tousignant, the Assistant Deputy Minister, to the effect that I was wrong, that it did not widen the regulation—making powers, that they could still only make regulations with respect to the specific items listed in section 34. In answer to that testimony I said to him, "All right, if that is true, although I know you cannot speak on behalf of the minister, will you ask the minister if he will give an undertaking that he will not pass any regulations using the increased regulation—making power which I say he has and you say he has not? In other words, we will find out whether he is willing to give that undertaking or not."

At this point I am going to read into the record the correspondence that I had with the minister. First of all there is the minister's letter of May 7, 1985, addressed to me:

I understand from the officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans who participated in the Senate "pre-study" of Bill C-32 that you have expressed concern with the breadth of the Bill's "Purpose" clause and the scope of the regulation-making powers that would be provided to the government under the amended Fisheries Act. I understand as well that you have sought, in response to these concerns, a formal undertaking from me that I would confine myself to proposing regulations only for the specific purposes enumerated in Section 34(a) to (m) of the present Act.

Let me underline at the outset that I fully appreciate your concern that the introduction of a general statement of purposes into the Fisheries Act should not expand the Minister's regulatory powers through simple inadvertence. I do feel, however, that the broad terms of the "Purpose" clause accurately describe the extensive and complex responsibilities with which the Minister is charged. I also believe that the powers provided to the Minister in the Fisheries Act as amended are necessary to meeting those responsibilities.

From time to time, it has been suggested that some formal or informal limitation is required on the discretionary powers, including regulatory powers, conferred on the Minister. While I am sensitive to the concerns that give rise to such proposals, I maintain that the scope of Ministerial discretion is dictated by the need to provide effective, flexible, responsive management of a highly volatile resource. Without access to the full range of these powers, a Minister cannot be asked to bear responsibility for the proper management of that resource. At the same time, I think it is crucial that there be adequate safeguards against the arbitrary or capricious exercise of those powers, through a requirement for ex post facto accountability to Parliament for discretionary decisions. I believe that the operations of the Parliamentary Standing Committees and the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments provide the necessary check to the exercise of Ministerial discretion, particularly in light of the opportunities now available to MPs to question the Minister when they scrutinize Annual Reports and other departmental documents. I hope that these explanations will serve to allay your concerns with the provisions of Bill C-32.

To that letter I replied on May 9 as follows:

Dear Mr. Fraser:

I have your letter of May 7, and I must say that the explanations do not serve to allay my concerns with the provisions of Bill C-32.

In the meeting on Tuesday, March 26, 1985, the following exchange took place with Mr. Pierre Asselin, Director of Legal Services of your department:

"SENATOR GODFREY: Is it usual to have a 'purposes' clause in acts?

MR. ASSELIN: No, it is not.

SENATOR GODFREY: And when one combines the 'purposes' clause with the enabling clause, there is no area that isn't covered in terms of the making of regulations.

MR. ASSELIN: That is correct.

SENATOR GODFREY: Ten years from now something might crop up that could be pulled in under the 'purposes' clause. Under this clause, ten years from now you could be making regulations in respect of how fishermen should build their houses.

MR. ASSELIN: The regulation-making power would always be subject, of course, to our constitutional jurisdiction over fisheries.

SENATOR GODFREY: Yes. Did you do this deliberately so that you would have the widest possible regulation-making power, or was your mind turned more in other directions?

MR. ASSELIN: I do not believe we thought of it in those terms. We thought of it in terms of trying to modify the act so that it would reflect current practices in administering the fisheries. The Fisheries Act is an antiquated piece of legislation and one which does not reflect what is currently being done in terms of administration.

SENATOR GODFREY: But you have chosen a method which has this incidental effect, an effect that you had not considered."

In the meeting of April 2, 1985, Mr. Louis Tousignant, Assistant Deputy Minister, Policy and Planning of your department, took a completely different position when he stated "the purpose clause confers no additional authority. The regulations to carry out the purposes of the act have always been required to fall within the 13 paragraphs of section 34, to which Senator Godfrey referred last time. Indeed, the legal adviser to the Privy Council Office often has rejected proposed regulations which, notwithstanding that they may have been within the general concerns of the act, have been found to be not specifically authorized by one of the 13 paragraphs of section 34. Simply stated, if there is no explicit authorization there will be no approval. This serves to demonstrate that the purpose clause does not in fact enhance any power not already specifically created."

[Senator Godfrey.]

The following further exchange took place:

"SENATOR GODFREY: It is my understanding that the purposes clause does not widen the regulation-making authority—that is the position of the department—that, in effect, it has to come under the specific headings, including the new paragraph (m) of section 34. Am I right in that? Is that the position you are taking?

MR. TOUSIGNANT: That is correct.

SENATOR GODFREY: Then I have a suggestion to make. In the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee and other committees, when there has been a problem as to whether we should amend a bill, we have received an undertaking from the minister, and this has satisfied the concerns of the committee. My suggestion is that we have an undertaking from the minister with respect to this bill. Will he give us something for the record that the purposes clause will not be used to widen the regulation-making authority; that in fact whatever regulation is made will be in conformity with the position you have taken here—on which the Department of Justice has advised you—namely, that it must come under one of the specific headings in section 34."

• (1710)

Nothing could be clearer than Mr. Tousignant's statement of the department's position. Yet in your letter you have refused to give the undertaking because you do not want any limitation "on the discretionary powers, including regulatory powers." In spite of the explicit assurance given by Mr. Tousignant to the Committee, you appear to be taking a different position by your refusal to give the undertaking. Am I correct in assuming that you do not agree with Mr. Tousignant, or with the advice you have received from the Department of Justice, as to the legal effect of the new purpose clause combined with section 34? If you do not, it would appear that the Committee was misled by his evidence given before the Committee as quoted above, and that the bill in your opinion (and incidentally mine) does provide for much wider regulation-making power than he led us to believe.

I think we should have an explicit answer to my question so that the Committee may consider what action should be taken with respect to the Bill.

You further state "I believe that the operations of the Parliamentary Standing Committees and the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments provide the necessary check to the exercise of Ministerial discretion".

You seem to have been misinformed as to the powers of that Committee. It can only criticize regulations after they have been enacted. If the regulations are ultra vires, then this can be drawn to the attention of the relevant Minister, Parliament and the public. If the enabling clause has the effect of widening the regulation-making power to the extent that you apparently believe, then the Committee will have no power to criticize a regulation enacted as being ultra vires.

I received a short letter dated May 16 from Mr. Fraser, signed by somebody in his office, acknowledging receipt of my letter and saying in part:

You can be assured that I will be responding to your letter in the near future.

I mentioned to Senator Marshall yesterday that I was still awaiting a reply to my letter. Senator Marshall informed me that he had been advised by the minister that a letter had been sent to me in reply and was being delivered to me.

Senator Marshall: The office of the minister.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, the office of the minister. The letter still has not arrived. However, Senator Marshall very kindly gave me a draft of the letter which the minister was sending to me with a few corrections, and I should like to read the draft of the letter which, I presume, is correct, and if it is not, we will make the necessary corrections. It reads as follows:

Dear Senator Godfrey:

Thank you for your letter of May 9, 1985, in which you reviewed the testimony provided by departmental officials at the meetings of March 26th and April 2nd, 1985, concerning Bill C-32 and, in particular, the effect of the purpose clause on regulation-making power.

At that time, it was the department's understanding, based on past practice, that regulations would have to be confined to the enumerated heads of section 34. Following your request that I undertake to confine future regulations to those enumerated heads and prior to giving you my earlier answer, I asked that the scope and impact of options available to me be reviewed, including additional amendments to the Fisheries Act. Upon reviewing these options, I learnt from the Privy Council Office that your point regarding the introduction of a purpose clause and its impact on regulation-making powers was indeed valid.

However, inasmuch as the enumerated heads under section 34 do not include allocation for the social and economic benefit of the people of Canada, I concluded that it would be futile to pursue the amendments to the Fisheries Act if I were to commit myself not to seek regulations designed to achieve that purpose, which is central to the legislation now before the House. I therefore regret to confirm that I cannot make the commitment that you seek.

I would suggest that finally the minister came clean in that letter, although we had testimony that it was not intended when they passed the original amendments to the act to increase the regulatory-making power. Now that they discovered that it has that effect, they want to use it.

Furthermore, the cabinet directive, which I read into the record, said that if you want unnecessarily wide powers, you must write a memorandum to cabinet and get their approval on the enabling clauses of the bill. Obviously, such a memorandum was never written because they did not even know that it was having this effect until I drew it to their attention.

What concerned me about it primarily, and with the opinion that we got from our counsel, was that the result of this wide regulation-making power with practically no limit at all is that the minister or the government would never have to come back to Parliament, would never have to consult Parliament, would never have to amend the Fisheries Act in the future and they would have complete power to do it by regulation. Parliament would not have any input into it whatsoever.

However, there was a development today, which I learned of for the first time today from Senator Marshall, that there is a time limit on this bill of a year and a half, and that there will, therefore, be a review. They cannot postpone this forever and do whatever they want. I see the necessity and the merits of this bill and I understand that Senator LeBlanc and Senator Marshall say that this bill should be passed on its merits, so I am not inclined to propose, as I was so inclined before I heard there was a limitation, that it be referred to committee. It would be very interesting in the next year and a half to see what regulation—making power the minister does use. If he uses unnecessarily wide-ranging ones, in my humble opinion, then we have a good argument to restrict him when he comes back a year and a half from now and wants to amend the bill. If he does not use very wide-ranging powers, then he will have shown there is no necessity for them.

In closing, I should like to point out one thing: I do believe that this question of committees looking at regulation—making powers in bills is very important. It has been completely overlooked in the past. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry had a researcher of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament look into this bill and yet there was not one mention about the increase in the regulation—making power. It would not have come to the attention of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans at all if it had not been picked up by the counsel for the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. This proves the value of its new role. If they can draw attention to it, these things will not slip through without people noticing. I think we should make it quite clear that if in the future they try to introduce this kind of wide regulation—making power, this is the kind of measure that the Senate will not stand for and that it will dig in its heels and say no. In this particular case, I am prepared not to recommend that we dig in our heels because it is only for a year and a half.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Marshall, a question which he can deal with very briefly when he rises to close the debate. I believe he said that if this bill is enacted it will be effective for only the remainder of 1985 and 1986. Is that simply a personal commitment by the minister? I can find no clause in the bill that would cause the statute to expire at the end of 1986, but I find in clause 9 provision that sections 5 to 8 shall come into force on January 31, 1987, just at the moment that the rest of the bill will expire. I am sure that there is a good explanation. It should be on the record.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Marshall speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senators LeBlanc, Stewart and Godfrey for their comments. I cannot compete with Senator Godfrey because of his legalistic mind, and I am glad that I do not have to compete with Senator LeBlanc because he does not like legalistic minds. I always appreciate hearing his comments and observations on fisheries. He expresses an understanding so much better than I do of the complexities of the act and the frustrations of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in dealing with the provinces. I think, however, that, through the sunset clause, we have an opening by which we can deal with these measures. As Senator Godfrey suggested, we have a year and a half in which to look into all other ramifications of this act. Now that we have a fairly active fisheries committee, I believe that we can do that. I have the commitment from the deputy leader that we will be able to make some reference to the Fisheries Act and deal with it on an ongoing basis.

● (1720)

In reply to Senator Stewart, on my reading of the bill, clause 9 says that sections 5 to 8 shall come into force on January 1, 1987, at which time we can review the amendments to see whether they operate in conjunction with what we wanted.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

[Senator Godfrey.]

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill C-57, to extend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, without amendment, until December 31, 1986. This is a bill which comes before us periodically and, because the present act expires on June 30, 1985, it is evident that there is extreme urgency to pass this legislation before that expiry date is upon us.

As I am sure many honourable senators are aware, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act is intended to aid the small independent fishermen by helping to finance a number of fishery improvement projects such as purchase or construction of a fishing vessel or repairs to vessels and equipment. It is directed toward the ongoing operations of the small independent fisherman rather than the building of large, expensive trawlers.

This legislation specifies the amount that can be outstanding to an individual borrower at any one time, as well as the maximum term of each loan. It also lays down the total principal amount of guaranteed loans that may be made by all lending institutions during a lending period. That limit for this renewal of the legislation is set at $30 million.

The rate of interest on the loans under the act is set at 1 per cent over the prime lending rate of the chartered banks, and is allowed to float with the prime rate for the duration of the loan. The maximum amount which a fisherman may have outstanding under the act at any one time may not exceed $150,000 and the maximum repayment period is 15 years.

The guaranteed loans program carried out under this act provides a stable source of credit to many small independent fishermen in the absence of which such credit would not be assured from the banking community during those times when markets are sluggish. Without a program of this sort, it is quite likely that a number of small independent fishermen would be forced to look for support from large operators, which would jeopardize their freedom and their independence.

I should also like to make the point that all loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act must be secured. Security is taken in the form of a chattel or marine mortgage on the item purchased or constructed, and the lender is given a written promise by the borrower to repay the loan. Other terms and conditions are worked out between the applicant and the lender. Lenders make loans with the same care taken in the conduct of their ordinary business and use normal commercial lending practices in drawing up agreements and in servicing the loans.

Honourable senators, this is a simple bill which appears, as I have said, almost annually, and has had general all-party support in the other place. In view of the time element involved, I am sure that honourable senators will want to give it the same sort of support.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that I support the prolongation of this act. I hope that perhaps, some day, we will review not only the Fisheries Act, but also this type of program because, as one who has to answer questions about it, I recognize some of its shortcomings. I only encourage those who are more familiar with agricultural programs to compare the extraordinary modesty of this request to that of the Farm Credit Corporation.

Here I am beginning to sound like my former colleague, Mr. Eugene Whelan, so I had better sit down.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill will extend the authority of the Minister of Agriculture to guarantee loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act for the 18-month period from July 1, 1985 to December 31, 1986. This extension of the minister's authority is recognition of the importance of this legislation within the credit system of Canadian agriculture.

In these economic times, farmers, like other small business operators, must pay close attention to their books as well as to their land. The successful ones are good business people who understand how credit matters affect their operations. However, in examining government programs in the agriculture credit area, it is important to keep in mind the farm community's special characteristics. Farming's cyclical nature demands that producers have a good handle on their cash flow requirements. Farming's dependence on the weather and market prices means that producers must be highly knowledgeable about methods of stabilizing their income. The tendency—indeed, the necessity—to plough profits back into the farming operation means that, even after being in the business for years or generations, many farmers continue to require a reliable line of credit.

Finally, farming is extremely capital-intensive and, again, that has certain credit implications. In the result, it is simply not enough to recognize that farmers need credit. What they need is a flexible range of credit options. Without this, the sort of long-term planning, so important to effective, efficient planning, would be impossible. FILA provides an option to farmers, which meets a very specific need—that of the intermediate-term financing to cover capital expenditures.

● (1730)

The act, itself, introduced some 40 years ago, authorizes ministers of agriculture to guarantee against losses on term loans made to farmers by chartered banks, Alberta Treasury branches and other designated lenders. Producers are able to have several outstanding loans under this program to a combined ceiling of $100,000. The maximum repayment period for loans to cover the purchase of additional land is 15 years, while for all other purposes the term is 10 years.

Since its introduction in 1945, the act has been amended several times, primarily to effect further lending periods. Just to give some idea to honourable senators of its impact on the farming community, since the introduction of the act, until the end of last year, about 1.9 million loans have been approved totalling in excess of $5 billion. This reflects a sizeable capital investment in the agricultural sector. During the same period, $17 million, that is, a fraction of less than one per cent, was paid in claims, of which $2.8 million was subsequently recovered. I think honourable senators would agree that that is not a bad record, and I think farmers, generally, are a very good credit risk.

I might also point out that, prior to the introduction of the act, lending institutions were reluctant to extend intermediate-term farm credit. However, during the years following the program's introduction, lending institutions came to recognize that farmers are, indeed, good risks. As a result, numerous banks and other lending organizations have entered the field with their own programs for intermediate-term farm loans. In this sense, FILA played an instrumental role in expanding the number of farm credit sources open to farmers as well as raising the level of intermediate credit available to them.

I am sure all honourable senators have noted with satisfaction the declining trend in interest rates. This trend with interest rates, if it continues, will be favourable news for farm producers who took out, or who plan to take out, guaranteed loans through FILA. The ceiling on loans made under this program is equal to the prime lending rate of chartered banks plus one per cent. Therefore, as our economy improves, and interest rates reach even more favourable levels, this program will become all the more attractive.

A few statistics might help to further illustrate the significance of FILA to the agricultural sector. In calendar year 1984, in excess of 12,000 loans were guaranteed under the program, amounting to $159 million in loan capital. These loans were made for a variety of uses, the bulk of them, $105 million worth, went toward buying agricultural implements. The remainder funded such things as the construction or repair of farm houses and buildings; land purchases; land improvements and irrigation; livestock purchases; and equipment overhauls.

While producers in every province have benefited over the years, historically, western Canada has depended most heavily on the program. In 1984, for example, loan capital guaranteed to producers under the act in the four western provinces amounted to more than $133 million. That amounts to 83 per cent of FILA's total during that year.

Honourable senators may feel that this 18-month extension to FILA is relatively short; however, there is a good reason for that. The Minister of Agriculture will be using this time to review the act to ensure that it is meeting current needs. If necessary, changes will be introduced at the end of the extension period. Among other things, he is interested in examining whether this program could operate in combination with Farm Credit Corporation programming.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I suggest that we would be acting in the interests of Canadian farmers by supporting the quick passage of this bill, and I urge honourable senators to do so.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Will the honourable senator take a question? Perhaps I misunderstood him. Did he say that the interest rate ceiling would be 1 per cent over prime?

Senator Balfour: The interest rate is fixed at 1 per cent over prime, floating with the prime rate.

Senator Sinclair: Is that the ceiling?

Senator Balfour: Yes.

Senator Sinclair: What is the floor?

Senator Doody: It is something under the fixed rate.

Senator Balfour: Unless the credit institution is prepared to grant credit on more favourable terms.

Senator Sinclair: So, there is no floor.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, we on this side of the chamber are prepared to pass this bill quickly through second and third readings. It is a one-paragraph bill that extends the existing provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act for 18 months, or until December 31, 1986.

However, I am surprised that there is no indication in this bill that, when the extension period of the Farm Improvement Loans Act is up, something will be done about the tremendous debt service charge problem which farmers all across this country face. I say that because here we have an opportunity to deal with that problem. The government of the party opposite levelled all kinds of criticism in the past and made all kinds of promises as to how they were going to come to grips with agriculture programs, but, when we get to the point where the bill is before us and some changes could be made, no changes whatsoever are made.

I heard Senator Balfour, who introduced this bill for and on behalf of his party and, therefore, the government, say that the reason the time frame is 18 months is because they want to review this matter, and that that is a relatively short period of time. I can tell him that that is not a relatively short period of time. This bill is always reviewed at relatively short periods of time so that the government can, indeed, introduce improvements to accommodate more adequately the requirements of the agricultural community from time to time. This is like so many other things: It is a postponement of coming to grips with one of the great problems of this country. Perhaps a portion of the problem existed before the government changed—at least, that was the basis of the campaign in which Senator Balfour was involved when great ideas were expounded to improve agriculture generally. He received a lot of support, especially in western Canada, for those arguments.

What have we seen since? A steady deterioration in the agriculture community. Beef is dropping in price every day. This government is directly responsible for the difficulties of the pork industry because, of course, this is as a result of our so-called improved relations with the United States. They have imposed countervail on pork in many areas. We never had those kinds of problems until this government came into office. The price of grain is declining every day.

Senator Balfour: Huh!

Senator Olson: I hear Senator Balfour say, "Huh." He has not been listening to the farmers in his area. He does not need to take my word for it that farmers are having severe debt problems because this government refuses to take any action, but postpones everything.

As an example, a speech was made in the other place yesterday by a member of the government, Mr. Gordon Taylor, from Bow River in southern Alberta. I quote from page 6170 of the House of Commons Debates where he said:

It is not only the financial difficulties which are facing our farmers, many of whom I am not sure are going to survive until 1986. They have high interest rates and foreclosures threatened by banks. In addition, farmers in my riding have winds, drought, grasshoppers and cut worms to contend with. The increased costs of production are becoming so high that many farmers are almost ready to give up. They do not think they can make it.

That is one of your own members. Who are you going to listen to? You apparently say "Huh" when I talk about these things. Well, ask some of your own members from the prairies if their constituents on the farms on the prairies are happy with the credit policies that this government is bringing in. And here you have an opportunity to amend one of the most important acts that farmers have used over the many years since 1945 when it first came in. Yet, there is nothing in it at all. No changes at all. One little paragraph to extend it for 18 months—as though there were no problems out there at all. And your own members are telling you that the farmers are wondering whether they can survive for another year.

• (1740)

One of the most devastating components of farming costs is, of course, the debt service charges. But there is nothing done in this bill in that respect. I ask you, when are you going to do something about it?

The other point that I think is important is: Are the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the FCC, the Farm Credit Corporation, two of the targets that this government is going to use to achieve the $50 million reduction that the Department of Agriculture is going to have to absorb? Because that is what the Minister of Finance says.

I keep asking these questions and I get absolute stony silence from members opposite. When Senator Flynn was leader, we at least used to get answers. They weren't very good answers, but at least he would reply. All Senator Balfour said to me when I raised this question in relation to the crop insurance program was: "Well, if you don't like the answer, that's your problem."

Well, I am going to make it my business during the summer to let the farmers in western Canada know that the spokesmen for the party that is in office now take their problems lightly indeed: "Well, if you don't like the answers, you can lump it"; or, "It's your problem." Well—

Senator Walker: Whoever said that?

Senator Olson: That is what Senator Balfour said yesterday, or the day before.

Senator Frith: You can look it up.

Senator Olson: That is what he said, and Senator Flynn seemed to think that that was an appropriate answer. I think that is too bad.

Senator Flynn: It all depends on who it is directed to.

Senator Olson: There is another matter that we would like to hear about when we are talking about things like this, and that is, what is this government going to do to maintain the competitive position of farmers, and particularly those on the prairies, when we know that the United States has announced a $2 billion support program to assist U.S. farmers in exporting their grain surpluses out of that country? Absolute silence from this government as to what it is going to do to meet that challenge.

There is nothing we can do about it now, and I do not intend to hold matters up any longer; but I can tell you this: The senior citizens of this country have finally gotten the message about how this government can betray them, break its promises, and do exactly the opposite to what it promised. The farmers are starting to realize that, too. By the end of the summer, it is going to be serious enough that I hope that the members opposite will carry the message to their colleagues in caucus so that something can be done about this extremely serious problem.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 12 of our rules, I must now leave the Chair, unless there is unanimous agreement that we stop the clock.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I think we have about 10 or 15 minutes of business left on the order paper. If honourable senators are agreeable, perhaps we can look in the other direction for a little while.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand that, just for today, the clock is running quite fast.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Balfour speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on the motion for second reading, I wonder if I might clarify something with respect to a question posed by Senator Sinclair.

Senator Sinclair inquired about a floor interest rate. I want to make sure that he understands that the moneys are advanced by lending institutions and not by the government.

Senator Sinclair: I understand.

Senator Frith: It is a fixed rate, then?

Senator Balfour: No, it is a floating rate. It floats to 1 per cent over prime.

Senator Sinclair: I am just looking for that surge of confidence I used to hear about so that rates would go below prime.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I do not intend to respond in detail to the political rhetoric of my colleague, Senator Olson—

Senator Frith: Again, there is no answer!

Senator Balfour: I was interested to hear that he intends to spend some time visiting farmers in western Canada. I cannot speak for Alberta, but he had better not identify himself as a Liberal when visiting farms in Saskatchewan—

Senator Olson: You haven't been there for a while.

Senator Balfour: Oh, yes I have; I was there last weekend. Senator Olson was a member of the government that, for 16 years, allowed farmers to labour under interest rates as high as 21 per cent. That is what ran them all into the financial difficulty that they are now in with fixed mortgage rates.

Senator Frith: I must say, you fellows don't take criticism very well.

Senator Roblin: We like to stick to the facts.

Senator Balfour: With those few remarks, honourable senators, I close the debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR MESSAGE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a message from the House of Commons requesting that a special joint committee be appointed to consider Canada's international relations.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, item No. 10 has been on the order paper for some time. It was deferred originally because of some budgetary sensitivities. I think those have now been resolved. Certain good offices have been offered to try to pry the money from the government to finance these joint committees, committees in respect of which we have little or no control.

With that in mind, I would ask that the Senate consider favourably the following motion:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider Canada's International Relations;

That the document entitled "Competitiveness and Security: Directions for Canada's International Relations", tabled in the Senate on May 15, 1985 (Sessional Paper No. 331-383), be referred to the Committee.

That the Committee consider and report upon the issues discussed in the above-mentioned document and make recommendations in their report concerning the objectives and conduct of Canada's international relations;

That five Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Committee;

That the Committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have the power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from time to time as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff;

That the Committee have the power to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the required staff accompany the Committee;

That a quorum of the Committee be seven members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever four members are present, so long as both Houses are represented.

That the Committee submit an interim report on Canada's participation in research on the Strategic Defence Initiative and on Bilateral Trade with the United States no later than August 23, 1985;

That notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the Senate is not sitting when an interim or final report of the Committee is completed, the Committee shall report its findings by depositing its report with the Clerk of the Senate and that it shall thereupon be deemed to have been laid upon the Table;

That the Committee present its final report no later than May 31, 1986; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

The pertinent paragraph is as follows:

That five Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Committee;

I understand that the committee will have a total membership of 17, with 12 from the House of Commons and five from the Senate. It is planned that this committee will meet during the summer recess. It has undertaken to present an interim report on Canada's participation in research on the strategic defence initiative and on bilateral trade with the United States no later than August 23. Obviously, it is important to have this motion passed by both houses so that the committee can be constituted, and I commend the motion to honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Wood, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barrow, for the adoption of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs (Report of Commissioner—1984), presented in the Senate on 29th May, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this item was stood for the same reason that item No. 10 was stood, that being a budgetary problem. Again, it involves a joint committee. The matter has been referred to the Internal Economy Committee. The government has undertaken to try to do its best to provide us with the necessary funding to allow this committee to carry on its very important work in conjunction with the other place.

● (1750)

I would like to see the necessary steps taken to consider this matter debated and that the committee be allowed to get on with its work.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we support this motion. Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, may I say that this motion was originally spoken to by Senator Davey, its sponsor, on May 14, which is almost six weeks ago.

I have mentioned to Senator Phillips that it is hoped that he will make his speech either today or tomorrow.

I wish to advise honourable senators that we on this side would like to see this motion dealt with and go to a vote before the house adjourns for the summer.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I will be happy to discuss the motion tomorrow. I have had my notes ready for some time. I have delayed my remarks on a number of occasions because I wanted the sponsor of the motion to be present in the chamber when I spoke; and I have had difficulty in arranging to have him present on a Wednesday or Thursday.

Senator Frith: I will score a point on that one.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Dalia Wood, rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 11, 1985:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of a group of Canadian Parliamentarians to the Federal Republic of Germany at the invitation of the President of the Bundesrat, from May 17 to 24, 1985.

She said: Honourable senators, may I say that because of the time restriction I have shortened my prepared speech by approximately six pages. Therefore senators will have only the bare bones of my report.

I had the pleasure to participate in a delegation to the Federal Republic of Germany. The delegation travelled to Germany during the month of May, 1985, in response to the invitation of Dr. Lothar Spaeth, President of the Bundesrat. The original invitation had been issued by a delegation of the Bundesrat during its official visit to Canada in June, 1982, and re-extended by the two succeeding Presidents of the Bundesrat. The visit proved to be the first opportunity for the Canadian Senate to accept the invitation.

The Canadian parliamentary delegation was led by our Speaker, the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, and the following persons comprised the delegation: the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, the Honourable Maurice Riel, the Honourable Dalia Wood, the Honourable Heath Macquarrie, Mr. Lloyd Crouse, MP, Mr. Frank Oberle, MP, Chairman of the Canada-Germany Friendship Group, and Mr. John Reimer, MP.

The delegation visited and met with officials from three state governments, the Berlin House of Representatives, three municipal governments, and the federal government in Bonn. In addition, meetings and discussions were held with the Canada-Germany Parliamentary Group, and six groups of business leaders and spokesmen at the Nuclear Centre in Obrigheim, Heidelberg Technology Park, the Messerschmitt-Bolkow-Blohm GmbH Company in Ottobrunn, the Berlin Centre for Innovation and New Business, the Axel Springer Publishing House in Berlin, and the German Association for Industry and Trade in Bonn.

The discussion throughout the trip of political issues of a general nature included: congratulations to Prime Minister Mulroney on his 1984 election victory; review of bilateral and multilateral issues amongst western allies, and between East and West; the question of support for President Reagan's SDI proposal; strengthening of Canada's NATO role in Europe; the FGR government's concerns over the situation in Nicaragua; and the prospects for reunification of East and West Berlin, and eventually East and West Germany.

At a more specific and detailed level of political discussion, the topics most thoroughly considered were the arrangement for the two houses of the German federal government, the Bundestag and the Bundesrat, to resolve disputes in the event of an upper house veto; and whether the German institutions' experience in these matters had any applicability to the Canadian situation.

In particular, all bills, including bills which require the consent of the Bundesrat—those with financial effects on the Laender, approximately half of all bills submitted—are submitted to the Bundesrat before being introduced in the Bundestag. The Bundesrat committees then assess draft bills from a variety of perspectives, and propose changes where appropriate. Usually draft bills are returned to the Bundestag either with no objections, or with modifications that the cabinet can accept. In the case of an outright rejection by the Bundesrat, or of a refusal by the cabinet to accept the changes, a joint committee of both houses is responsible for resolving the disagreement. The activities of the Mediation Committee composed of members of both chambers are fairly heavy when there are different majorities in the two houses. Since 1983 there has been no appeal to the committee.

The Chairman of this Joint Mediation Committee, Dr. Dieter Posser, gave a background of the history of this committee, noting some of its successes and failures. The Canadian delegates expressed a strong interest in the functioning of the committee and its legal and constitutional precedents. Some interest was also expressed in the possible transfer of some of the principle to the Canadian parliamentary system. Unfortunately, due to a vote in the Bundesrat, the discussion session ended early, leaving many of the questions needing further consultation.

During the meetings and discussions with German business leaders and spokesmen, the matters examined were: the German nuclear industry and the pricing of Canadian uranium; Canadian-German consultation on SDI contracts; the prospects for co-operation between Europe and North America on future technology developments; Canadian markets for new German industrial products; whether extending credits to Poland actually may have hindered rather than helped the situation of most Poles; the recent exit from Germany of many guest workers which opened up jobs for young West Berliners; the better business climate in Canada as a result of the change of FIRA to Investment Canada; the desire of German investors to increase their investments in Canada; the recognition that some investment restrictions will remain to protect Canadian jobs and industries; the concern that increasing Canadian ties with the U.S.A. might preclude some German investment opportunities in Canada; the prospects for resumed European imports of Canadian seal pelts; and the necessity of a speedy settlement of the Grand Banks fishing dispute so that joint Canadian-German fishing and fish processing efforts can resume.

As well as the political and economic visits and discussions, opportunities were provided for an appreciation of German cultural and historic features. These included excursions to Hornberg Castle, Heidelberg Castle, Charlottenberg Palace, as well as to the Reichstag and Checkpoint Charlie in West Berlin, and Lake Tegernsee in the State of Bavaria.

Mention should also be made of the cordial hospitality which the delegation was shown by the many German officials during the trip.

The delegation's trip was a definite success because it provided: a better knowledge of the German political system; encouragement for German investment in Canada; and a higher profile of Canada in Germany due to the media coverage of the trip. Funding for more such delegations in the future would undoubtedly be useful.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH THE COUNTRIES OF THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICAREPORT OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

1. As a western industrialized nation, Canada has a deep interest in the stability of the Middle East and is concerned that a major international confrontation should not erupt from the several conflicts which persist in this volatile region including the Arab-Israeli dispute, the continuing turmoil in Lebanon and the Iran-Iraq war. (Page 6).

2. The Arab-Israeli Conflict

In the Arab-Israeli dispute, Canadians like others face the difficult task of assessing an issue based on two interpretations of deeply-rooted historical experiences. The problem is exacerbated because both sides appear to have right, or an element of right, on their side. This report frequently records opposing perceptions held by the parties involved in the Arab-Israeli dispute as these are important if one is to understand the positions which each has adopted. (Page 7).

The hearings and the Sub-committee's travels in the Middle East have convinced the Committee that there can be no resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute until there has been agreement on how to accommodate the Palestinian people while at the same time ensuring the security and legitimacy of Israel. Palestinians are too numerous, too articulate and determined, too well-connected to the rest of the Arab world to make it possible for Israel to come to some agreement with its Arab neighbours that would ignore the Palestinians. (Page 9).

By early 1985 there were a series of developments which rekindled hopes for the peace process in the Middle East. Yet there still are many serious problems delaying the peace process. (Page 46).

There are certain steps, in the Committee's view, that the parties centrally involved could be encouraged to take that could advance the peace process: (Page 53).

- a) Restraining the harsh rhetoric

The Committee recognizes that even with some forces for moderation on both sides, the gulf between the two remains very wide. It has not been helped by the use of strong rhetoric by the protagonists which makes accommodation almost impossible. Restraint on both sides could help calm the suspicions generated by years of bitter conflict. It is to be hoped that the softening noted in 1985 of the earlier harsh tones of rhetoric of the two main contending parties will persist, thereby easing the path to the bargaining table. (Page 54).

- b) Curbing of terrorism and violence

Curbing of terrorism would be an important way to improve the atmosphere. Acts of terrorism against Israeli citizens still occur and groups within the PLO claim credit for them. The Committee has already, in its meetings with PLO representatives, strongly urged that it formally commit the organization to reject the use of terrorism. (Page 54).

Violence against Arabs in the occupied territories by Israeli extremist groups has also been a problem. The Committee has noted that the Israeli government has taken action to stem anti-Arab violence by Jewish extremist groups in the occupied territories. (Page 54).

- c) Easing of restrictions

Another important move that could improve the atmosphere and that could help lead to a more normal political process in the occupied territories would be to allow some of the former West Bank and Gaza Palestinian leaders now in Jordan to visit and talk to their people. Because Egypt and Jordan have long been advocating an easing of restrictions in the occupied territories, such increased mobility could help bring about the establishment of more normal relations between Israel and Egypt and a gradual improvement in relations between Israel and Jordan. (Page 55).

d) Halting of settlements

A most valuable action to diminish frictions in the West Bank would be the halting of Jewish settlements. During the seven years of the Likud government, nearly 100 new settlements were established in the occupied territories. In the Committee's view, the Canadian government should continue to urge Israel to end, not just freeze, settlement activity in the West Bank and Gaza. In the Committee's opinion the reversibility of settlements would be feasible but only as part of an overall political agreement in which Israel would undertake responsibility for the removal of the settlers from the settlements. (Pages 55 and 56).

e) Palestinian representation in negotiations

Since the Arafat-Hussein agreement in early 1985, Jordan and Egypt have been attempting strenuously to form a delegation comprising Palestinians acceptable to Israel so talks could begin. The Committee is persuaded that it is in the interest of the Palestinian people to take advantage of the opportunity for participating in negotiations by proposing moderate non-PLO Palestinians as their representatives as soon as possible to join the Jordanian and Egyptian negotiating body for the first stage negotiations under the Camp David Framework Agreement. (Page 58).

f) Mutual recognition

It is evident that, ultimately, negotiations can only proceed if both sides accept the existence of the other side. The Arabs will have to deal with Israel as a firmly established state and the Israelis will have to admit that Palestinians have a right through centuries of residence to a part of historic Palestine, namely the West Bank and Gaza. But both sides are making the commencement of negotiations more difficult. (Page 58).

The Committee suggests to the Canadian government that it urge the two sides to set aside these ultimate objectives of mutual simultaneous recognition and to see what practical arrangements can be worked out. If both sides were able to find mutual benefit through a series of smaller agreements, the formalization of their undertakings could eventually bring with it the mutual recognition that each considers important. (Page 58).

g) Israel's security and the West Bank

Israelis have a special and understandable concern for their security. The Camp David Accords provide for the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces, a redeployment of some Israeli forces to specified security locations and "arrangements for assuring internal and external security and public order". (Page 59).

If the principle of demilitarization of the West Bank were to be accepted by the Palestinians and the Arab states and endorsed by the international community, it should be easier for Israel to agree to withdraw its forces. Such an arrangement should be for the longer term and it would be important that it could not be modified by any of the parties directly concerned without international agreement. (Page 59).

h) An international peace conference on the Middle East

President Mubarak of Egypt has suggested that once an agreement has been tentatively worked out between those directly concerned, an international conference might then be called including the United States, the Soviet Union and the three other permanent members of the UN Security Council. Such a second stage conference could confirm the arrangements made at the earlier negotiations among those primarily concerned. It would recognize the fact that the Soviet Union has influence and interests in the Middle East, an acknowledgement which would be important in encouraging a wide Arab acceptance of any peace settlement. Moreover, the Soviet Union is in a position to help improve the atmosphere in the Middle East by exerting a moderating influence on the Syrians and on some elements of the PLO. (Page 60).

3. Jerusalem

Jerusalem is undoubtedly the largest of many obstacles to some kind of settlement in Palestine. While the issue cannot be avoided, it should not be taken up unless progress has been made in finding accommodation on other less intractable problems. (Page 62).

With regard to Jerusalem, the Committee considers that Canada should continue with its present stance. This should include not recognizing Israel's unilateral annexation of East Jerusalem and opposing actions by Israel to alter the status of the city. Nor should Canada give any signals that it is prejudging the outcome of negotiations by moving the Canadian Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. (Page 62).

The Committee suggests that, when the problem is eventually discussed, the Canadian government might urge some kind of special status for the holy places of Jerusalem. (Page 63).

4. How Canada should relate to the PLO

The Committee heard a substantial amount of testimony on the question of whether Canada should or should not recognize the PLO. After weighing all the evidence, the Committee concluded that Canada should continue its present policy of not recognizing the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. (Page 67).

Canada has close diplomatic relations with Israel and the capacity to make its views known to Israeli officials. But communicating Canadian views to the Palestinians and encouraging the disparate Palestinian community to moderate its positions and to be ready to work out practical accommodations with Israel requires being in contact with PLO officials, since that organization clearly speaks for most Palestinians. Accordingly, the Committee recommends that Canadian government contacts with the PLO continue at their present level and frequency. (Page 68).

5. Golan Heights

Along with East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights ranks as perhaps the most difficult question in the Arab-Israeli dispute. In the Committee's opinion, it would seem that the problem of the future of the Golan Heights should be left to a later round of negotiations. Until some progress has been made and more confidence prevails between those who are party to the Arab-Israeli conflict, the differences over the Golan could block all attempts to resolve disputes in the area. (Pages 68 and 69).

6. Lebanon

The current problems of reconciliation and reconstruction facing Lebanon are immense. Given the intense internal rivalries, the central Lebanese government must move extremely carefully. Tragically, an end to the turmoil in Lebanon is not yet in sight. For the many Canadians of Lebanese origin, the process of restoring peace and unity to Lebanon is of major importance. The Committee is appalled by recent events in Lebanon and is watching developments with compassion and concern. It supports any efforts the Canadian government is able to make to promote Lebanon's territorial integrity. (Page 73).

7. Iran and Iraq

During this study Committee members were concerned as to what constructive role Canada could play, if any, in the Iran-Iraq situation. The Canadian government has appealed to both parties to end the conflict and urged them to make use of the good offices of the Secretary-General. Canada has strongly supported his mediation efforts in this war. After hearing testimony on this subject, the Committee concluded that, beyond this, there was little that Canada could do. (Page 77).

8. Canadian Peacekeeping in the Middle East

In general terms, the Committee has concluded that Canada's contributions to peacekeeping operations in the Middle East have helped to contain conflict in the area. It is a role for which Canada is well qualified, and represents an effective use of its armed forces. The Committee therefore believes that Canada should consider seriously future requests to contribute units to peacekeeping forces which may be established in the region. (Page 86).

a) UNTSO: The United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization

The Committee recommends that the government support any international effort to strengthen UNTSO so that it could, on relatively quick notice, be available to monitor arrangements which might be made to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute. UNTSO has been effective in observing points of confrontation in the Middle East and has helped to maintain channels of communication. It is not costly and its long experience and continuous mandate could be a major advantage in terms of speed and effectiveness of response. (Page 82).

b) UNDOF: The United Nations Disengagement Observer Force

This UN peacekeeping operation on the Golan Heights impressed Committee members as being effective, properly planned and executed. Both Israel and Syria appear to agree that UNDOF is the best solution to the problem until a settlement of the area is reached. The Committee recommends that Canada continue to contribute to UNDOF. (Page 83).

c) UNIFIL: The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon

Unless the Lebanese government were to acquire greater stability and authority following the Israeli withdrawal, the Committee doubts that UNIFIL will be able to carry out its mandate effectively. In these circumstances, the Committee considers that the Canadian government should be extremely cautious about agreeing to contribute to any expanded role for UNIFIL in southern Lebanon. (Page 85).

d) MFO Sinai: The Multinational Force and Observers in the Sinai

The Committee agrees with the government's acceptance of the invitation to Canada by Egypt and Israel to participate in the Sinai peacekeeping force. The Committee considers, however, that the government should take care that it obtains a clearly stipulated and accepted fixed term for its commitment in this force. Canada would not wish to find itself again in the same situation as it is in Cyprus and where it would be faced with difficulties and controversies if it were to decide to terminate Canada's peacekeeping participation there. (Page 86).

9. Diplomatic Representation

a) Syria is the one major country in the area with no resident Canadian diplomatic officers. The Committee recommends that the government establish an embassy in Damascus with a resident Ambassador. (Page 89).

b) The Committee views as unfortunate the state of Canada-Iran relations. As a condition to normalization of diplomatic relations, Iran continues to demand an apology from Canada for assisting U.S. embassy personnel to escape from Iran, a request that Canada quite correctly continues to refuse. (Page 89).

In the interests of removing the handicap to Canadian businessmen of having no official Canadian presence in Tehran and with a view to enhancing bilateral trade and commercial relations, the Canadian government should continue to seek the normalization of its relations with Iran. (Page 90).

c) The Committee suggests that the Department of External Affairs review the length of postings for officials to Middle East and North African posts with a view to extending the normal two-year length of posting to three or four years. It takes time to understand the culture, customs and procedures of the countries of the area. (Page 90).

10. Trade

a) Trade between Canada and the Middle East and North African countries has been growing but not as quickly as hoped. With a few exceptions, the results of Canadian export efforts in the region have been meagre. To break into these markets requires hard work and a long lead time with frequently little to show for the effort. Nonetheless the Committee is persuaded that the Canadian private sector and the Canadian government cannot turn their backs on the opportunities, albeit limited, which exist there. A country as dependent as Canada on foreign trade, should pursue, with energy and persistence, the trade these markets could represent. (Pages 90 and 91).

b) In respect to trade promotion, it was interesting to learn from business witnesses that ministerial visits to North Africa and the Middle East, including two prime ministerial visits, were judged to have given important support to sales efforts. Expansion of exports is also assisted by several government programs. It is important that ministers of the Crown continue to make official visits to countries of the region and that a substantial part of their departmental programs for these countries be devoted to trade promotion activities. Nor should visits to the region by parliamentarians be overlooked. Their contacts in these countries can be influential in furthering Canadian interests including those in trade and cultural fields. (Pages 94 and 95).

c) The Committee hopes that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will continue to appoint officers specializing in trade to this area. It is important that the general foreign policy concerns of External Affairs not subordinate the important trade component of Canada's interests. (Page 95).

d) Boycott demands introduce an element of uncertainty into business transactions, an element that businessmen would prefer to avoid, particularly since the practice varies from country to country. Moreover, boycott and anti-boycott pressures are unwelcome and undesirable to Canadians. For Canadian companies, these boycott demands are a cause of uneasiness and constitute something of a constraint in doing business in that part of the world. (Page 102).

e) The Committee urges the government to consider adopting the proposal set out in its recent Export Financing paper to expand and modify significantly the use of the mixed credit program and that it should be administered by the EDC. At the same time, the Committee urges the Canadian government, in implementing more aggressively this mixed credit facility, to look to Jordan as a country in which to "seek out new business under a more relaxed project selection procedure." (Page 105).

f) The Committee is convinced that the provision of educational services both in Canada or abroad to students of the area, not only constitutes valuable export sales in themselves, but can be regarded as a useful, albeit long-term, component of Canada's trade policy. (Page 94).

11. Development Assistance

The Committee considers that the present emphasis on Egypt as a core country for Canadian development assistance should be maintained. (Page 98).

The Committee considers that growth and stability in the West Bank and Gaza will be important for future peace in the area. The Committee recommends that the Canadian government and CIDA revise their policy toward the West Bank and Gaza and classify these territories in a way which will make them eligible for direct development program assistance and that CIDA put increased emphasis on support of non-governmental agencies working in this area. Particular attention should be given to Gaza because of the extremely crowded conditions, its large youthful population and its need for intensive development projects. (Page 110).

12. Immigration

Since Canada is prepared to take refugees from the Middle East and the quota is not being filled, the Committee recommends that the Canadian Government give its immigration officials a special, pragmatic and flexible authority to deal in a humanitarian manner with Palestinian individuals or families wishing to come to Canada. If necessary this could be handled under Ministerial discretionary authority. (Page 115).

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

JUNE 26, 1985

The Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Introduction

1. In accordance with its Order of Reference from the Senate dated Wednesday, March 27, 1985 and its Orders of Reference from the House of Commons dated Tuesday, March 20, 1984 and Tuesday, March 26, 1985, your Committee has examined the 1983 and 1984 Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.
2. Since February 5, 1985, the work of the Committee has comprised 15 public hearings. We have heard testimony from key witnesses such as the Commissioner of Official Languages, the President of the Treasury Board, the Secretary of State, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and representatives of linguistic minority groups. We also heard from one expert. At a further stage in our hearings we questioned several departments and Crown corporations (the Department of Public Works, Canada Post Corporation, Air Canada) on the findings of the Commissioner's 1984 Report. The purpose of the initial meetings was to familiarize the Members, many of whom were either newly-elected or sitting for the first time on the Committee, with overall official languages policies and programs and with the federal institutions responsible for implementing them, as well as with the needs of official language communities. After completing this initial phase of its work, the Committee turned its attention to examining the 1984 Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages.
3. The present report contains the Committee's preliminary observations and recommendations with respect to priorities for action arising out of its discussion of the Commissioner's Report. The Committee strongly affirms the need for a renewal of linguistic reform. In our view a strategy of concerted government action is required in order to ensure the full and vigorous application of the Official Languages Act and the linguistic provisions of the Constitution Act 1982 by all federal institutions. Beyond legal compliance, we also believe it is necessary to ensure that official language minorities are afforded substantive protection and support through the concerted action of all governments and, wherever possible, the private sector.

I. THE ROLE OF FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS

Improved Coordination and Accountability

4. Your Committee believes that more overall direction is needed in the coordination of federal official languages policies and programs. We note the recommendation in the Commissioner's 1984 Report: "Government should consider bringing co-ordination of federal policies and programmes in the field of official languages more substantively within the purview of the Privy Council Office." Shortly thereafter, the Prime Minister announced in the House on March 27, 1985 that a committee would be formed of deputy ministers and senior civil servants under the auspices of the Privy Council Office. This committee was set up at the end of April, and given a mandate to study the Commissioner's recommendations and propose possible amendments to the Official Languages Act. The new committee consists of deputy ministers and senior civil servants from the Treasury Board, the departments of the Secretary of State and of Justice, and the Federal-Provincial Relations Office, under the chairmanship of a senior official in the Privy Council Office. In response to this undertaking,

The Committee recommends that: (a) the committee of deputy ministers and senior officials created within the Privy Council Office in April 1985 be established on a permanent basis; and (b) that it be given a mandate to develop medium-term plans for the systematic compliance by all federal institutions with the terms of the Official Languages Act and the linguistic provisions of the Constitution Act 1982.

5. In carrying out their administrative duties, deputy ministers and heads of institutions are in a position to have a direct influence on the application of language policy, particularly as regards language of service, language of work and equitable participation. The achievements of senior officials in this area are in principle an element in the annual appraisal of their performance. However, your Committee believes that greater and more specific accountability is needed. Accordingly,

The Committee recommends that the appraisal process for deputy ministers and heads of federal institutions include an annual evaluation of their performance on the basis of specific official languages objectives.

Amendments to the Official Languages Act

6. In light of the 16 years of experience with the Official Languages Act and the new situation since the coming into force of the Constitution Act 1982, your Committee believes the opportunity should be seized to carefully review all of the provisions of the Act. In particular,

The Committee recommends that the government, in studying possible amendments to the Act, take note of the recommendations of the previous Special Joint Committee in its Fifth Report; and that consideration be given to embodying within the Act provisions enabling the federal government to coordinate more effectively its official languages activities with those of the provinces and the private sector.

Future of the Official Languages Program

7. Your Committee is convinced that there is much room for improvement in the ways in which the bilingual capacity of federal departments and agencies is currently determined and utilized in order to meet statutory and other obligations. The Committee therefore endorses the government's decision to conduct a thorough review of official languages policies and programs and of the most effective means of their implementation. As part of that process,

The Committee recommends that the government present its proposals for reform of federal official languages administration to Parliament by April 1, 1986 and that these proposals be referred to this Committee for further study.

8. In carrying out its overall review of government programs, the government has in general maintained the budgetary envelope for most official languages programs. Your Committee is concerned that no cuts be made which would jeopardize the continued progress of linguistic reform. Therefore,

The Committee recommends that the budgetary envelope for all official languages programs be maintained, and that savings that might be achieved through greater efficiency at the federal level be applied within the area of official languages.

The Court Challenges Program

9. Since 1978, the Department of the Secretary of State has sponsored through its Human Rights Directorate the Court Challenges Program. This program has provided funds to litigants seeking court rulings on constitutionally guaranteed language rights, including, since December 21, 1982, the equal status of the official languages and minority language education rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Your Committee is of the opinion that the program is invaluable in promoting the linguistic rights of Canadians, particularly those who are members of linguistic minorities, and that government support and funding should be continued. Your Committee is also aware that the Government of Canada, through the Department of Justice, may find itself as an opposing party to an action brought by a litigant funded by the Court Challenges Program and therefore is of the opinion that primary responsibility for administration of the program should remain with the Department of the Secretary of State. In light of the above,

The Committee recommends that the Court Challenges Program be reconfirmed and extended with an assurance of adequate financing, and that the administration of the Program remain the responsibility of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Serving the Public

10. Your Committee is strongly of the view that, before any determination can be made regarding the presence or absence of "significant demand" federal institutions should undertake actively to offer service to the public in the language of their choice. Accordingly,

The Committee recommends that the government adopt an explicit policy of active offer of service and that all federal institutions be required to monitor and evaluate the impact of this policy.

The Role of the Private Sector

11. Your Committee believes that government action to encourage and assist the private sector to serve Canadians in either of the official languages has fallen far short of what is possible. Accordingly,

The Committee recommends that the government review all aspects of this question and develop a comprehensive plan covering:

- a) the systematic inclusion, monitoring and enforcement of official languages obligations wherever private contractors are judged to be providing a public service to Canadians on behalf of the federal government;
- b) official languages requirements for national non-government organizations who receive federal funds;
- c) the possible imposition on para-public and federally-regulated organizations in the private sector of official languages obligations that are consistent with serving Canadians in either official language; and
- d) a sustained program to promote the voluntary acceptance of basic guidelines for bilingual service among all major enterprises that have dealings with both official languages communities.

II. SUPPORT TO MINORITY OFFICIAL LANGUAGE COMMUNITIES

Joint Federal-Provincial Action

12. Your Committee is convinced of the urgent need for a comprehensive framework of federal-provincial cooperation to defend and support official language minorities. Therefore,

The Committee recommends that:

- a) the government convene a federal-provincial conference for no later than the fall of 1986 to present proposals on an ongoing plan to respect and enhance official-language minority rights;
- b) the government immediately begin bilateral discussions with each province to develop cost-sharing plans in order systematically to assure services in the minority official language which are appropriate to that province.

Manitoba Language Rights Case

13. The Supreme Court of Canada recently ruled, in the federal reference case concerning language rights in Manitoba, that the statutes and regulations of that province that were not printed and published in both English and French are invalid and that they are of no force and effect. The Manitoba government and legislature are to be afforded a minimum period of time to comply with the linguistic requirements of the Constitution, during which the laws will be deemed to be temporarily valid. Your Committee recognizes both the past injustice of the failure to respect the constitutional requirements and the urgency of the present situation. Accordingly,

The Committee recommends that the federal government give strong support to the government of Manitoba in order that it may comply with the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada within the shortest possible delay.

III. FURTHER ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE

14. Your Committee has already recommended in its First Report tabled in both Houses on May 29, 1985 that a sub-committee be authorized to carry out a series of public hearings and consultations in a number of centres across the country to determine how individuals and groups view the future development of institutional bilingualism in a multicultural Canada.
15. Your Committee is also aware that there are a number of aspects of the Commissioner's 1984 Report which the Committee has not had time to examine in detail, (for example, language of work and equitable participation, the National Capital Region, language training programs, official languages in education, etc.). We will deal with these aspects as our schedule permits. Our present observations and recommendations are made in the spirit of urging a renewed commitment to the enterprise of linguistic reform. In particular, we are asking the federal government to give more coherent direction to official languages policy and programs and to provide an example of linguistic equality in action.

Respectfully submitted,

DALIA WOOD,
Joint Chairman.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, tabled the following report:

Thursday, June 27, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to presents its

THIRD REPORT

On April 2, 1985, a suggestion was made by the Honourable Senator Godfrey that your Committee examine three matters: (i) allowing senators to comment briefly on the speeches of other senators (ii) allowing senators to make brief statements prior to the Orders of the Day and (iii) granting to committees the power to initiate enquiries through the automatic referral of annual reports by departments.

In accordance with Rule 67(1)(f), your Committee agreed to consider these matters and held meetings on May 28, June 18 and June 25.

Your Committee reviewed the practices now in place and concludes that, with respect to all three matters, the current application of the Rules of the Senate is satisfactory and that no formal change in Senate rules of procedure is required.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

[English]

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to thank you for the courtesy of allowing me to proceed now. My comments will be very brief because I know that we have a great deal on the order paper.

The third report deals with three suggestions brought up by Senator Godfrey in questions to me on April 2 in my capacity as chairman of the committee. The three questions dealt with rules that have been accepted in the House of Commons—changes that were made some time ago as a result of a recommendation of one of their committees. The first dealt with allowing other senators to make brief comments after an honourable senator ceases to speak on a bill or a speech on any subject for that matter. This rule in the House of Commons allows members a ten-minute period in which to speak without, in fact, having to ask questions.

The second one was allowing senators to make a brief statement at the beginning of the session each day. The relevant rule in the other place is the one-and-a-half minute rule whereby members can speak on matters of their own choosing.

The third one was sending to committees reports of all government departments and crown corporations as they are tabled in the Senate, referring them automatically to committees, thereby allowing committees to do any studies they wish without a direct reference from the Senate.

The committee looked at these three questions in depth. At the request of the committee, I spoke to the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, the House Leader in the other place, to see how these rules were working there. We obtained, as well, some statistical information on how frequently the rules were used.

The first two—that is the ten-minute comments at the end of speeches and the one-and-a-half minutes of comment at the beginning of the session—are used regularly in the other place. I was told by the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn that they have, in fact, been very good rules, that they have substantially improved debate in the other place, and that so far as they are concerned they are quite happy with them. However, on looking at the rules and looking at the procedures in the Senate, recognizing that we do not work with any kind of time allocation in any case or at any time, that our rules are extremely flexible at all times, that in reality senators control themselves, that there is no attempt to order too closely the procedures, and that in fact the system was working well, the committee's recommendation is that a change was not necessary, so the proposal was not proceeded with.

On the third item, the automatic referral of reports, the first indication from the other place was that this had not been working particularly well, that it was not being used, that the committees apparently had ample work before them without having to use this procedure. I am told that more recently it is coming into use, but it is still, let us say, in the trial stages. Our committee therefore recommends that we not proceed on that matter either at this point, since again, under Senate rules and through the system of inquiries we have a very easy way of getting matters before the Senate, and we also have easy ways of getting matters referred to committees, and that in the past this has not presented a major problem.

Therefore, the committee recommends no change in the rules or procedures at this time.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSION BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT STATEMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government will be making a statement today on the question of de-indexation of pensions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I understand that a ministerial statement will be made in the other place dealing with a matter associated with the budget. I think I can say no more than that at this time.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, in view of the obvious fact that the Leader of the Government, as a member of cabinet, would be involved in any discussions leading to a revision of the budget, I wonder whether he could tell us if the government will be announcing a total or partial withdrawal from its position on de-indexation.

Senator Roblin: I must leave it to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, who is the minister making the statement, to give the details of the statement. My honourable friend will be, I am sure, fully apprised of what he says at that time.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the matters of pensions and de-indexation have been before this chamber several times. Indeed, the Leader of the Government himself made a major speech in this regard. There is a motion before the Senate at the present time on that subject. In view of those facts and the fact that we, on the opposition side, have been co-operating very carefully with the government in proceeding with the legislation, would it be possible for the Leader of the Government, in the next half hour, to ensure that copies of the statement which will be made at about 3 o'clock will be provided to honourable senators so that we will not have to go to the press to be informed of a change in government policy?

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that the Senate has been expeditious in dealing with the legislation we have recently received. I, for one, appreciate that.

I think the suggestion my honourable friend has made is entirely reasonable and I will do my best to get copies of the statement at the earliest moment and distribute them so that each senator will have one.

Senator MacEachen: I would hope that one will be available for every senator rather than one copy being made available to all of us.

Anticipating that the position which will be announced by the government will be in accord with the position taken by members of the opposition in this chamber, would the Leader of the Government also, later this day, when we call the motion moved by Senator Frith, join with us in the support of Senator Frith's motion on this matter, which will have found favour with the government and which will be, I am sure, compatible with the decision to be announced by the Minister of Finance?

Would the Leader of the Government now agree to join with us in support of this motion? The government would then know that it had the full support of the Senate in making this reversal.

Senator Steuart: It is called total surrender.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend was not listening as carefully to me as he usually does, because I said I would try to get a copy of the statement for each senator. That means one for every senator.

Regarding the intriguing proposition that he has made to me, I think we will have to wait to see what is in the statement. He can then reconsider his position at that time. I am not entirely sure—

Senator Frith: The door creaked open again.

Senator Roblin: I am not entirely sure what attitude I am going to take to his suggestion. I think I will reserve my comment until both he and I have read the statement.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, a supplementary question. May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the impending statement by the Minister of Finance in the other place about a certain budget proposal regarding the de-indexation of pensions means that the federal government will now honour all of its election pledges?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will have to wait until he sees the statement, and then he can renew his question to me; or, if he wishes to reconsider the matter, he is welcome to do so.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

REPORTED FEE FOR ACCESS TO MINISTER

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question arises out of an article in the Globe and Mail of today's date, an article headed: "Tory-owned consulting firm shows clout in Fisheries switch."

The article states that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans made a decision outside the purview of his departmental officials on the transfer of a licence for a fisherman in Nova Scotia after a meeting was arranged by a consulting firm supposedly owned by one Frank Moores and one Gerald Doucet.

Those of us from the Atlantic provinces, on both sides of this house, are well aware of the political clout of those two named individuals.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Thériault: My question is: Will the government leader in the Senate assure the people of Canada, through this chamber, that no one, at any time, now or in the future, will have to pay a fee to consulting firms in order to make an appointment with a cabinet minister at the national level?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am glad to welcome my honourable friend back. I see he is in good form and good voice. We are pleased to see him back in the chamber. I am not quite so pleased with the question. It is the kind I have learned to expect from him.

I can tell him that the government is not in the habit of charging fees to anybody for access to ministers. That is our settled policy. There is no change in that. And no one has been authorized by us to charge fees for access to ministers on any occasion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Just "not in the habit of"? Does it do it occasionally though not habitually, perhaps?

Senator Thériault: A supplementary question. I thank the government leader for his kind words to me. I want him to please ask his Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues to issue a statement, if there is any foundation to this story, to the effect that such a happening will not occur again, because this is very, very serious, if true.

Senator Flynn: If true.

Senator Thériault: Yes. As I said, my question is based on an article in the Globe and Mail—and believe you me, I do not always take for granted what I read in the Globe and Mail. I am asking the question because it has been reported in a national newspaper.

I ask the government leader to make inquiries as to whether this did or did not happen; and if it did happen, to assure Canadians that it will never happen again. I want to know whether it happened or not.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: I am not able to confirm or deny a newspaper statement because that is not within the purview of my knowledge, nor, indeed, is it part of my responsibilities. I repeat that the government, of course, does not levy a charge for anyone to see an official or a minister of the Crown. The whole idea is preposterous. What other people do is certainly something that we cannot control, but insofar as my advice would extend, I would certainly advise no Canadian to pay a five cent piece to exercise their undoubted right to meet with ministers of the Crown, and indeed, with other members of the government services from time to time as they require.

DECISION OF MINISTER RE LICENCE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my question does not refer to the matter of a threshold fee to get in through the open door; rather it refers to the decision of the minister to grant the request.

According to the newspaper story, the Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said—and this is reportedly a direct quotation from him—that the officials of the department were not prepared to agree to the application of Mr. Snarby to have the licence which was appended to the “Martin & Philip” transferred to another vessel, the “Osprey.”

Nevertheless, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was prepared to make this transfer. My question is: What considerations did the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans detect which brought him to a conclusion which was opposite to that of the officials in his department?

Senator Roblin: I must tell my honourable friend that I have not had a chance to discuss this matter with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. However, as my honourable friend will know from having read the story, that newspaper story did give a reason: namely, an allocation of fishing quota. That was one of the points in the article that dealt with which boat should be approved. It is a question of the number of fish. My honourable friend is shaking his head; he may well be right. I am attempting to recapitulate what I can remember of the story which I also had some interest in reading today.

However, I think it would be wiser for me to take my honourable friend's question as notice, because undoubtedly there are ramifications of this matter of which I am certainly not aware.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, as I understand the situation, the fact is that the second vessel was somewhat larger and consequently, if it was to be operated economically, would have to have a larger share of the available fish stock. This, I understand, was one of the reasons why the Department of Fisheries was opposed to granting the request. I think the Leader of the Government has misread the story on that point.

However, I gather from his response to my question and to Senator Theriault's question that the Government of Canada knows nothing whatsoever about any money having been charged in relation to this interview.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we certainly know now, because it has been brought up in this house and it has appeared in the newspaper and, consequently, one must assume that there is some basis for that story. If my honourable friend asks me did we know before, I will tell him that we did not know before. However, what I will do, to ensure that I give an absolutely correct reply, is consult with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, and obtain his comments on the questions that have been raised by the two honourable senators.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government. The story also mentions the Deputy Prime Minister, and states that when Mr. Fraser was asked if Mr. Nielsen had brought this matter to Mr. Fraser's attention, Mr. Fraser replied:

I can't comment on that.

That kind of quotation leads one to think that his answer, if he could comment, would have been “yes.” Could that point be cleared up when the other aspects of this matter are being cleared up?

Senator Roblin: I think if somebody asked me what conversations I had held with some colleague of mine in the cabinet, I would have given the same reply, whether I had had any conversations or not. That is not the sort of matter which one is normally expected to discuss. However, I think that when I bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the comments made by honourable senators in the house, it will give him an opportunity to make the replies he thinks are appropriate in the circumstances.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government, and it is on the same subject. The Thomson newspaper chain, desolate that it has been scooped by the Globe and Mail on this issue, has been digging all day and they claim that they have seen a memorandum from the minister to his officials saying, “I know this is going against what we agreed upon, but do it this time, will you, please?” Would the Leader of the Government check into this matter as well while he is checking into the other matters, because it appears to be an admission by the minister of having done wrong?

Senator Roblin: Of course, the defect in which my honourable friend has indulged is that he has taken a quotation from a newspaper and drawn from it conclusions which may not be warranted. I shall give him the same answer that I gave other honourable gentlemen in the chamber who have raised the point. I shall ask the Minister of Fisheries to give me his comments on the quotation. I think it would be a little premature to allege an issue of wrongdoing on the basis of the quotation we have heard.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, to set the record straight, I did not say that the newspaper has written this quotation in an article. I said that the people working for that organization claim to have seen this memorandum. It will probably appear in articles tomorrow. It is a very serious issue. I would like the Leader of the Government to include this matter in his inquiries because it is a very serious one.

Senator Flynn: If you had put the question that way the first time it would have been more objective.

Senator Guay: The leader has spoken!

Senator Gigantès: It is an absolute delight to receive lessons in etiquette—

Senator Walker: Sit down!

Senator Gigantès: —from that great expert, Senator Flynn. I hope he will long be with us and continue to give us these examples and these precepts on how to behave in this honourable chamber. Nobody does it better.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, may I suggest to the Leader of the Government that it would be helpful to receive immediate replies in this matter. Fishermen get very unhappy when they think that anything untoward is being done with regard to access to fish stocks. Now that the old age pensioners are to have an easy summer, it would be nice if the fishermen, too, could have the same, assured that nothing untoward has happened in this entire situation.

Senator Roblin: I think the fishermen will probably have one of the easiest summers they have had for some time. My honourable friend will recognize that problems with respect to the allocation of fishing rights did not suddenly develop yesterday or the day before, that they have been around for a long time. I am sure that my honourable friend, with his undoubted experience in this field, can recollect many occasions on which there have been serious differences of opinion among fishermen as to what should be done with respect to their industry. I can assure him that the present government will do its best as, I presume, its predecessor did, to deal with all those issues fairly and as expeditiously as he can.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I press my request for an urgent reply. Senator Roblin says that the fishermen using different types of gear quarrel over allocations of stock. That, of course, is obvious; we can assume that it will continue. The fishermen understand that; they are very smart people. What they find offensive is any suggestion that someone is getting a licence improperly, whether it be a crab licence, a lobster licence or, in the good old days, a salmon licence, or getting improperly the right to transfer a licence from one craft to another. I am not suggesting that there has been any impropriety by the minister in this instance. I am saying to the Leader of the Government that it would be helpful if this entire matter could be clarified within a day or two. I am sure that he could achieve that if he put his mind to it.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to hear my honourable friend's assurance that he is not making any allegation of improper conduct. That is an advance over what we have heard from some other quarters and I thank him for that observation. I can tell him that I am sure that the Minister of Fisheries and

[Senator Gigantès.]

Oceans is just as anxious as anybody else to get this matter disposed of as speedily as possible.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ALLEGED ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is based on a Winnipeg Free Press news report of a couple of weeks ago to the effect that the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board criticized the present minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board for not attending at least some or a number of their meetings after being invited. In the past it has been a practice for the minister and/or his representatives to attend meetings of the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board from time to time. I think it is a good practice because the minister hears from the farmers' elected advisory representatives and from the Canadian Wheat Board. They hear from the minister, and I think it is a very useful exchange. I wonder whether the government leader would comment on that news report. I would appreciate hearing his views. I think the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board might be well advised to attend meetings between the Canadian Wheat Board and its advisory committee from time to time.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have not seen the newspaper report, but even if I had I would not comment upon it because it is not part of my duties. I can tell my honourable friend that the Honourable Charles Mayer, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is, in my opinion, one of the most zealous ministers in the administration. If he were missing from a meeting, it would not be because of any ill-will or lack of interest, but because other responsibilities at the time had made it impossible. I suggest to my honourable friend that over time the attendance record of my colleague, the Honourable Charles Mayer, at the wheat board advisory committee meetings will be good.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the latter part of the leader's comments.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, on a point of order, we are trying to clean up our business and this man makes a speech every time he gets up. What does this have to do with the Question Period?

Senator Frith: Order.

Senator Argue: It is not the first speech that has been made this afternoon.

I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate is in a position to convey messages. He has said that the minister's record will be good. The information I have is that the minister has been to one meeting since he was appointed, that the advisers are upset, that the producers do not like it and that the word is getting around on the prairies that the current minister is ignoring the Canadian Wheat Board and is not as supportive of the marketing system—

Senator Flynn: As his predecessor.

Senator Frith: Exactly.

Senator Argue: —as they would like him to be. I would like the Leader of the Government to convey this question to the minister and to bring back to the Senate information on how many meetings the minister has attended. Has he attended more than one?

Senator Roblin: I hope it will make my honourable friend feel better when I tell him that it is my practice whenever a reference is made to a minister, whether or not it involves an answer on my part, to take the precaution of sending a copy of Hansard to the minister so he will know what is said about him. I will certainly do that in this case.

Senator Argue: Thank you very much.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Before the Leader of the Government gives us his delayed answers, may I anticipate. He said earlier that he wanted to deal with the business expeditiously. On June 12, I asked him a question concerning studies with regard to the impact of the budget. Specifically, I asked him if there had been an impact study showing the way the budget measures would affect the diverse regions of the country, an impact study similar to the impact study made of its effects on the various income strata of the population. I hope that he will give me my answer today. If he does not, will he provide it tomorrow?

● (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am afraid that I must disappoint my honourable friend. I do not have that answer today and I must tell him that I really do not expect to have it tomorrow either. That does not mean that it has been overlooked or forgotten; it will be attended to.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—FUTURE PROSPECTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 28 last by the Honourable Senator Olson respecting agriculture and the sugar-beet industry.

(The answer follows:)

Every indication is that both sugar beet processing plants in Western Canada are in good working order and have been well maintained. Department of Agriculture officials have had occasion to visit both the Winnipeg and Taber facility in the last year. The Taber Plant, especially, has recently been upgraded. A consultant's study done

2 years ago reports a sugar refining capacity in Western Canada for at least fifteen years.

In view of the investments by the parent company in these facilities it is likely in their interest to keep them operating. While growers in Alberta were unable to negotiate suitable contract agreements to grow beets for the 1985 crop, BC sugar intended to keep Taber facility open as a packaging and distribution centre.

The Winnipeg plant will be operating as it has in the past. A sugar beet crop was planted this spring in southern Manitoba, although total acreage is estimated to be down slightly.

This fall, in Quebec, la Raffinerie de Sucre du Québec (RSQ) will be in a position to refine sugar beets to the final product, granulated sugar. Previously the plant has only produced a semi-processed product which required further refining.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 28 last by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn. It, too, has to do with the sugar-beet industry, and no doubt my friend will be interested in the previous answer, as well.

(The answer follows:)

In the course of studying alternative options for a national sugar/sweetener policy, the question of other crop production will have to be addressed if the long term viability of the industry does not appear sound.

In 1968, Canada and Dominion sugar closed down its sugar processing facility due to only marginal profits. In the 1968/69 fiscal year $60 per acre based on 1967 seeded acreage of 16,193 acres was paid to producers to assist in conversion to alternative crops. The total cost of paying 765 growers was $971,632 (1968 dollars).

The federal government has no short term assistance specifically for the sugar beet producers in Alberta to advise them as to the best alternative crops to sugar beets for 1985. The decision was taken by the farmers not to grow beets this season despite financial assistance from both the provincial and federal governments, assumably because it was not in their best financial interest to do so.

The returns on sugar beet production under the agreements of the contract from BC sugar did not provide enough financial incentive for a sugar beet crop to be planted. This was a business decision taken by the farmers.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THIRD WORLD—GOVERNMENT AID

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked on May 28, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding foreign affairs, the Third World and government aid.

In spite of a reduction in funds for international development mentioned in the Budget Speech of May 23, 1985, Canada continues to be strong supporter of development assistance. The Government will honour its commitment to reach 0.5 per cent of Gross National Product (GNP) in 1985.

The dollar volume of Official Development Assistance (ODA) will be significantly higher next year than this year, despite the budget reduction of $50 million. (Incidentally budgetary reduction measures were phased over two years—$180 million this year and $50 million next year—rather than lumped in one year as the question implies.)

In addition, the ODA/GNP ratio (the internationally accepted measure of aid performance) will also increase next year, in fulfillment of the Government's commitment to reach on ODA/GNP ratio of 0.6% by the end of the decade.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked in the Senate on June 20, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding agriculture, the sugar-beet industry and the 1983 stabilization payment.

(The answer follows:)

At present, the federal government does not have the legal authority to make a stabilization payment for the 1983 crop.

In August 1984, a regulation was put through to provide for the support price of the 1982 crop. As a routine measure, officials from the Department of Justice looked at the Agriculture Stabilization Act and ruled that no provision existed to permit retroactive stabilization payments (despite past practice). According to their interpretation of the Act, a prescribed price is required to be calculated in the current crop or fiscal year.

Normally sugar beet payments are made where required after all the beets have been processed and the sugar sold, at which time the realized price can be calculated. This is often not completed until 12 to 18 months after harvest.

The 1984 crop for example is still being packaged and sold.

Although the 1982 stabilization payments were allowed, no further retroactive price support will be permitted under the present ASA. With the amendments in Bill C-25, retroactive payment will be permitted.

[Senator Roblin.]

Regarding a National Sugar/Sweetener Policy, on April 18, 1985, the Department of Agriculture was directed to develop national sugar/sweetener policy for consideration by Ministers. This study is well underway.

In conjunction with the work being done by the Department, Mr. Mayer is calling a meeting of all those interested in or affected by a change in federal government policy toward the sugar and sweetener industries in Canada. This meeting will take place July 24, 1985, in Ottawa.

In respect of the needs of the sugar beet growers to plan their land preparation and crop rotation, we hope to be in a position to announce the direction of the new policy this fall.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—ABSENCE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on March 19, 1985 by Senator Le Moyne regarding Canada-United States relations, the summit meeting in Quebec City and the absence of the Governor General. I should tell my honourable friend, in case he thinks my answer is a little curt, that we believe we answered his question on a previous occasion. That may have escaped his notice.

(The answer follows:)

The answer to this question was given on April 30, 1985.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION

REPLACEMENT OF WING COMMANDER MACKENZIE, DFC

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked in the Senate on June 19, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Godfrey regarding the Canadian Pension Commission and the replacement of Wing Commander MacKenzie, DFC.

(The answer follows:)

The Veterans Affairs Portfolio is well aware of Mr. MacKenzie's qualifications and of his distinguished Service record. Mr. MacKenzie was able to put this background to work during his term as an Ad Hoc Commissioner with the Canadian Pension Commission.

The Minister advises that Honourable Senators may be assured that Mr. MacKenzie's curriculum vitae won't be overlooked should a suitable position arise within the Portfolio.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a number of questions I have asked have not yet been answered by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since we are cleaning up business, in the words of Senator Walker, and as we are co-operating, I would hope that the Leader of the Government would attach some urgency to answering the outstanding questions that have been put by members on this side of the chamber. There are some hours—perhaps a day or more—left, and, with some push, I think that these questions can be answered.

I wish to draw to his attention two questions I have asked to which I would like to have answers before I go back to Nova Scotia. One has to do with the Sydney steel plant. Are negotiations under way between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia? Is there a proposal before the Government of Canada for the second phase of the modernization of the Sydney steel plant?

Honourable senators, that does not involve a big research job. Officials in the department of the Honourable Sinclair Stevens can answer that question very quickly.

The second question has to do with another matter on which I would like information before I leave, and that is the special tax credit for the Island of Cape Breton. That 50 per cent tax credit was in place in 1980. I want to know whether the Department of Finance has made any analysis of the impact of the credit introduced in 1980. If it has not, I think that it is shameful to recommend an extension of the credit—

Senator Flynn: You must have done it when you were in office.

Senator MacEachen:—five years later without knowing the impact it had in its former form.

I am not looking for a fight, but I am asking whether I can have that information. It is important, I think, to the government to have it known whether there is some substance to this tax proposal. I think we could get some indication from the analysis that might have been made by the government over a five-year period.

I will not ask for answers to the other questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I always hope to be as co-operative as possible in answering the questions of the gentlemen opposite. I have been on the asking end myself. I have to tell my honourable friend, however, what he also knows—namely, that if these answers were to be provided by me from my area of responsibility it would probably be easier for me to do so. As he knows, however, they come from other departments. In his view, the other departments should be able to give a quick answer. Unfortunately, that is not always the case. Take, for example, the last question asked with respect to the impact of a tax measure that was introduced five years ago. It may be necessary to do a little research in order to give a parliamentary answer to that question. I have no means of knowing, but it is certainly possible that there is quite a number of considerations that will go into the provision of a correct parliamentary answer. The departments are quite anxious to make sure that what they say is accurate and beyond challenge.

That, however, does not prevent me from doing my best to expedite his returns and that I will do. I must say that we do have a practice of follow-up of the questions for the departments which we think are a little tardy. We do our best to extract answers from them as expeditiously as possible, and we will continue to do that.

Senator MacEachen: I am sure that the Leader of the Government is alert and, from some experience, I know that departments are notoriously negligent in providing answers to the questions of parliamentarians. Oftentimes, they assign the responsibility, not to senior officials but to some person whom they may regard as unimportant—unimportant enough to deal with the questions put by members of Parliament. I know that there is always a battle in that regard, but I think that we, who are members of Parliament, have to keep pressing to try to get some action from the bureaucrats.

I am sure that some of these answers are stuck on some desk, somewhere, waiting for the attention of some senior bureaucrat who has not had the chance or the time to deal with the answer. Having understood the problem, I am as unrelenting as I used to be as a minister in trying to get answers out of the bureaucracy, which yields such answers as if they were gold for which they were mining daily at minimum wages.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is the minimum wages part that is wrong—they are not getting minimum wages; they are very well paid, indeed.

Senator MacEachen: I said “as if.”

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that I have better luck than he has because I am well aware that my questions are not fobbed off to the bottom of the “in” tray. My contacts are with a higher level of the bureaucracy than that with which he appears to have been dealing. Whether I am going to get the answers any faster, as a result, remains to be seen. All I can say is that, so far, I have been doing pretty well.

Senator MacEachen: I do not want to argue this question, but I know perfectly well that, if the Leader of the Government had the answers, he would produce them. In a sense, he has convicted himself because he has said that he does not have a lot of answers. He does not have them, not because he has bad will but because the bureaucracy is not producing them. I am referring to what I observed at a time when I was Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and had to take responsibility in that place for answers given by all departments. It was a continuous effort to get answers out of the bureaucracy. I would ask the Leader of the Government not to defend it too much on this point, because he will put his foot in the wrong place.

Senator Roblin: I am not interested in defending the bureaucracy. I have never been known as one who has been particularly—let me see—enthusiastic about the bureaucratic way of doing business. But I am interested in defending myself. I can tell my honourable friend that, if he examines the record we have set in producing answers, he will see that it is a reasonable one. I would like to say that my impression is that it is better than what was going on before I got this job, but let that stand to one side; there is no need to boast. I will simply say that I think we are producing our answers in an expeditious way. It is unfortunately the fact that answers respecting two of the points in which my honourable friend is very much interested have not yet been produced. That is not because a good effort has not been made. It will continue to be made and he will be satisfied in due course.

Senator MacEachen: Would the Leader of the Government particularly try to clean up the questions which other senators have raised over the last two days and which I have raised today? We do not want the answers on embossed paper. If he can get up and read them from the back of an envelope, we will be happy, as long as we get the information. Since we have dealt with these bills speedily, perhaps the Leader of the Government would deal with our questions speedily.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I really take umbrage at my honourable friend's suggestion that I do not. I deal with these questions speedily. Every day that honourable senators ask me questions they are not asking them in a void. They are asking me, and I am a live, sentient being, and I take note of the questions asked. I take note of them and I say to my staff— Well, never mind what I say because it is not exactly parliamentary.

● (1450)

Senator Frith: What do you say?

Senator MacEachen: Do you pound the desk?

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that his interests are in better hands now than they have ever been.

Senator Frith: The difference is that you get your bills and we don't get our answers. It is the result that changes, which is quite different.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Of course, you don't want to do that.

Senator Flynn: That is irrelevant.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Frith: You only do what suits you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to read the answer to my question of May 28? I will be leaving for the west before Hansard comes out tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to read it, although it has already been taken as read. This is the answer:

In the course of studying alternative options for a national sugar/sweetener policy, the question of other crop production will have to be addressed if the long term viability of the industry does not appear sound.

[Senator Roblin.]

In 1968, Canada and Dominion sugar closed down its sugar processing facility due to only marginal profits. In the 1968/69 fiscal year $60 per acre based on 1967 seeded acreage of 16,193 acres was paid to producers to assist in conversion to alternative crops. The total cost of paying 765 growers was $971,632. (1968 dollars).

The federal government has no short term assistance specifically for the sugar beet producers in Alberta to advise them as to the best alternative crops to sugar beets for 1985. The decision was taken by the farmers not to grow beets this season despite financial assistance from both the provincial and federal governments, assumably because it was not in their best financial interest to do so.

The returns on sugar beet production under the agreements of the contract from BC sugar did not provide enough financial incentive for a sugar beet crop to be planted. This was a business decision taken by the farmers.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, with respect to answers to questions, I would like to know whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate has learned, as a result of his inquiries, whether before the end of the session I will get an answer to my written question dated February 12 last which appears as No. 7 under "Questions". I do not need to remind him what my question is all about. However, it seems to me quite unusual that a written and detailed question dated February 12 has not yet been answered. I must add that I find this unbelievable, because the questions are quite simple and direct.

Now, if the government refuses to answer, I would like to know. If part of the answer is given, I will be partly satisfied. However, if all my questions are to be answered, I might wait a few more months. However, I would like to know what is going on.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to indicate to my honourable friend that I take his questions very seriously. He raised that point the other day. I said to myself that I did not remember that question, so I checked it out and discovered that it was a written question. The procedure followed for written questions of the nature he is talking about is quite different from the procedure followed for oral questions. Oral questions are my baby and I do what I can to answer them. Written questions go through different channels, namely, the Clerk of the house, the Speaker and to the answering authority in the other place and they are not within my jurisdiction in the same way. The best thing I can do is ask the Clerk of the house to take note of my honourable friend's distress, because he has not received his answer since last February, and find out where the blazes it is.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government for his explanation. I am glad he told us what is going on, but I do not think that as a senator I have to rely on a Senate official to know whether I will get an answer.

This question appears on the order paper of the Senate, which is under the control of the senators. For the information of the Leader of the Government, I inquired two months ago of the officials and they acquainted me with the procedure. However, the officials do not represent the government. I want to know why the government does not answer. I am not putting the question to the officials but to the minister concerned. If this is how we are dealt with here, I will be compelled one of these days to refer the entire matter of written questions to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, because I find unacceptable that a senator can be treated in this manner when he has taken the trouble to put detailed and direct questions requesting simple information. I will not tolerate such a system very long.

[English]

Senator Roblin: I recall from my experiences elsewhere that many a time and oft the members of the House of Commons, who use the written question procedure more often than we do, have been kept waiting months and, indeed, years and, sometimes their questions are never answered. Perhaps they were not very good questions and I will leave that issue aside. This is nothing new, and if my honourable friend has a complaint and wishes to refer it to the committee that he has suggested, I will welcome that action on his part.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I move that the procedure followed for written questions asked or put by honourable senators be referred to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Senator Flynn: No, that is out of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted for this motion?

Senator Flynn: No.

[English]

Senator Roblin: That is out of order.

Senator Frith: Senator Corbin has to give notice because they won't give leave.

Senator Roblin: If it will make my honourable friend feel any better, I certainly am not disposed to interfere with leave if he wants to make such a motion. It is at the wrong place on the order paper. No notice has been given and we will have to give double leave, but in terms of the substance of the matter I certainly cannot object.

Senator Flynn: The chairman is here.

Senator Corbin: I thank the honourable leader for his courtesy. I recognize that I am not proceeding in a very orthodox way, but I was responding to his invitation.

Senator Roblin: Respond in the right way, then.

Senator Corbin: I have waited months for an answer, so I can darn well wait a few more hours or a few more days and do it at the proper time. I will abide by the rules.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. I was absent from the chamber for a few moments and I wonder if the honourable leader has responded to the question I asked on June 20, which he said he would look into immediately, referring to the stabilization payment for the 1983 sugar-beet crop. He acknowledged at that time that it was very tardy in coming and he hoped to have an answer before the Senate rose for the summer recess. Does he have an answer?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, much to the surprise of some honourable senators, I have an answer. I have done my best to get my friend a prompt reply. I have read it and I hope it will be satisfactory to him.

THE HONOURABLE LOUIS-J. ROBICHAUD, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I would ask your indulgence so that I might refer briefly to a rather momentous anniversary affecting the legislative and political history of my province of New Brunswick.

● (1500)

It was 25 years ago today that an event took place in which I had a minor role, but in which one of our colleagues had a major role. A mandate to give effect to a major program of governmental and social reform in the province of New Brunswick was on that day 25 years ago given to our colleague, the Honourable Louis-J. Robichaud, and I would just like to say that he carried out that mandate with distinction.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I should like to tell my honourable friend that the date for me was June 30, 1958, and I hope that when that anniversary rolls around next year he will couple my name with that of his honourable friend.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I cannot resist the opportunity to share with Senator McElman the recollection of this important anniversary, because it followed the election of our colleague, the now Senator Robichaud, to the leadership of the Liberal Party in New Brunswick. I attended that leadership convention at which our colleague was made leader, in the company of the leader of the Liberal Party of that day, the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. Certainly the event which took place in 1960, with the new leader's election as premier of New Brunswick, was an important encouragement to Mr. Pearson and his colleagues, who at that time were in the opposition, with 48 members in the House of Commons of Canada.

Senator Flynn: How many? Not 28 members.

Senator MacEachen: I said 48 members. It is a situation which Senator Walker will recall very well.

Honourable senators, I add my voice to the voices of Senator McElman and the Leader of the Government in the Senate in recalling this important anniversary.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the third reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-58, to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-58 is a bill to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act of 1977, which is a good program. However, it is out of date. It is based on circumstances in farming crops and crop prices of almost a decade ago. Consequently, it requires some amendments to compensate for the effects of inflation.

The object of the program is to assist in orderly marketing of agricultural products in all parts of Canada. It is achieved by advancing interest-free payments to producers for storable field-grown crops prior to harvesting, and allowing farmers thus to market their crops over the full marketing season, when returns and prices are normally higher than they are at harvest time.

• (1510)

As crops are sold, for example, potatoes in Prince Edward Island, apples in British Columbia or corn or turnips in Ontario, this money is repaid to the producer organization under an agreement with the federal government. In this way, the farmer is provided with some cash from the harvest time until his product is sold, which sometimes may be up to several months.

The present maximum levels of advance payments were set in 1977. Since producers' input costs have risen dramatically in the last eight years and at a faster rate than market returns, a much lower percentage of the producers' crop is now covered. This has reduced the producer's flexibility and affects his net income. The bill is meant to correct that deficiency and to clarify some of the administrative procedures which have become rusty.

The proposed amendments to the Advance Payments for Crops Act fall into two general categories. The first group doubles the maximum advances to producers from $15,000, $30,000 and $45,000 to levels of $30,000, $60,000 and $90,000. The smallest of these three amounts is for individual producers, and the second and third amounts, which are somewhat larger, are for business organizations. Along with this, of course, the total contingent liability of the government, of necessity, must be doubled by increasing that liability to $400 million from $200 million.

The second group of amendments are, essentially, housekeeping modifications aimed at expanding the flexibility of the program by increasing other benefits to producers while improving the control of both the producer organizations and Agriculture Canada to limit defaults. These include:

(1) clarifying and expanding the definitions of who might be a buyer-broker. A large number of marketing systems exist for agri-products. Flexibility is required in the act to develop programs that meet the needs of producers; otherwise, producers tend to develop marketing systems that will be eligible under the act instead of developing systems which will maximize the benefits; and

(2) the amendments are aimed at improving methods and fairness in collecting defaults. The present system places all responsibility for collecting defaults on the producer organizations, and this includes the collection costs and the legal fees. This is an expense that is shared by all producers by means of an administrative fee so that those who have repaid their advances have to be charged additionally for the costs and expenses of those who became defaulters. The amendments will allow the producer organizations to recover the collection costs from the defaulter, and, if this cannot be done, the legal expenses will be paid for by the federal government. I should add that the legal expenses are the largest element of these costs. It is felt that the savings in interest charges on the outstanding default should offset any legal expenses that may need to be paid.

On this point, let me assure honourable senators that the level of defaults is minimal. In seven years of operation, the average default is less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. As you know, lending institutions consider 3 per cent on defaults in the agricultural sector to be very good business.

The amendments go on to clarify meanings of terms. They are also aimed at accelerating decision-making and rulings. For example, the French and English versions of the act, in some areas, are quite different, and this is being corrected; terms such as "promptly" and "undertaking" need definition to avoid conflicting interpretations; the requirements for forms and declarations have been markedly reduced; potential liability to producer organizations has been reduced from 5 per cent previously to 2 per cent resulting in a better negotiated interest rate on borrowings for the federal government by about one-half of 1 per cent. I am informed that this could amount to as much as $500,000 and up to $1 million.

Delays in introduction of programs have previously been caused by the necessity for approval by an Order in Council. This has caused some serious legal liabilities and difficulties. This is now being replaced by ministerial determination.

Honourable senators, all of the proposed amendments have been developed in concert with producer organizations who support them. They are also generally supported by other groups in the country and, of course, by our friends in the other place.

At a time when crop producers are under considerable stress from rising production costs and widely-swinging market prices—or, if you will, the cost-price squeeze—the Advance Payments for Crops Program is more important now than ever. By doubling the payment levels, we will be providing greater market flexibility and greater opportunities for producers.

The program has proven to be worthy and necessary. The 1977 model merely needs to be modernized to meet 1985 market conditions.

It is for all these good reasons that I ask honourable senators to approve Bill C-58, to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act, and I thank you for your kind attention to and your indulgence with my presentation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I am sure honourable senators will agree with me when I say that we have had a comprehensive introduction to this important bill by Senator Barootes. He has covered fully the various aspects of the bill and has clearly pointed out the reasons for its being considered to be essential and why it should be advanced through the Senate.

I have had the opportunity to peruse the House of Commons debates on this bill. They were short; it took very little time to get the bill through the other place. I believe it was only yesterday that the bill received second and third readings. It is a non-contentious bill. As Senator Barootes has said, it is really bringing up to date, in many respects, legislation that has been on the statute books since 1977.

Cash advances were pioneered on the prairies. A great debate on that subject took place long ago. It was about 1957 that cash advances for prairie grain producers first went into effect, and it was 20 years later before the rest of Canada caught up to the prairies in getting for themselves the same kind of useful legislation that had been in operation in the prairies for a long time.

● (1520)

This act is of major importance. It was first introduced in 1977 and in its first year of operation some eight organizations used the legislation. Last year, the record shows that there were some 47 organizations using the legislation, with some $190 million guaranteed under the legislation.

So, it is important. A farmer who has produced a crop covered by this legislation—and between this and the Prairie Grain Advanced Payments legislation, the great bulk of agricultural production is covered—may make an application, when that crop is produced, to the appropriate authority for a cash advance. In the past, the farmer was eligible to receive up to $15,000 by way of an interest-free cash advance, and that is increased to $30,000 under this bill.

One could have forecast that this legislation was coming. I had the honour to bring legislation forward on behalf of the previous administration to double the cash advance under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. We doubled it from $15,000 to $30,000.

I might say that in a responsibility I had a few years ago there was a great deal of pressure from individuals from some farm organizations to increase the $15,000 to $50,000. But, as I studied the situation, I came to the conclusion that the $50,000 would be available only to a very, very small percentage of agricultural producers, a kind of a top elite; and although the major farm organizations asked that we go from $15,000 to $50,000, I thought it adequate to go from $15,000 to $30,000.

I can say that the producers out west appeared to be, as far as I could tell, fully satisfied with the doubling. Going to $50,000 would have meant extra costs, with only a very, very small percentage of producers benefiting. And when the producers are very large producers, usually they can take care of themselves.

When I was putting forward this idea, there were those who said that the eastern people cannot have it; that they cannot get it in British Columbia. I can remember people saying that it would not be fair to try to get it for the prairie farmers when it is not available in other parts of Canada.

My feeling, based on my parliamentary experience, was that you do not help anybody by saying you cannot do it on the basis that only a portion of those needing help are singled out. My attitude was: If we can get it today for the prairies, we will get it the next day for the rest of Canada. And I think that that is exactly what is happening. We were able to go forward with what I considered to be a very necessary improvement a year ago for the grain producers in western Canada, doubling the cash advances available, and now, one year later, we have the rest of the country getting basically the same kind of legislation.

This is good legislation. It is not exactly pioneering legislation. It is based on something that has been there a long time. It is necessary at this time to bring the legislation up to date. I am pleased that we are able to follow, outside the prairies, exactly what was done a year ago for the prairie producers.

Those who perhaps do not have a full knowledge of agriculture may feel that the producers, with a doubling of the amount of money available by way of cash advances, are now being taken care of; but that money has to be repaid. Certainly the fact that it is interest-free is helpful, but it is not a gift. It is not an advance against a vacuum. It is an advance against marketable crops. In effect, what it is is an advance on a normal return or on the yearly return that one may get from crops that are already harvested.

Had Senator Olson been here this afternoon—and he is unable to be here—he would have used this debate as a launching pad to talk about other things. I have been around long enough to know that if somebody says you are out of order, you have time to make your point and get back in order while they are going through the process of making their point of order. One can simply say that this isn't enough by itself; that other things are necessary.

The Senate does good work. There is a lot of talk that some day we may go on television, and there are senators who are frightened that we might look bad on television. When the challenge is before us, the Senate can usually perform.

In the last couple of weeks we have had before the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee the whole question of the very, very high cost of herbicides and pesticides in this country for the agricultural producers. That is a question all by itself. The herbicide and pesticide producers in this country are rooking the farmers, hosing the farmers, in exactly the same way—and Senator Barootes would be a better authority on this than I—in exactly the way drug companies in the past were able to charge unduly high prices for drugs under patent. The move to generic drugs has had a major beneficial effect.

Our committee, under the chairmanship of the Honourable Senator Marshall—and it is bi-partisan—is looking at this whole question. We think there is room for a reduction in prices of pesticides.

Farmers out west are concerned with the bill on freight rates, which may get to the Senate some time this week. If that bill has not been changed, it will allow the CNR, in the coming year, to apply for variable rates. It does not have to prove a case for variable rates. However, the producers and the mayors of small towns and the Reeves of municipalities, and farm organizations, will have to go before the Board of Transport Commissioners to prove that damage is being done and that the railway application is wrong.

I think that is putting everything in reverse. We could talk about the whole question of lack of markets or falling markets.

[Senator Argue.]

We could talk about the failure of the government to influence the United States on the question of duties applied to Canadian hogs.

The government should protest against the way the United States is going down the road of give-aways, of subsidies in obtaining export markets for wheat. This is a very major threat on the economic horizon for Canadian grain producers.

We could join with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, for example, most of the members of which have been rather friendly to the present party in power, in their very pointed opposition to and criticism of the actions of the present government in relation to its decision to allow larger beef imports from the European Economic Community.

There is the whole question of the necessity of providing reduced interest rates for agricultural producers. Farm bankruptcies represent a major problem. Soil conservation continues to be a major problem. The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are making the question of soil conservation even more difficult because of their policies of encouraging, and almost forcing, tenants who have agricultural leases to buy those leases at high prices, thus forcing them out of beef production and into grain production.

There is the question of the credit policies on the international scene and the government's threat that the farmers who are part of the Canadian Wheat Board operation will themselves have to make a contribution to the credit policies of the Canadian government for the sale of agricultural products.

Honourable senators, it is a good bill and one supported by all members of Parliament, I am certain. It is a catching up one year later—and it is a welcome catch-up—of the increase in advance payments for prairie grain. I have used this opportunity—I hope in a constructive way—to alert the public, insofar as the Senate can alert the country, to the fact that there are many, many policies that need improvement and upgrading. It is my hope that the Senate in the future can undertake a review of some of these areas with a view to bringing in recommendations that will help solve some of these problems.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to congratulate my dear friend Senator Argue on the breadth and knowledge of this subject which he has possessed for so many years. Indeed, it is true that this is a parallel program to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Program, in which, last year, Senator Argue assisted in elevating the levels of payment. Although it is a year later, this is now applying to other crops in the rest of Canada. In other words, there are other products which require this kind of advance of payment. And there are other mechanisms which exist in government programs, with which Senator Argue is well acquainted, to assist in the production and marketing of products of an agricultural nature in Canada.

● (1530)

I must congratulate Senator Argue on the fine support that he and others have given to this program. May I also add, although in jest, my congratulations on how Senator Argue was, as a dear friend, able to bring into the debate such contentious issues as the variable grain freight rates in western Canada and a discussion about crops found mostly in eastern Canada.

Senator Steuart: I think he also talked about root rot!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY LIMITED DISPOSAL AUTHORIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Robert Muir moved the second reading of Bill C-53, to authorize the disposal of the Northern Transportation Company Limited and the forgiveness of its debt to Her Majesty and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, the Northern Transportation Company Limited was established under private ownership in 1931 as Northern Waterways Limited. It was renamed the Northern Transportation Company Limited in 1934. NTCL was then acquired in 1936 by Eldorado Gold Mines Limited.

In 1944, Eldorado Mining and Smelting was nationalized under the War Measures Act, because of its radium and pitchblende mining operations on Great Bear Lake. In 1965, NTCL acquired the assets of Yellowknife Transportation Limited, one of its competitors on the Mackenzie River. In 1972, NTCL reached a peak of over 400,000 tonnes of cargo carried. In expectation of further increases, NTCL engaged in a major capital expenditure program involving the purchase of new tugboats, barges and shore equipment.

By 1976, NTCL traffic had declined drastically, owing to the failure of the anticipated Arctic Gas Pipeline to proceed, and to reduce exploration activity. As a result, NTCL suffered financial losses.

From 1977 to 1981, NTCL recovered its financial position, which peaked in 1981 with net earnings of $4.3 million, and return on invested capital of 11 per cent. Between 1981 and the present, NTCL remained profitable, although at a somewhat lower level than the 1981 peak.

NTCL is, at the present time, a federally-incorporated company continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act. The company is the largest operator of tugboats and barges in northwestern Canada, and is the primary means of marine transportation for residents of the Mackenzie River watershed, the western Arctic and the Keewatin Hudson Bay coast.

NTCL owns Grimshaw Trucking and Distributing Limited, a trucking company operating in Alberta and the Northwest Territories. The company's marine and trucking operations are profitable, but Nortran Offshore Limited is not profitable.

NTCL was not made a crown corporation by design, but rather by accident through the nationalization of its then parent company, Eldorado. The company has never had a clearly defined public policy mandate, although the re-supply activities carried out by NTCL are very important to northern residents. There is no reason why re-supply operations must be carried out by a crown corporation, as opposed to a privately owned company. The private sector is capable of providing and is willing to provide the service required.

NTCL itself has had aspirations in the past to diversify into related business areas. These aspirations were discouraged because it was not thought appropriate for NTCL to become involved in new areas already well served by the private sector. Privatization of NTCL would free the company to pursue entrepreneurial opportunities.

This company has been a candidate for privatization several times already. In 1984, the previous government announced plans to sell this company. The process for the sale of NTCL has been public for some time, and there have been no expressions of public concern over the issue of privatization.

After a lengthy process of providing information to interested parties, three offers were received for the purchase of NTCL. The offers were evaluated on the basis of price, native/northern participation and commitment to community re-supply.

After careful consideration, it was agreed to proceed to final negotiations with the IDC/Nunasi group. This group's offer met all of the criteria set for evaluation. In addition, it presented several other attractive features, notably the fact that IDC and Nunasi represented the majority of NTCL's re-supply customers. The price offered by IDC/Nunasi is very attractive. The offering group is made up entirely of northern Inuit. The group has agreed to a binding commitment to maintain NTCL's community re-supply service. The fact that the ownership will represent the majority of NTCL's customers strengthens the degree of commitment even further.

In addition, NTCL's long-term debt to the government, currently $27 million, will be retired at closing, using cash in the company.

The closing of the deal is planned for early July. Negotiations between government officials and IDC/Nunasi are complete.

Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has examined the bill very thoroughly. At the committee meeting last evening, I was pleased to hear the comments of Senators Watt and Adams. Those two honourable senators are in a position to know a great deal about the subject matter of this bill since they are on the scene in their own particular areas, and they seem to be quite satisfied with the situation.

● (1540)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Muir: Yes.

Senator Sinclair: In clause 5 of the bill there is a write-off provision. It suggests that the long-term debt of the company was being paid off by cash from the company. Could he tell us what that has reference to.

Senator Muir: From the information we received from the officials and the minister in committee last night, the Crown will not lose any money through the deal that is to take place.

Senator Sinclair: Clause 5(1) reads:

The Minister is hereby authorized to forgive and write off, in whole or in part, any debt or obligation of the Corporation due to Her Majesty or any claim by Her Majesty against the Corporation.

Any such transaction is to be reported in the Public Accounts. If there is no outstanding debt, that is a rather unusual provision. Why is it there?

Senator Muir: From what was provided to us last night, I understand that any debts will be looked after by the purchaser, not by the government. Perhaps Senator Adams, who is sitting right in front of the honourable senator would know something about the matter, because he is very familiar with the company and he intends to participate in the debate.

Senator Sinclair: Do I understand the honourable senator to say that there is no write-off involved in this transaction?

Senator Muir: From the information I have received during talks I have had with anyone pertaining to the matter, there is no write-off.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, first, I would like to say that we on this side intend to support the bill. Senator Muir has given us a good outline of the history of Northern Transportation Company Limited. Both opposition parties in the other place supported this bill.

I think it is generally agreed by people in the north who have depended on this transportation company over the years that it was a good thing when the government became more directly involved. I agree that now appears to be the time for the government to withdraw and to let other people take it over. I understand that it will be taken over by the natives north of 60, which includes to this point the Inuit of the Central and Eastern Arctic and possibly the Inuvialuit of the Western Arctic under the Committee of Original Peoples Entitlement, or COPE, which just a year or so ago signed a land claim with the Government of Canada, and who are looking for investments and have already invested in some corporations in the Western Arctic. I also understand that the Dene Nation is negotiating in an attempt to become involved. This will be an interesting experiment because, as Senator Muir pointed out, these people from the Mackenzie Delta as far east as you can go, are the customers. This is also the area this company has served.

I think the investment is a worthwhile one and I think that it will succeed. I am sure that everyone in this chamber and throughout the country hopes they succeed. The company provides a very necessary service to the north, and if it can be provided by the people it serves, it is a step in the right direction. I think it is a good bill and we on this side support it.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question asked earlier by Senator Sinclair. First, let me thank Senator Steuart, who is familiar with the situation, for his comments. I understand that with regard to this company negotiations began with the previous government and are now going on with this government.

In response to Senator Sinclair's question, I guess I was not listening last night. It is anticipated that approximately $1.5 million of debt will be written off. The remainder of the debt will be repaid at face value.

Senator Sinclair: I note that an amendment allows tax relief for the amount being written off. Is that correct?

Senator Muir: If you are talking about the amendments passed in the other place, yes.

Senator Sinclair: In that case, I go along with what other senators have said here. I know something about this operation and it has done a tremendous job. I am sure that all honourable senators hope that the new owners will continue to provide good service and make a profit.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak for very long on this bill. I think it is a good bill. This organization supplies many communities in the north, and the people who live there understand how difficult it is to supply many of them. Though the minister could not stay for very long, he and his officials answered many of our questions last night in committee. I am familiar with the operation of this company, particularly its service to the area where I live, around Churchill, Manitoba and the Hudson Bay.

Many of the people who work the barges are from the south, such places as Ottawa. Last night the officials said that NTCL has 564 employees. These employees include captains, engineers, electricians, refrigerator mechanics, heavy equipment operators and others, all of whom are unionized. Many local people will want to become involved in the company, but they face a tough time negotiating settlements with the unions. I am sure that the Inuit corporation hopes to put some of its people to work on the barges that supply the communities. According to the officials who appeared before the committee last night, the company will be subsidized by the government for another four years, until 1989.

I am concerned about what will happen in the future, in terms of the oil exploration and activity around the Beaufort Sea. If the oil companies pull out, what will happen to the company? It also delivers to small communities, such as those around Yellowknife, Hay River and Fort Smith. Those communities are all served by highway. If there is no pipeline in the McKenzie Delta area, what happens next? My concern has to do with the land claims which have been settled, in terms of the future. Perhaps some shares should be given to the people of the Dene nation, for example, who have quite an interest in some of the oil activity going on in the McKenzie Delta area. The Inuvialuit and COPE claims must also be taken into account.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, as I said, I think the bill is a good one. Having lived around Hudson's Bay, I know that, in terms of transportation, it was serviced by the NTCL, which was subsidized by the government. That subsidization will continue for another four years. I hope that between now and four years hence we will see how well things can be operated by some small, local corporations. I hope that the future holds good things for the people of the north.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

● (1600)

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday the Deputy Leader of the Opposition requested that I be prepared to speak on this motion today. I am prepared. I have copious notes. However, I have the same difficulty in speaking today as I had on previous occasions. Senator Davey, the sponsor of the motion, is not here to enjoy his publicity. I would very much like to have him here when I speak.

I have had discussions with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and we have come to the agreement that I will adjourn the debate until the fall.

Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Phillips: That will give Senator Davey an opportunity to develop some support on his side for his motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, what Senator Phillips says is quite true. We had indicated yesterday that we wanted him to speak today and that we might be asking that the question be put today. But Senator Davey, I know, never wants to miss the enjoyment of the restrained rhetoric and elegant style of Senator Phillips. We would not want to deprive him of that enjoyment. We have an understanding that we will discuss putting the question early in the fall.

Order stands.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Peter Bosa, rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 25, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the history and aims of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, as Canada prepares to host the 74th I.P.U. Conference in Ottawa from the 2nd to the 7th of September, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, the Inter-Parliamentary Union is almost a century old and it has a long history of accomplishments. From a modest Eurocentrist organization, the Union has grown to almost universal representation, with a membership of 104 parliamentary groups at the moment. It is a complex organization with a wide range of activities devoted mainly to the strengthening of the parliamentary institutions and to international peace and security. The aims of the Union are set out in Article I of the statutes which states:

[Senator Doody.]

The purpose of the Inter-Parliamentary Union is to promote personal contacts between members of all Parliaments constituted into National Groups, and to unite them in common action to secure and maintain the full participation of their respective states in the firm establishment and development of representative institutions and in the advancement of the work of international peace and co-operation, particularly by supporting the objectives of the United Nations. With this end in view, the Inter-parliamentary Union shall express its views on all questions of an international character suitable for settlement by parliamentary action and shall make suggestions for the development of parliamentary institutions, with a view to improving the working of those institutions and increasing their prestige.

The Union has survived two world wars and numerous internal divisions mirroring international conflicts. That is living proof of its relevance to parliamentarians and to the world community. In recent years the IPU has become increasingly politicized and this has affected somewhat its effectiveness. If it did not exist, the union would have to be invented.

The history of the Inter-Parliamentary Union is a striking record of what can be achieved by ordinary backbench members of Parliament and a challenge to each new generation of parliamentarians to complete what they have begun. In light of the report of the Special Committee on Reform of the House of Commons tabled in the House of Commons by the Honourable James A. McGrath earlier this month, all backbenchers should become familiar with the history of the IPU so that they may have an accurate picture of what can be achieved by belonging to it.

Through an association such as the IPU, parliamentarians become better acquainted with other parliamentarians by exposing them to points of view that they may otherwise not have had an opportunity to hear. The IPU broadens the outlook of people in positions of responsibility. Parliamentarians are in a unique position to influence government and mould public opinion, because knowledge acquired in parliamentary conferences can be very useful. I should like to share with you the history of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, its achievements and Canada's participation in it.

The origins of the Inter-Parliamentary Union date back to June 1889 when two parliamentarians, peace activists and later Nobel Peace Prize recipients Frédéric Passy of France and Sir William Randal Cremer from the United Kingdom convened in Paris the first Inter-Parliamentary Conference for International Arbitration. Delegates from nine countries attended the conference in Paris with total participation of 98 parliamentarians. France had 56, Great Britain 28, Italy 5, Belgium, Hungary, Spain, Denmark, the U.S.A. and Liberia had one each. The next year the conference was held in England with 108 parliamentarians representing 12 different countries.

The primary objective of that conference and the ones that followed was to advance the idea of international arbitration—a popular concept at the time within the peace movements. In 1898 at The Hague a permanent organization was established with its own statutes and secretariat. At the same conference a draft convention for a permanent Court of Arbitration was adopted which led to the first world peace conference at The Hague in 1899 which, in turn, led to the creation of the Permanent Court of International Justice. This was the first of a long series of significant political achievements by the IPU and a demonstration of its real capacity to have an effect upon government policies.

Another change took place at that conference. The Inter-Parliamentary Conference became the Inter-Parliamentary Union. In Paris 17 years later Canada attended the IPU conference for the first time. In the early years of this century, economic and social questions were added to the agenda of the conference which, up to that time, dealt mainly with items such as neutrality, naval warfare, arbitration and aerial warfare. At the same time the IPU adopted the basic tripartite structure—the Plenary Conference, the Council and the Executive Committee.

Little has changed over the years except to secure a firmer financial basis on which to base a program of action to achieve its aims. Study committees were created to deal with difficult questions and political disputes.

One such dispute occurred in 1912 when an IPU resolution expressed regret at the outbreak of the Italo-Turkish conflict, which led to the withdrawing of the Italian group until after the First World War. Thereafter, the principle of no direct interference in the internal affairs of those states which had Inter-Parliamentary Groups in the Union, became a tacit understanding. In 1921 the principle was formalized in the statutes thus, “the Inter-Parliamentary Council . . . declares it to be a fundamental principle of the Union, and one to which it has always adhered not to take sides in political disputes. The Union . . . must always maintain that attitude, and must confine itself in the event of international disputes, to calling public attention to the duty incumbent upon states to use judicial and amicable methods in the settling of disputes. On the other hand, it is understood that National Groups have complete liberty in this respect and may express their opinion even on current political questions.”

National groups became formalized and bilateral groups within the Union were set up. The seat of the IPU secretariat moved from Berne, Switzerland, in 1909 to Brussels, Belgium, until 1914, and then to Oslo, Norway, until 1920 when it settled permanently in Geneva.

During the war, the IPU interrupted its formal activities, but relations between the groups were maintained through the bureau. Therefore, national groups not only continued their activities but paid their contributions into the Union's budget. The Union was in no position to attempt any political mediation and the main business transacted by the council and the executive committee during the war was of a housekeeping nature.

When the council met in Geneva in 1919, the Union resumed its activities but was immediately faced with its first major political crisis. The Belgian group presented a resolution to exclude from the Union the parliaments of Germany and its allies and attacked the Secretary General. The crisis was defused temporarily and the Union went on to discuss a resolution endorsing the creation of the League of Nations.

With the success of the council's meeting, the Union was effectively re-launched despite initial boycotting by the Belgian, French, Czechoslovakian and Rumanian groups over German representations and its allies. France and Belgium returned to the Union in 1922.

When those groups disappeared others were reconstituting and others were still forming. Twenty-six national groups were known to exist by 1922. One year earlier, in 1921, the Inter-Parliamentary Bulletin was launched. The regular bi-monthly publication was a milestone in the history of the Union as it served in those days as the sole contact point among member groups. The bulletin is still published today, quarterly, and there can be few international journals with such a record of continuous publication.

From the political angle, the major debates of the inter-war years revolved around the relations between the Union and the League of Nations. There was much talk of transforming the IPU into an official organ of the League, mirroring the link that exists today between the European Economic Commission and the European Parliament. Indeed, the topics discussed by the Union and the League were similar but in the end the Union preferred to maintain its independent position.

It was believed that “. . . if the Union were to become an official institution authorized by an international convention, or by a law adopted within parliaments, it would lose much of its independence, for there would be a tendency for members of delegations no longer to speak on their own personal responsibility, but in the name of their government or at least of their own delegation.”

• (1610)

Topics discussed at Union meetings ranged from parliamentary control of foreign policy, a perennial subject in the Union, to the League's colonial mandates, disarmament, the rights and duties of national minorities, international trade and the monetary situation. Two major resolutions to come out of Union meetings concerned international security. One set out principles for the maintenance of international security within the League, the other recommended regional security treaties.

From the point of view of the Union's internal organizations an important decision was taken at Copenhagen in 1924. This was an amendment to the statutes laying down that henceforth the council would fix the agenda of the plenary conference and could itself propose resolutions to it. Thus the council became the Union's most powerful instrument as it could not only propose resolutions but it could also reject them, or impede their consideration. According to an historian of the Union, James Douglas, from that time power slipped away from the plenary session.

Another important development occurred at the Bucharest Conference in 1931, when an amendment to the statutes was adopted, which would have provided a first step towards an officially recognized status if the idea had been pursued. The new paragraph to Article 3 thus read:

A Parliament may constitute itself into a National Group of the Union.

A thorny problem for the Union was raised for the first time in 1924, when the host country to the conference, namely the United States, refused to allow an individual delegate to enter the country. An important point of principle was at stake: Could a host parliament or government discriminate between individual delegates wishing to attend a conference of the Union? Eventually, the council stated that the U.S. government had the right to apply its own laws with regard to entry into the United States of particular individuals.

As the war drew closer the Union was troubled with incidents involving delegates from Fascist Italy and the representation of Nazi Germany within the Union. The Swiss group stated to the council in 1933 that the German government had arrested and imprisoned a number of members of the Reichstag and asked the Union to make a categorical statement on the matter. The German problem was resolved in typical IPU fashion: A council resolution stated firmly principles in the tradition of the Union; that is, belief in the representative system which allows solely to parliament control over the executive, respect for the immunity of parliamentarians, maintenance of the rights of the parliamentary opposition, freedom of assembly, with no direct mention of a particular country or personality. The German group was dissolved shortly after, but reinstated in the Union in 1950.

On the eve of the outbreak of the Second World War, meetings of the Union tended to reflect the mounting tension in Europe. The Oslo Conference held in 1939 adopted a resolution directed to the governments of France, Germany, Great Britain and Italy for arbitration and conciliation. When war broke out the Union sent a message to all national groups, then numbering 30, pointing a way forward for continuing Union activity through executive committees and council meetings. In fact, there was very little activity in Geneva until 1944, when a meeting was held of members of European parliaments whose countries were still occupied.

With the end of the war in Europe, the Union was quick to recommence activity. The council met in September, 1945, albeit only ten countries attended. Five major issues confronted the post-war Union: first, the desirability of inter-parliamentary co-operation; second, the question of official status for the IPU in order to give it greater authority; third, the question of whether groups should consist of members freely recruited or whether a group should consist of the entire parliament; fourth, the increasing of membership towards universality; and finally, the financial organization of the Union.

On the second point the Union was granted on demand a "consultative status" with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Possibly a consultative specialized agency under the terms of Article 7 of the UN Charter could have been granted, and was in fact contemplated by the Union. In retrospect this appears to have been a mistake. As pointed out by James Douglas in Parliaments Across Frontiers:

... the real difficulty concerning relations with the U.N. was the fact that the Union was essentially a political organization and was not in a position to make its voice heard at U.N. on political matters by reason of its non-governmental status. This factor was to cloud the Union's relations with the United Nations from that time onwards. The I.P.U. was stuck with its consultative status with the EGOSOC and could do nothing to escape from it.

Nevertheless, resolutions adopted at IPU conferences are circulated to members of the UN General Assembly and the UN has always sent high-ranking observers to attend IPU meetings, and has participated financially in certain technical projects initiated by the Union.

Another development within the Union was the creation of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament, which began its activities in 1946. The purpose of the association is to bring Clerks from different legislatures to exchange ideas on the procedures and administration of their national parliaments. The association publishes Constitutional and Parliamentary Information, in which texts of new constitutions and other information of parliamentary interest are set out. Since 1950, the association has given detailed study to more than 40 topics of a parliamentary and procedural nature. Some of the more interesting are: methods of voting; payment of members of parliaments; parliamentary immunity; status of parties in parliament; limitation on the conduct and activities of members; offences against parliament; and procedure for revising constitutions.

Topics that have been discussed in the post-war period were: migration and transfers of population; reparation of war damages and international reconstruction; principles of international moralities; non self-governing territories; regional economic solidarities and regional economic agreements; protection of mothers and infants; the idea of a representative world assembly; maintenance and conditions of a lasting peace; supply of food to famine-stricken populations.

The increase of African, Asian and Latin American members was to accelerate in the post-war years and radically change the characteristics of the organization. The membership explosion has also brought new problems and new opportunities. Regional conferences were organized. A book on comparative practice and procedure, Parliament, was published in French and English in the early sixties and re-edited in 1966 and 1975. A Parliamentary Documentation Centre at the Union's headquarters was also established. However, representation of divided countries, such as Germany, China, Korea, Vietnam, and so on, proved troublesome for the Union. Furthermore, the standards of representation and debate deteriorated as plenary debates tended to become mere exchanges of repetitive prepared statements reflecting the views of a particular country and government concerned, thus lessening the effect of the Union's decisions and the possibility of swaying governmental policy.

According to James Douglas, by 1960 the Union was no longer in a position to sway international politics. This very fact led to a large-scale diversification of the Union's work. New topics appeared on the agenda of the Union, reflecting the increased membership of Third World Parliaments: commodity prices, technical aid and assistance, development aid and finance, Third World politics, economic planning replaced items on international security and disarmament, refugees and minorities. Indeed, many debates by the Union were similar to those discussed by the UN and its specialized agencies, but the Union managed, nevertheless, to produce some pioneering work on such subjects as removal of obstacles to international trade, the peaceful uses of the seabed, space law, and the pollution of the environment field, but problems of follow-up on resolutions adopted by the Union were not resolved, as the principle of the duty of national groups to submit Union resolutions to their parliaments was not yet recognized.

● (1620)

In the mid-sixties, the Union departed somewhat from its principles by adopting resolutions referring specifically to political conditions in member states or non-member states. At the Ottawa conference, a resolution entitled, "The Problem of Apartheid Prevailing in the Republic of South Africa," was adopted by 565 votes to 10 with 99 abstentions. The Parliament of South Africa was not and never had been a member of the Union. Thus, a break with tradition had been made. It was followed by others.

In 1967, the council adopted a text on the persecution of Greek parliamentarians. A year later, a resolution was adopted on internal events in Czechoslovakia. In 1968, during a debate on the Middle East situation, the council decided to establish a committee of enquiry to investigate actual conditions and treatment of the people in the territory occupied by Israel. Afterwards, proposals to send investigative missions became more frequent. These decisions created heated debate within the Union, and, although preliminary moves, in accordance with instructions, were undertaken by the President and the Secretary General, little progress was made, and there was no positive result. As James Douglas commented:

It would appear that little success has been achieved although much acrimony has been generated in the lengthy and difficult debates which have taken place on the various proposals. Indeed, it might well be asked whether the original non-interference stand of the Union in its earlier days was not the wisest course.

However, there were instances where tradition and principles were respected. When the Soviet Union refused in 1967 to invite a member group, South Korea, to the Moscow conference, the conference was cancelled by the council. It had always been a cardinal principle of the Union that the host country invite all member groups.

In 1971, the Union introduced long-term planning covering action by national groups, budgetary methods, working conditions of the staff, reporting on public opinion and parliamentary circles, relations with other international organizations and implementation of the resolutions of the conference and of the council. Furthermore, the Centre of Parliamentary Documentation was to enlarge its scope by initiating a study of parliamentary topics and by organizing symposia. The Union also established a program of technical co-operation with parliaments of the developing countries to strengthen their infrastructure. United Nations funds from the Development Program were made available. Canada was involved in that program. Training for Clerks of Parliaments at the Union's headquarters was also provided.

A new initiative of the Union in the 1970s was the organization of specialized conferences and meetings on particular issues. The First Inter-Parliamentary Conference on European Co-operation and Security was held in Helsinki in 1975, paralleling the inter-governmental CSCE conference, paving the way for further IPU meetings on European co-operation and security in Belgrade, Vienna, Brussels and Budapest. Specialized meetings on such issues as the world environment situation, the population problems of Africa, and the control and reduction of conventional armaments have also been held in the last decade.

Another main focus of IPU activity in the last decade has been on the organizational side. Between 1975 and 1985, the number of national groups grew from less than 70 to more than 100, and there was an increasing tendency to crowd the agenda with more and more supplementary items, numbers of speakers, specialized meetings, caucuses, receptions, and so on. The Union's very success threatened its operations.

Consequently, around 1980, a reform movement, which the Canadian group strongly supported, was set under way. Following careful study and consultations by a special committee on the reform of the conference sessions, the Union adopted, during 1983, a series of measures designed to make it more efficient. Two distinct annual conferences were agreed on, rather than an annual cycle, including preparatory meetings in the spring and a main conference in the autumn. The conferences were to last approximately one week, rather than two; the number of delegates was reduced; and the agenda was limited to a maximum of four items rather than the very extensive list which had been possible previously.

The new procedures went into force for the first time in the spring of 1984 in Geneva and have been very successful in preserving the Union and making it a much more manageable organization than it was in the early 1980s.

As regards substance, the Union continues to address a range of issues confronting the modern world. Its four main study committees deal with such problems as disarmament, the strengthening of international law, the improvement of parliamentary institutions, the future of the world economy, decolonization, and regional conflicts in such areas as the Middle East and Central America. There is also a specialized committee on the human rights of parliamentarians and means to bring to the attention of the Union particularly urgent problems such as famine in Africa and the Iran-Iraq war.

This autumn, in Ottawa, the Seventy-fourth Inter-Parliamentary Conference will consider the International Year of Youth, the rights of youth, the illicit international drug traffic, decolonization, and one or two supplementary items, for example, concerning the Middle East situation or international terrorism. The addition of one supplementary and, possibly, one emergency supplementary item will be decided at the first plenary session of the Ottawa conference.

Canada participated in the Inter-Parliamentary Union from 1900 to 1939. A long interruption covering the period from 1939 to 1958 was primarily caused by the Second World War. However, the activities of the Canadian group were re-established on August 4, 1960. Canada was host to the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in 1925 and in 1965. It will host the Seventy-fourth Conference in September 1985.

The Canadian group is organized according to rules adopted in 1977. These rules deal with membership, the annual general meeting, voting procedure, the executive committee, financial management and administration, delegation to international meetings and symposia.

In the last ten years, Canada has been very active within the Union. The Canadian group has produced memoranda which have been well received by other groups, and has been strongly involved in the debates, committee work, drafting exercises and management activities of the organization. Members of the Canadian group have served on the IPU's Executive Committee, as chairmen of study committees and drafting groups, as rapporteurs, and on special committees dealing with such issues as human rights.

The number of Canadian parliamentarians who have made important contributions to the IPU's work over the last ten years is too large to list them all by name, but one must mention the chairmen of the Canadian group, all of whom have distinguished themselves in the Union's activities, that is to say, Gordon Fairweather, Robert Stanbury, Lloyd Francis, Gildas Molgat, Marcel Prud'homme and Benno Friesen.

Senator Doody: A good team.

Senator Bosa: A good team, I agree. Others have served with these chairmen on the Inter-Parliamentary Council, such as Allan Lawrence who has been strongly involved in the IPU for several years. As well, there are the good, active, capable participants such as my colleagues, Joan Neiman and Rhéal Bélisle; and members from the other place such as Suzanne Duplessis, Charles Caccia and Stan Hovdebo. There are many others who deserve to be named, but time and space will not permit.

One item in which I myself take particular pride is the work of the Canadian group on the reform of the United Nations. In Rome, in the autumn of 1982, the Canadian delegation proposed that the Union examine ways and means of strengthening the United Nations. The executive committee of the Union endorsed this proposal, which was placed on the agenda for the following year and examined at the Helsinki and Seoul conferences.

A Canadian memorandum on the subject was circulated before the Helsinki meeting and then our delegation took a leading role in committee discussions and drafting exercises. We submitted a draft resolution which provided important input to the Union's work. I had the honour of serving as rapporteur to the Political Committee in Helsinki and to the Plenary Session in Seoul. The final resolution adopted on this question in Seoul is certainly a significant contribution to thinking about the future of the world's most important central institution.

I thought it would be important at this time, in view of the proximity of the 74th IPU Conference, and as vice-chairman of the Canadian IPU, that I draw the attention of members of the Senate and the House of Commons to the history and aims of this world organization. It is a long and complex history, and I hope that I have succeeded in presenting it in brief form but without neglecting its substance.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

THE ECONOMY AND THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of June 25, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the economy and the Budget.

He said: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government said earlier today that he was an alive and sentient being. Looking to my left at the members of the government, I believe they all are. In fact, I believe they also are intelligent, and compassionate, and decent; and those with whom I have had to deal have delighted me with their humanity.

So, the comments I am about to make are not addressed to any of them. They must not see themselves as targets of some of the less tender things I am about to say.

To avoid party labels, I will give honourable senators the opportunity to choose from among three categories the category in which they wish to put themselves. These three categories are in response to a test. You take half a loaf of bread and put it on the table and you ask those persons at the table for their reaction. There is one category of person who will say: "Never accept half a loaf. It is better to die of hunger." That is one category, one political category. It is a matter of principle. Starve rather than take half a loaf.

There is another category of person who says: "Look, let's eat the half loaf and discuss principle afterwards. It is always better to discuss principles on a full stomach." That is the second category.

And there is a third category of person who says: "I agree. Let's eat the half loaf, but let's cut the indexation of the pensions of the old to pay for the half loaf and let's give the other half loaf for free to the rich."

Honourable senators are free to choose the category to which they feel they belong.

This budget—which the Minister of Finance has amended today—illustrates a frame of mind which I am sure none of the honourable senators to my left shares. It is even a budget that does not seem to know what it is doing. Does the Minister of Finance and the government for which he speaks want to decrease both the deficit and unemployment? It can be done. But you do not take measures to cut jobs.

The Data Resources Institute in Toronto says that we are going to lose about 100,000 jobs as a result of changes in the taxation regime, changes which will hit consumption, thereby reducing consumption and, in consequence, production.

On the contrary, you take tax measures which increase consumption, and consumption among those who need to consume, not among the rich, who will simply salt it away, wherever it is that the rich salt it away.

If you want to increase economic activity so that government revenues increase, so that the deficit is reduced, you stimulate investment at the expense of savings. This government has done the opposite. It has stimulated savings at the expense of investments.

If you do give some investment concessions, for God's sake attach some conditions, for example, that the capital gains holiday be given only to those people who will invest this money in Canada, thereby doing Canada some good.

There is the argument, of course, that the deficit is terrible and that we must address ourselves to it first; that the deficit crowds out investment because government borrows so much. Well, let me quote James Tobin, who is a Nobel prize winner in economics. He says, and I quote:

While the economy still has idle labour and capital that can be put to work—

And that is the case in Canada now.

—crowding out is not a big problem. Taxpayers' consumption . . . and private capital formation can expand in concert. As incomes rise so do the savings to finance both investment and government deficits.

Allan Reynolds, a major United States economist, writing in the Wall Street Journal, said on reading our budget—and I am sure you have all read it—that Canada was about to commit economic suicide, increasing taxes and thereby reducing consumption, thereby reducing production, thereby reducing jobs, thereby discouraging investment, even foreign investment.

The Canadian Council on Social Development—in case you do not believe that consumption will be reduced—has gone through this budget and come up with the following figures—and I will leave the pensioners out, because they have been reprieved at the last moment, after an agony of one month and several days—a family of four earning $10,000 a year will lose $396 in 1990, and will be losing some each year; a family earning $20,000 will lose $808; a family earning $30,000 will lose $1,089. But a family earning $200,000 will gain $4,519.

Of course, the families that earn $200,000 are not very numerous, as our Minister of Finance said when earning the Marie Antoinette award for his saying that we have "an acute shortage of rich people in this country." I wish I had thought of saying that.

What was reversed today, the proposed partial de-indexation, was so insane, so stupid a proposal that one has to dwell on it. It isn't enough to say: "OK. Public pressure has made us go back." Think about what it was going to do. The de-indexation of old age pensions was going to give to the government $1.6 billion a year in 1990. A pensioner, in consequence, would have lost $58 a month.

While that may appear to be a piddling sum, a single pensioner who receives OAS and GIS makes $605 a month, out of which he pays $240 in rent, $21 for electricity, $57 for heating; $17 for his telephone, $21 for insurance, $5 for water, and $216 for food, for a total of some $578. And we haven't counted clothing, dental care, eyeglasses, repairs, transportation, newspapers, recreation, toothpaste, soap, hairdressers—all of which have to come out of the remaining $27. That would have been the consequence for the 1.3 million at which the de-indexation was aimed, pushing them further down into misery. I would like to point out that of these 1.3 million, 819,000 are women. It was such an absurd proposal that even the truest-blue spokesmen of the business community were appalled. They were worried about their image. They do not mind being Scrooge-ish, but they do not like being thought of as Scrooge-ish, so they complained; they criticized a government which was close to their hearts and we had criticism coming at Mr. Wilson from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Business Council on National Issues and the Canadian Organization of Small Business.

• (1640)

I see a couple of French-speaking senators here and I am sorry there are not more. I will switch into French very shortly and I would love to see how our translators will handle it. This reminds me of the occasion when a member of the opposition rose in L'Assemblée Nationale in France and said to Clemenceau:

Je suis certain que même les membres de votre gouvernement sont déçus.

And Clemenceau rose and said:

Merci pour la cédille.

I cannot translate that; it is not translatable, but it is a nice one.

While the pensions of the indigent poor and old were being de-indexed, this government started discussing the indexation of bonds. Bonds are not purchased by people who have only $27 a month to buy toothpaste, transportation, clothes and pay for their telephone bill, et cetera. They are bought by people who have some excess cash. It is a good idea to index bonds; I have nothing against it, but you do not present the two side by side. We screw and grind the poor into further poverty, and we give another break to the rich. It is hard to fathom the kind of mind that comes up with such a budget. Then to top it off we have a defence born straight out of Marie Antoinette, who said "Let them eat cake;" we have the Minister of Finance saying "I am giving these breaks to the rich because we have an acute shortage of rich people." while, at the same time, grinding the faces of the poor. That is really very hard to fathom.

One has to ask oneself, did the Minister of Finance, who appears to be such a nice man, do this in ignorance? Did he fail to understand what it was all about? In the Globe and Mail of June 13, 1985,—a paper that I respect, as I respect the man who fashioned it and who now sits in this chamber—we read that the Finance Minister, the Honourable Michael Wilson, had been told in detail by his officials exactly what the impact of his taxation proposals would be: In other words, that these tax proposals would grind the poor into further poverty and make the rich richer. Yet, he went ahead, and it took more than a month of national outcry to make him retreat.

The result is that a columnist for the Edmonton Journal, none other than Don Braid, who has been gnashing his teeth and fuming whenever he hears the word "Liberal", says in his column of June 12 in that newspaper:

The Tories have given us the worst of three worlds: Higher taxes, fewer services, and more patronage. The implication is that Tory friends will benefit but the rest of us will lose.

We did not say this; this is a true-blue Conservative columnist from the Edmonton Journal, a newspaper from the heartland of Toryism, telling it like it is.

Then we have the gifts to the oil companies. At a time when in the United States—where the oil companies are based; where the multinationals have their home and their biggest clout—we have the United States Secretary of Energy, Mr. John S. Herrington saying that in Mr. Reagan's tax proposals the United States oil and gas industry would pay higher taxes. Here, in this country, we lower them. We give them billions. Why did we give them these billions? Because the National Energy Program was terrible. It was so bad for the oil companies that their profits in 1984 were higher than those in 1980. At that time they were complaining and telling us all that the Liberals were paying money for production incentive which compelled the poor oil companies to dig where they did not wish to dig and explore for oil on the frontier, instead of in Alberta. Lo and behold, now that they have the tax cuts, what are they doing? They are asking for those same grants. They are not exploring to find more oil at Hibernia or off the coast of Nova Scotia or in the Beaufort Sea, unless they are given more money. They are howling.

Why should we believe them? Why have we fallen for their sob-story? A man I much admire, Mr. Dalton Camp, writing in the Gazette on May 17, 1985, was warning us all, regardless of party, that we should remain unconvinced as to the willingness of businessmen to use the windfalls given to them by the Honourable Michael Wilson by investing more and raising us all to higher levels of productivity. In that article, he said:

[Senator Gigant]

I am not sure that simply doing right by someone else's shareholders, maximizing profitability and so on . . . will do the job.

Says Mr. Camp, a very wise man:

There is other business, including a commitment to the national good, the integrity of Canada's institutions, along with such old fashioned things as a sense of sharing in the pursuit of equity. God only knows what they are teaching in business administration schools these days, either here or at Harvard. But based on what seems to be going on, they are not teaching any of the above.

In other words, this sharing and caring for people.

However, we are not through with all this. Mr. Epp is now talking of the need to consider the privatization of health care. That is the next thing they intend to try to change. Somebody should warn them that the country will not stand for it.

There were alternatives; there were all kinds of other things that the government could have done to cut the deficit. I know that even members of my party would disagree with this, and I regret it, but I disagreed with them; at the end of 1981, there were $28.5 billion worth of deferred taxes. I call them deferred taxes. Accelerated depreciation is a loan that we give to a company. We should ask those companies to pay interest on that money at about 10 per cent, which is the current rate. That would bring the government approximately $3 billion per year. It was perfectly possible.

As I said earlier, we should not be giving this capital tax holiday without imposing a condition that these windfalls should be used productively within Canada to create jobs and not to buy such things as horses. I am sorry that Senator Phillips is not in the chamber. He and I engage in charming conversations regarding horses, and in particular, the part of the horse which he thinks I represent. I accept his strictures, because I enjoy the man.

There are other things we could have cut. The government did not think of cutting those things; it thought of cutting the poor. It did not think of saying to the oil industry: "We are giving you a windfall of $9.6 billion between now and 1990. Will you not give 10 per cent of that to keep us from de-indexing our programs for the poor?" The limits on RRSPs were increased. Who can afford to put $15,000 a year into an RRSP? Not the middle class; not the poor, but the rich. So we grind the poor and we give more privileges to the rich. I am all for giving privileges to the rich, but not at the same time as we are grinding the poor. It is not politically a good thing, and I cannot use parliamentary language to describe it.

Everywhere there are little areas where they could have spent less money. For example, the creation of all of these chiefs of staff will cost $15 million. From what we can see, they are not advising their ministers too well. That move could have been reversed. The much needed training program for helping ministerial assistants; that was a waste, since they have not been giving very good advice. They could have saved money from the extra plane flights that were taken—and I used to criticize the Liberals on this matter when I was a journalist—for they need not have been taken. A lot of money could have been saved instead of purchasing new uniforms for the Armed Forces at a cost $56 million. It was not necessary to purchase the designer trees for the Christmas party. They were lovely trees. I saw them and I congratulate the party on its excellent taste, at the expense of the poor. This goes on, and you can add up $55 million in waste on frivolous items that could have spared de-indexation for 78,615 of the poorest pensioners. Now that the government has re-indexed their pensions, you can multiply that by 2, amounting to 166,000 of the poorest people receiving a little more money each month to make ends meet.

● (1650)

My late father—and I shall not say that he was sainted. He was not and I thank God for that—in any event, he gave me a test other than the proverbial loaf of bread: He said, “you can tell where you belong by your attitude to greed or the profit motive. The socialists look at the profit motive and they think that it is the serpent in paradise. That is why you always see them doing a kind of ineffectual, intellectual fandango and trying to stamp it out. Conservatives think it is the golden calf of Aaron. They are always on their knees worshipping it. The Liberals look at it and say, ‘What an interesting beast of burden, let us harness it.’ Try and imitate us.”

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I consider it very important that we participate in this inquiry at a very crucial time in the economic history of our country. The stated priorities in the federal budget of May 23 are to create jobs and reduce the deficit. I do not dispute those goals. The question is whether the means chosen are appropriate.

The Minister of Finance contends that the “budget actions are realistic, effective and fair.” I submit that there is a wide discrepancy between claim and content in the recent budget. There is really little in the budget that would encourage economic growth and very little is done to reduce the deficit on comparative terms. On the whole, its provisions are convoluted and regressive and they would be most harmful to Canada’s least developed regions such as Nova Scotia and other areas of the Atlantic provinces. It is a rich man’s budget crafted to the detriment of the disadvantaged people of Canada.

Let me say a word about equity. The budget, as suggested earlier, has been criticized by some as a tax grab on the poor to pay the rich. I believe there is much in that document to substantiate the charge. For instance, sales taxes which generally weigh more on the poor than on the wealthy are being raised from 10 per cent to 11 per cent. New items, from candy for the kids to fruit juice for the elderly, are added to the tax base. The gasoline excise tax will be raised 2 cents per litre, effective after Labour Day and 1 extra cent on January 1, 1987, as announced by the Minister of Finance today. That translates into an overall increase of approximately 13 cents or 14 cents per gallon. The $50 federal tax reduction which benefits only those earning less than $30,000 per year is being eliminated. Personal exemption and tax brackets are being partially de-indexed, and there are hidden taxes down the road—taxes we may not hear about or understand until many months have gone by.

On the other hand, when we talk about equity, the limit on RRSP tax-deductible contributions is being raised from $5,500 to $15,000 and capital gains will be exempt from taxation up to a lifetime limit of $500,000. It is generally acknowledged that both these measures would benefit disproportionately the well-off. I wonder how many Nova Scotians or Atlantic Canadians or, indeed, people living in any other part of Canada, will be able to take advantage of these Tory tantalizers. The capital gains exemption is recognized as a major feature of the Wilson budget. It received the first standing ovation from Conservative supporters in the House of Commons. I wonder how many of those Conservative MPs would in turn receive a standing ovation even before a partisan Tory audience when enunciating those principles in the various regions of the country.

The stated intent of the measure is to encourage risk taking and to support equity investments. In the minister’s words, in his budget speech:

This measure will encourage more Canadians to invest in small and large businesses. It will help Canadian companies to accelerate their return to a healthy financial position by attracting new equity investment. It will assist smaller businesses in raising capital to pursue new ideas and new directions. It will help raise capital for research and development.

These are admirable aims. But after careful examination it is most difficult to see how the capital gains exemption supports them. Indeed, its effect with respect to these aims is more likely to be perverse.

The Carter Commission on Taxation which examined this question exhaustively, left little doubt on this score. I would like to quote from the Report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, Ottawa, 1966, Volume 3, page 347:

There is little to be said for the view that an exemption from tax for property gains or the taxation of such gains at preferential rates would act as a stimulus for an expanding economy.

What preferential treatment of capital gains does is to distort investment in favour of activities that generate income in the form of capital gains at the expense of investment in other areas. It also provides an incentive for corporations to retain earnings and deliver returns to investors in the form of capital gains. Land and real estate holdings are areas that normally yield more of their return in the form of capital gains and, of course, this type of investment will benefit.

The additional funds attracted to these areas mean that funds available for investment in other business enterprises, particularly risky ventures, will be less. These are the kinds of venture that are generally attracted to the disadvantaged areas of the country. The measure would really distort investment patterns, thereby making the economy less efficient. Moreover, I believe it would distort them in a fashion opposite to that desired by the Minister of Finance; namely, away from the risky ventures and small business and towards land, real estate and other safe areas.

As I understand it, tax fairness has two dimensions, horizontal equity and vertical equity. Horizontal equity requires that taxpayers in the same circumstances be taxed equally. The capital gains exemption proposed in the budget, however, means that those whose income is derived from the appreciation of asset holdings are taxed less than those whose income is derived from other sources. With respect to vertical equity, the principle of equal treatment is normally interpreted to mean that individuals with higher incomes pay proportionately more in taxes on the grounds that their ability to pay also rises proportionately more. Because capital gains are overwhelmingly concentrated among higher income groups, exempting capital gains from taxation benefits primarily the wealthy and can result in situations where high income earners who derive a large proportion of their income from capital gains are taxed at lower rates than persons in lower income groups.

Honourable senators will remember that confidential Department of Finance estimates which were leaked to the press showed that the capital gains exemption will cost the government $1.3 billion in 1990.

The increase in the allowable RRSP contributions from $5,500 to $15,000 would cost an additional $235 million. Ironically, the combined tax cost of these two measures—which would benefit, primarily, wealthy taxpayers—is almost identical to the savings that the government anticipated to realize from the partial de-indexation of the old age security pension.

● (1700)

Therefore, before today's reversal by the Minister of Finance, it could be argued that the de-indexation of the OAS was made necessary by the new tax preferences featuring the rich rather than by the stated need to reduce the budget deficit.

Honourable senators, I want to say something specifically about the budget's impact on the Atlantic provinces. The Atlantic provinces, for many years, have been Canada's most have-not region, being characterized by much lower income levels and higher unemployment rates than any other region of Canada. While some progress has been made during the 1970s towards closing the huge economic gap between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada, the recent recession reversed much of that progress. Because commodity markets remained weak, the Atlantic region's resource-based economy has been slower to recover.

A look at the unemployment figures illustrates this unfortunate trend. While unemployment in the rest of Canada has been declining, in the Atlantic region, where unemployment is already highest, the unemployment rate has been rising. Since January, 1984, the Canadian unemployment rate has fallen by almost one percentage point. At the same time, it has risen by over three percentage points in Newfoundland to 27.5 per cent. In Cape Breton, it has gone as high as 29.5 per cent. Unofficially—and unfortunately—in some areas it is over 50 per cent.

Sadly, the near-term prospects appear equally bleak. In its most recent Quarterly Provincial Forecast, the Conference Board of Canada expects that growth in the Atlantic provinces will slow down this year. The survey of capital investment intentions of large firms, released by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion earlier this month, confirms this pessimistic outlook. The study showed that, while large companies plan to raise their capital spending by a healthy 13 per cent for Canada as a whole, investment spending in the Atlantic region is expected to decline by 5 per cent.

Given this background, one would have thought that the budget would pay particular attention to the Atlantic economy and introduce prompt measures to help alleviate its difficulties. What we find instead is a budget whose proposals, if carried through, would further undermine the regions's weak economic base. There are those who suggest that the budget will have a negative impact as high as 6 per cent in Atlantic Canada. My personal belief is that, economically, Cape Breton is worse off by 30 per cent than it was one year ago.

The fishing industry of the Atlantic provinces, virtually in a state of near-collapse already, was given another blow through the budget proposals for new user fees for tying up at wharves and for dredging services, higher fuel prices, and lower tax credit benefits for the purchase of new vessels. Tourism, among other sectors, will also be hurt by the increased cost of gasoline. Offshore exploration has been hit seriously by the loss of the incentives available under the Petroleum Incentives Program.

But no region is harder hit than Cape Breton Island, where the shut-down of the two AECL heavy water plants is expected to result in some 1,650 job losses. The government's argument is that this action was inevitable because the plants were not economically viable. The fact is, nevertheless, that these plants were major employers in Cape Breton with important spin-offs for other businesses in this area. Given the high unemployment levels already plaguing the region, the residents of Cape Breton had a right to expect that the government would not proceed with the shut-down before developing plans that would provide those laid off with alternative employment, and I will return to that in a moment.

The extension of the 50 per cent tax credit beyond manufacturing to farming, logging and other resources and related activities, while welcome, is clearly an insufficient response. The 50 per cent tax credit, which, in addition to the Atlantic region, also applies to the Gaspé peninsula, northern areas of other provinces and areas in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, is projected to cost the government less than $30 million a year.

I am amazed, honourable senators, that both heavy water plants in Cape Breton are being dismantled. At the very minimum, at least one of those plants should be mothballed. That would be the absolute minimum. If both heavy water plants are to be dismantled, what does it mean for the future of AECL? When the government says it is losing $100 million a year on heavy water plants in Cape Breton, does it take into account long-term receivables with respect to the future sale of the present inventory? Are these receivables being treated as deferred revenue or are they included in the $100 million per year loss picture as portrayed by the government?

As everyone knows, the manner in which one uses figures can be very deceiving. The government, as I have said, continues to talk of an average $100 million loss per year over the last five years due to the continued operation of the two heavy water plants. But the government never talks about the value of the inventory. I am told that an average of well over $100 million worth of heavy water has been produced each year for the last five years. That would place the present value of the total inventory at well over half a billion dollars. What no one on the government side is saying is that, when the inventory is sold, the government will be reimbursed and those losses, presumably, wiped out. It is not inconceivable that a profit will be realized down the road.

With respect to long term prospects, I want to quote a paragraph from the AECL Corporate Plan Summary, which was tabled by the government leader in the Senate on June 11, and referred to by the Leader of the Opposition on June 12.

The preservation of Canada's nuclear capabilities is indispensable to Canada's long-term economic development prospects. Despite intensive international investigation for alternatives, no technology or fuel source other than nuclear yet exists or appears on the horizon which can credibly displace fossil fuels as a source of future electrical capacity. AECL's strategy over the long-term perspective focuses on its internationally recognized and diversified technological base in nuclear and related sciences. The company's key "product" to date and in the future is the CANDU system and its support technology. The further development and evolution of this technological base will provide the essential competitive depth required to keep CANDU in the forefront of a resurgent power reactor market and will generate commercial spinoffs which will result in new marketable products in the future.

We are also aware of plans to construct the Lepreau II plant in the province of New Brunswick at a cost of $1.5 billion. We are told of the very real possibility of a Candu sale to Turkey. One or two more sales would use up the entire inventory.

• (1710)

Against that background, I suggest it is shortsighted and, indeed, highly irresponsible for the government to dismantle the two heavy water plants in Cape Breton. I would hate to think that the grand plan of AECL is to produce future requirements for heavy water in a plant or plants in the province of Ontario or some other region of Canada when we now have two first-class plants in Nova Scotia.

One has to live in the area to understand the real hardships which face the people. I plead with supporters of the government to help persuade the proper authorities to change their decision in the interests of fairness and justice.

Beyond the immediate adverse effects of the budget on the Atlantic region, the announced intentions of the government concerning the wide adoption of cost-recovery in the provision of public services, reductions in transportation subsidies and transfers to provincial governments also indicate additional losses for the Atlantic provinces in the years ahead. Budget papers tabled with the budget last May 23 reveal that the government intends to reduce transfer payments to the provinces under the Equalization Program and the Established Programs Financing arrangements by about $2 billion in 1990-91. This is a significant amount and will affect, primarily, the poorer provinces, since only they receive equalization payments. In this context one can understand the frustrations that led the Conservative Premier of Prince Edward Island, Jim Lee, to make the following statement which was quoted in the Globe and Mail under the heading "Atlantic Provinces 'short-circuited' by Wilson budget on June 11 1985":

The Atlantic provinces did get short-circuited in this budget, there's no two ways about it. A number of things will have a drastic impact on Atlantic Canada and this is why I say the federal Government has to be educated to the fact that there is a need to address our special needs much differently than they have in this budget.

We have obstacles to growth that have to be overcome before we can shoulder our fair share of the national deficit and we're prepared to do that, but we can't do it with two strikes against us and maybe this budget is a third strike for some areas.

In its preliminary analysis of the impact of the federal budget, APEC, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, says that it appears that for the Atlantic region the federal budget will do little to stimulate growth and may even have a dampening effect. I should like to quote from the APEC analysis as follows:

Government expenditure cuts are likely to hit this region hard because of the relatively greater dependence on government spending in the Atlantic Provinces, and because of the nature of the cuts. Incentives for the private sector to invest and create employment may not be as successful in compensating for the negative impact of the expenditure cuts because the private sector is so small and the economy in many parts of the region is less than buoyant. APEC's advice—

I should like you to note this carefully——to various Cabinet Members for a renewed commitment to regional economic development through a variety of means designed to enhance the private sector in the Atlantic region was largely ignored in the federal budget.

The complexity of the budget and delayed impact of some measures means that it is difficult to quickly analyze the net impact of budget measures on this region. In addition, further program rationalizations are likely to occur once the reports are in from the Nielsen Task Force.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to say something in general about expenditures in Canada which are generated by the public and private sectors and compare the overall picture in Canada to that of the Atlantic provinces.

With respect to the percentage of the gross national product, which is generated by government expenditures, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal, the Canadian average is about 46 per cent. Those are expenditures by governments at various levels. Consequently, the percentage generated by the private sector in Canada as a whole is 54 per cent.

Opposed to that national average, in Atlantic Canada the percentage of the GNP generated by government expenditures is an astonishing 80 per cent and that generated by the private sector is 20 per cent. We are not happy with that situation. Atlantic Canadians do not want governments to get bigger. We must do something to correct the imbalance with respect to our dependence on government as opposed to the private sector.

But the Government of Canada has a primary responsibility to help create the economic environment which will enable the private sector in Atlantic Canada to grow at a faster rate than elsewhere so that we have the opportunity to catch up. That is not a new problem. It has been with us for a long time. What I am saying is that the May 23 budget has the negative effect of making the catch-up process much more difficult.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance assured all Canadians that it would be a fair and just budget. One can only conclude that the fair and the just perhaps do not live in Atlantic Canada. One can only hope and, indeed, pray that this government will come to understand the frailty and the complexity of the economy in that region of Canada and the absolute necessity for much more realistic and positive measures than have been evident thus far.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS PROJECTS— HUMBER-PORT AU PORT-ST. BARBE

QUESTION NO. 9 ON ORDER PAPER—REPLY BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS TABLED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since we began our proceedings I have received an answer to Question No. 9 on the order paper in the name of Senator Marshall. It contains a great deal of detailed information and if I may have your permission I would like to lay it on the Table rather than have it incorporated in the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Answer tabled.

[Senator Graham.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose that we adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening, at which time we will carry on with our business. I understand that the House of Commons has resumed its normal operations and that it is now dealing with government orders, and considerable progress has been made. I have every reason to believe that legislation will come to us this evening. I believe that we would all be best served if we were here to deal with it, and we hope we will have a very constructive and productive evening culminating in Royal Assent, if all goes well.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.20 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are still awaiting legislation from the other place. We had been led to believe that the other place was going to break its legislative logjam and inundate us with a flow of constructive, uplifting legislation this evening.

I spoke with the government house leader in the other place a few minutes ago and he told me that he has every reason to believe that Bill C-25 will be before us no later than 9 o'clock this evening, and if that bill is passed, he believes that the other bills will follow quickly.

I ask honourable senators to indulge me in my naiveté again until at least 9 o'clock; if at 9 o'clock we are still in the same unfortunate position, then I will move that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

It might seem more reasonable to move the adjournment until 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock in the morning, but that would not be all that productive because the legislation still requires Royal Assent, and we are unable to have a representative of Her Excellency the Governor General until late in the afternoon. So, we are very much at the mercy of other forces at this time.

I crave your indulgence, honourable senators, and ask you to bear with me. At 9 o'clock the bells will ring again, and we hope that that sitting will be more rewarding than this one.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am not authorized to speak on behalf of anyone except myself, and I am not even sure of that, but it seems to me that if there is no legislation at 9 o'clock this evening, the Deputy Leader of the Government should move the adjournment until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

There will be a fair amount of legislation to be dealt with, and sitting at 2 o'clock will not leave very much time. We know that our image is not the best in some places, so I wonder why it is proposed that we adjourn until 2 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock if things do not work out this evening. That would give us a little more time, and we could still have Royal Assent at 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Doody and I discussed that possibility. If we do not get any legislation by 9 o'clock this evening, we will not get any legislation until after 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, because the House of Commons will adjourn at 9 o'clock this evening.

So, if there is nothing on the platter by 9 o'clock this evening, there will be nothing on the platter tomorrow morning.

We will keep an eye on that, and if we see any movement, we will do the best we can.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-25, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, while we were waiting for this legislation—

Senator Guay: You said that we were talking too long.

Senator Phillips:—Senator Argue and I were talking, and we acknowledged that we have had a long association with this type of legislation. We were both in the House of Commons in 1958 when the Diefenbaker government introduced the first stabilization bill. We were both in this chamber ten years ago when the act was last amended.

Honourable senators, due to the hour and the fact that we have to compress the explanation, I will be brief.

The present bill does two things. It attempts to clear up some of the ambiguities in the present legislation and allows for tripartite stabilization plans.

Last fall, the Department of Justice advised that the present legislation does not permit the Agricultural Stabilization Board to make payments based on the past year's estimated operating costs; that is, it can only operate on the estimated costs for the present year. The amendments provide for the past, present and future. We hope this clears up the original confusion in that regard.

Bill C-25 will allow the federal government to continue to operate federally-funded programs by itself if it so chooses. However, the new legislation will permit the establishment of tripartite stabilization plans. These plans will be funded by the federal government, the provincial governments and producers.

The intention of establishing the tripartite plans is to prevent double payments by the federal and provincial governments and to introduce some uniformity in stabilization across the country.

The House of Commons committee made one amendment to the legislation, to which I should refer. Honourable senators, a number of provinces were concerned with the so-called "top-loading," that is, a provincial plan operating in addition to the federal plan. The amendments to section 8 allow the minister to enter into an agreement with the provinces provided the agreement between the province and the federal government does not provide an advantage for growers in that province which is not available on a national basis and does not contribute to increased production within that province.

Honourable senators, in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, Senator Olson asked a logical question as to why this bill should be passed now. Perhaps the best answer I can give to that question is by referring to the minister's release regarding Bill C-25. In the second page of that release, he gives three reasons for passing the bill, which are: first, an inability to legalize retroactive stabilization payments; second, it adds greater flexibility in the timing of the stabilization payments so that they can be paid out when the producers need them most; and, third, the plans will be actuarially sound, and the producers will be assured of payments when the formula permits payments to the producers.

Honourable senators, I hope this explanation, brief as it is, will provide you with enough information to pass this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, as Senator Phillips has said, he and I have been around for a long time.

As far as this particular bill is concerned, I only hope that we are around and in good shape when the next amendment to this legislation comes through. I would not want to be too critical, but, from all of the derogatory things I have heard said about it in recent days in and outside Ottawa, it may not be long until further amendments are before us. I guess there are precedents in terms of other things the government has been doing with regard to making some major changes to old age pensions under great pressure.

Senator Phillips: Watch your legs.

Senator Argue: Parts of this bill deal with housekeeping matters such as adding details like "lambs" and "wool" instead of referring only to "sheep." It provides for bringing back under the act spring wheat and winter wheat outside of the designated area.

Probably an important provision is that the bill provides for a stabilization period greater than a year or less than a year, which will add some flexibility to the legislation.

Over the years, the Agricultural Stabilization Act financing has been paid for entirely by the federal treasury. The argument from time to time has been as to whether the level should be 80, 90, 95 or 100 per cent. It has always seemed to me that it was not really quite fair. If producers, for example, had available to them, and took advantage of, the Western Grain Stabilization Act, they could not take advantage of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. That seems fair enough.

But for those producers who decided not to go under that act and who therefore did not put themselves in a position where they might cost the federal treasury some money, there are no benefits. When the Western Grain Stabilization Act is in effect, these producers are not allowed any of the benefits. That has been a penalty for producers in one part of the country.

The cattle producers for a long time have not wanted any part of a stabilization program. They put themselves forward as being the great free-enterprisers of this country. Some six or eight years ago, when a payment was being made to the beef producers under the Agriculture Stabilization Act, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association came to Ottawa and their official position was: "We don't want your money."

But a lot of them have said that they would support a tripartite agreement, with the federal government paying some money, the provincial government paying some money, and the beef producers paying some money, in the belief that the government was going to set up a program that would discourage provincial top-loading and which would be an alternative to the kind of Balkanization that takes place in agricultural pricing because of the top-loading for particular agricultural products in particular provinces.

That seemed to be all right. But recently the government has brought in an amendment. Senator Phillips referred to it. He can put his interpretation on it—and it may be an accurate interpretation; I don't know—but the interpretation that others are putting on it is that it really opens the door wide to separate agreements being entered into by the federal government with provinces that are now top-loading, with the real possibility that they may be underwriting further top-loading and a further distortion of the beef industry and of other agricultural products in this country. As so often happens, governments really can speak with two different voices and have two policies going in opposite directions at the same time.

Ostensibly, this legislation was to clean up, insofar as the federal authority and federal persuasion is concerned, top-loading, with a view to getting rid of it. I do not know who is responsible for the fact that the government is spending $4.5 million on a packing plant project designed to increase hog production in Prince Edward Island. I have before me an article by Barry Wilson, in the Western Producer of June 20, in which it is stated that officials hope that this will result in a 50 per cent increase in hog production in P.E.I. And I read that it is a province with a good deal of top-loading. I do not know where it gets the bucks. It may get them from the federal treasury. Maybe they will come from the education fund. We once read that the federal contribution went for highways. Now perhaps it goes to the hog producers. I don't know. But one piece of legislation is to get rid of the distortion; another is to provide for a packing plant which will enable an increase in production of pork in a particular province.

The underlying fear out there about the results of stabilization legislation today and amendments and this legislation is that the subsidies that may be paid under this legislation will be declared by our friends in the United States to be subsidies that will result subsequently in barriers being placed on these products by the United States.

The penalty, the tariff, the duty placed on hogs going from Canada into the United States, as we all know, was recently increased to 5.5 cents on pork—and this has been to the great detriment of our hog producers—and 5.39 cents on live hogs.

The government has not had the international stature to persuade the Americans to forgo this kind of penalty against our hogs. So, we have to ask ourselves the question: Are these changes, and are the subsidies that will be paid under this legislation, going to encourage the Americans to provide for greater penalties?

We need legislation that provides stability for our agricultural industry. But we have to wonder what has happened to the stature of the federal government when it has lost its ability to influence the United States. We went down that direction when the Prime Minister put his arms around the President of the United States and said: "Well, we are with you all the way."

So, the American market is in jeopardy today for hogs. We have had recent indications that the United States is taking steps to subsidize the export of grain, something which would constitute a great danger to Canada.

We had a particular position in the China market for years. We thought we had a secured position. They told us that we would be given first chance to ship grain into that market. But with the new administration here, the evidence is that we have already lost the China market for grain.

And the Soviet market is in great danger at this time as well. The failure of the Government of Canada to have an effective and influential voice in international trade makes the subsidies and the stabilization programs necessary for the farmers, and the fear is that such programs may lead to very, very adverse consequences in the international markets.

There is a great deal of fear out there. There is much opposition to any changes in the initial bill that would appear to be going down the road of supporting and allowing top-loading and a further Balkanization of the farm production and the markets in this country.

Honourable senators, this bill received a very rough ride in the other place. There is the fear that, with the administration that is in place at the present time, there may be some results that flow from this kind of legislation that should not flow, that being an inability on our part to keep our markets open in the world. The fact that the Americans are using as an excuse anything that is called a subsidy in Canada means that our position in the world markets is jeopardized.

The members of the Liberal Party in the other place took the position that there was not a great need to have this legislation passed at this time. They would have preferred to have the legislation looked at over the course of this summer. I believe that is the position of many agricultural producers, thus giving them the chance to make further representations in an effort to have the legislation further improved.

Basic agricultural stabilization legislation is required. The Agricultural Stabilization Act has been of benefit to agricultural producers over the years. The housekeeping amendments, the amendments to which I referred, are accepted and supported by everyone. But there is the concern that the government may not be firm in trying to bring about uniform agricultural policies and uniform and fair treatment for agricultural producers in all parts of the country.

As Canadians, I think we should endeavour to see that agricultural producers in all parts of this country have the same kind of access to the same kinds of policies, and that they have the opportunity to get a good return from their production.

● (2130)

However, having said that, I do not suppose there is any danger of the bill being defeated in the Senate. I think there is room, however, for much improvement in the legislation we have before us. We can only hope that the Minister of Agriculture is strong in his representation on questions of world trade and has more success in the future than he has had in the past. I hope that, whatever the legislation says, he will not succumb to the temptation of attempting to make the effect of the legislation so broad that top-loading is condoned by the federal government.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I feel I must speak to this bill because I think that, for all practical purposes, it is entirely inadequate, and that the effect of its provisions is to destroy the very purpose of this legislation.

I do not intend to repeat the informed and incisive comments made by the senator who just spoke. However, I think that as the Upper Chamber which has a duty to protect regional interests, we have reason to be concerned. Here is a bill that affects the vital interests of our country's various agricultural regions and that has failed to please anyone in those regions.

Earlier this evening, I was listening to the debate on third reading in the other place, and there was no sign of unanimity. Some members were conspicuous by their silence and others by their eloquence. I believe that this legislation, which is aimed at satisfying certain demands, neglects or fails to consider many other questions.

For years I have asked successive ministers of agriculture to include potatoes on the list of named commodities in this act. Today, we received the bill to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, again without any reference to potatoes, which do not appear on the list. They will say: "You know, Senator Corbin, we have always taken care of our potato producers, especially those in eastern Canada". I would be the first to admit that was the case under the Liberal Government and when Senator Olson was Minister of Agriculture. I was indeed very pleased that he was sensitive to the needs of our farmers, especially to those of potato producers in eastern Canada, and more specifically those on Prince Edward Island and in my native province of New Brunswick, two provinces which at the time were producing nearly 50 per cent of the potatoes eaten by Canadians.

Senator Olson's successor, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, was also very sympathetic to the problems of potato producers and the cyclical ups and downs of this particular industry, which are a serious problem.

I do not intend to dwell on regional discontent as expressed by various agricultural organizations and representatives of provincial departments of agriculture, including the ministers themselves, one of whom was from Prince Edward Island. I do not know what the New Brunswick Minister of Agriculture said, because I did not hear about him. However, I did receive copies of a telegram from the New Brunswick Producers' Association.

Unfortunately, we may not be receiving a similar bill to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act in the near future. The government and the Minister of Agriculture had a golden opportunity to correct the inequities in the existing legislation, improve its administration and, more particularly, include new commodities and I mentioned potatoes. My concern is that in the next three years, we probably will not be seeing another bill to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act. So the present Minister of Agriculture is steering a new course with this piece of legislation, then it will be silence. What has me very concerned is the fact that the minister gives himself a lot of discretion under the new legislation. Discretion to a minister means political power, which is not necessarily always exercised to the benefit of those who need assistance. That is the lesson we are getting from this government, honourable senators.

It is this same government who had hardly been in office for a few hours when it abolished a royal commission of inquiry into the potato industry. It is this government who, barely a few weeks ago, introduced a bill to do away with Canagrex. It favours some of the major agricultural companies in Canada over small producers. In fact, it raises barriers before potential exporters, particularly to developing countries.

So do not expect me to have faith in this government's Minister of Agriculture. I am simply not up to it because of the action taken by this government and its Minister of Agriculture in this session.

I do not have the power to force a vote and ask that this bill be sent back to the House of Commons this evening, but I will certainly voice my opposition for the reasons I have just mentioned because I think that the agricultural community is being served very badly, particularly in light of the additional taxes it will have to pay on gasoline.

That is what I had to say and I rushed here from my home to do so. I did not intend to come here this evening because I had urgent family duties. I managed to get away, which explains why I may appear to be slightly out of breath.

I had to say it and I want the farmers to know that I said it and that I am not pleased about this legislation. I can assure you, honourable senators, that the farmers are not pleased either because the government has just created another jungle, another bureaucratic and administrative maze, with all that power given to the minister. He will be free to impose his political will come rain or come shine, as he or his party supporters see fit. That is not the way to serve the agricultural community of this country.

In the past I have seen too many examples of prerogatives based on partisan politics to endorse this kind of legislation.

I will sit down in a few seconds but not before repeating that it is bad legislation, incomplete legislation. We will probably have to wait till kingdom come before we have another opportunity to put some order in the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and that I find very regrettable. I am not the one who is going to have to live with it, but the current administration and the Minister of Agriculture will. I hope he will remember that when eastern Canada producers come to ask him to get them out of their misery, out of a difficult situation on domestic and international markets, out of their despair.

That is what I had to say, honourable senators, and I thank you for your kind attention.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Phillips speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I shall reply briefly to the points raised by the two previous speakers. I was particularly intrigued to find Senator Argue raising the question of hog production in Prince Edward Island. It is true that a new plant is being built in Prince Edward Island to replace one that is being phased out by Canada Packers. But I would point out that at this time last year a Liberal government, of which the honourable senator was a member, was boasting that it was contributing $2.5 million to the construction of this very plant that the honourable senator is now criticizing.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Argue: You had two policies, that's all.

Senator Phillips: I am sure the honourable senator was aware of that commitment to the plant, but he probably forgot.

Senator Guay: The opposition was against it.

Senator Phillips: No. The only objection of the opposition, to be honest, Senator Guay, was that it was not enough. I admit to Senator Argue that there is room for questioning the amendment on top loading. I, too, questioned it, but I did so probably from a different perspective. He questioned whether it would allow the top-loading to continue. I questioned whether it would allow the provinces to negotiate with the federal government on the top-loading. So probably time will answer that question for most of us.

Senator Corbin raised the question of potatoes being covered under the legislation. I would remind him that I, too, have an interest in potato production. We in Prince Edward Island can compete with his province in that regard any time.

In the past potatoes have been covered a number of times under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, with the federal government providing all of the funding. That can continue. I was informed by the officials from the Stabilization Board that potatoes could be covered under a tripartite agreement.

However, I would also point out to the honourable senator that there is one difficulty, namely, that the stabilization program does not apply to exports, and much of the production in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are seed potatoes that are exported; and we have to be careful that we do not get into further problems in our American market if we attempt to provide stabilization payments in Canada.

I hope that answers the points raised by the two honourable senators, and again I commend the bill for speedy passage.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Corbin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Phillips: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Corbin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1985-86 (No. 2)

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-51, to provide borrowing authority.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-51 is the borrowing authority bill, which follows Bill C-11 which some honourable senators may remember.

My second reading speech on that particular bill was just as dry, mundane and technical as this one will be; but I certainly hope that it will not have the same emotional, political and social consequences that the previous dry dissertation provoked.

In any event, I will take honourable senators through the various mechanisms of this very necessary piece of legislation, in the hope that it will not have the effect that the last one did.

The timing of this bill is appropriate since the request for borrowing authority is directly related to the financial requirements set out in the budget.

Honourable senators are aware that in order for the government to increase its outstanding debt, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament. Specifically Part IV, section 36, of the act states that no money shall be borrowed or security issued on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament. This refers to new money only, because pursuant to section 38 the government has continuing authority to raise funds to repay maturing debt. While section 39 provides for short-term temporary borrowings, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament in order for the government to continue with its regular debt program to meet its financial requirements.

Thus the total amount of borrowing authority required for 1985-86 is the sum of the financial requirements for this year, plus the amount borrowed last fiscal year under section 39, which must be rolled over in 1985-86.

The financial requirements for 1985-86 were set out in the recent budget presented by the Minister of Finance. In his speech he stated that the government's estimated budgetary deficit for 1985-86 is $33.8 billion. Taking into account non-budgetary receipts of $5.7 billion, the government's financial requirements for 1985-86 are, therefore, $28 billion.

In light of those financial requirements for 1985-86, clause 2(1) of the bill seeks $18.2 billion of borrowing authority for this fiscal year. The major portion of this amount, namely, $16 billion, is composed of the difference between the 1985-86 financial requirements of $28 billion and the $12 billion of borrowing authority already granted under Bill C-11. To this sum must be added the $2.2 billion resulting from the use of section 39 of the Financial Administration Act, which was used in February. The use of that section was directly related to the delay in the passage of Bill C-11.

Honourable senators, it is with some trepidation that I note that Senator Stewart is now making notes.

Senator Steuart: I am writing a letter.

Senator Doody: Had the passage of Bill C-11 not been delayed last February, the $2.2 billion would have been charged to regular borrowing authority, and as the debt matured, borrowing authority would have been provided under section 38. Thus it would not have been necessary to seek the additional amount this fiscal year.

The use of section 39 also had the impact of lessening the use of section 38 borrowing authority during the last fiscal year. Thus $2.3 billion of regular borrowing authority was cancelled at the end of the 1984-85 fiscal year.

Let me assure honourable senators that the $2.2 billion requested in the current bill will not permit a further increase in the outstanding debt beyond the $28 billion financial requirements in this fiscal year. It simply permits borrowing to maintain the level of outstanding debt that was established by the use of section 39 in the previous fiscal year. I would note that it was essential to use section 39 last February. At that time the Canadian dollar was under downward pressure. Foreign exchange intervention caused a large run-off of U.S. dollar foreign exchange reserves. These U.S. dollar reserves had to be replaced by drawing on Canada standby credit facilities with the Canadian chartered banks and with the international banks.

Section 39 was also used to raise $200 million in the domestic capital market through the issue of Treasury bills. In addition, as I already mentioned, the equivalent of $2.2 billion was raised under section 39 in 1984-85. The government will have a total of $32.2 billion of borrowing authority for fiscal 1985-86 once this bill is passed. I can give honourable senators a breakdown on that figure if they require it.

Honourable senators, I would like to outline how the government has utilized the borrowing authority granted by Parliament for the 1984-85 fiscal year. The total amount of authority provided for 1984-85 was $31.9 billion—$24.6 billion provided by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85; and $7.3 billion provided by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85, (No. 2.) During the 1984-85 fiscal year, domestic borrowing operations used about $26.7 billion of borrowing authority. Of this $10.4 billion was raised through the issue of Treasury bills, $12.5 billion through the sale of marketable bonds and $3.8 billion through the sale of Canada Savings Bonds.

Foreign borrowing added a further $9 billion to the use of borrowing authority. As a result of these financing operations, the total use of borrowing authority in the 1984-85 fiscal year was $27.6 billion. If honourable senators would like a breakdown on the foreign borrowings, I can provide that for them. Of the borrowing authority in 1984-85 fiscal year $4.3 billion was unused at the end of March 31, 1985. Of that amount $2 billion was carried forward as a regular contingency and the balance of $2.3 billion was cancelled, as is required.

In conclusion, I ask honourable senators to support the bill on second reading. As honourable senators are aware, this government has an ongoing debt program. Honourable senators opposite should be more aware of that than we are. In order to achieve the government's goal of minimizing public debt charges, it is important that sufficient borrowing authority shall always be in place. I commend the borrowing bill and ask for speedy passage in the Senate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I recall very well the speech which the Deputy Leader made in introducing Bill C-11. I assure him it was not the power of his oratory that caused the episode associated with Bill C-11 but the defects which surrounded the introduction of that bill. It is because those defects are absent in the bill presented tonight that there will be no reaction similar to the one which surrounded Bill C-11. I must say that having lived through that stormy period in the Senate and having reflected upon the aftermath of that particular episode, if confronted with the same situation in the future, I would have no hesitation in recommending to my colleagues that we do precisely what was done on that occasion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: My confidence in that approach was supported by the action of the Conservative senators in the National Finance Committee who almost unanimously made a recommendation to the effect that in the future the Senate should remain reluctant to grant borrowing authority in the circumstances which prevailed at that time. When all the rhetoric and excitement vanishes and when everybody looks at that event more dispassionately, I think that they will agree that recommendation of the National Finance Committee supported by the Conservative members captured the real essence of the issue that was raised by myself and other Liberal senators. In any event, we live with our actions. There is no point now in rehashing them at any great length.

The Minister of Finance has assured the National Finance Committee that he will not be returning to Parliament for further borrowing authority for this current fiscal year. The Minister of Finance has stated that he has come the second time and that he will not come again for the current fiscal year. Therefore, we will not have a further borrowing bill for the current fiscal year. In this bill Parliament is being asked to authorize the borrowing of an additional $18.2 billion. Of course, that is, as Senator Doody has pointed out, in addition to the $12 billion authorized in Bill C-11.

Senator Balfour: We have to pay the bills.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator MacEachen: The Minister of Finance in introducing Bill C-51 in the House of Commons referred to the cost of the delay in passing Bill C-11. I believe that some of his comments made in the other place deserve reply here. He said, "The cost of the delay by Liberal senators in the other place was quite significant." If I were recording the event, I would say that the intransigence of the Minister of Finance and his refusal to accept reasonable proposals by the Liberal opposition was the source of the cost.

Senator Sinclair: There was no cost.

Senator MacEachen: Indeed, if any cost existed. The minister went on to say, "We may never know the total indirect costs arising from the confusion and uncertainty which resulted from these delays." I do not know exactly what he has in mind by "indirect costs." He went on to say, "However, we have been able to identify very clearly and precisely the amount of money that that did cost us. It amounted to $15 million."

Senator Balfour: Shame.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, we remain quite unconvinced. The Minister of Finance has not yet produced the evidence. The clarity and precision used by the Minister of Finance to assert his position in the House of Commons was replaced with rather different assertions in the National Finance Committee. The official accompanying the Minister of Finance told the committee that it was an estimate that was made, and he went on to add, "One can always argue that there are different ways of making estimates."

So much for clarity and precision. Then, when pressed for further details, the minister said:

● (2200)

If you wish the details of the calculation, we can get those for you.

Senator Kirby then said:

I agree with that.

Honourable senators, I am not aware that these details have been made available yet to the members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, but I think it is worth mentioning the comment that was made in committee by Senator Kirby, which was:

It seems to me that the minister, if not tonight, certainly on other occasions, has made the argument that there was a $15 million cost incurred because he was required to borrow later rather than earlier, since the borrowing bill has been tied up.

He went on to say:

... if we look at the history of interest rates over the past several weeks, which have been dropping, the replacement fund will be borrowed at a lower interest rate than the government would have had to pay had it borrowed the money when it originally hoped to do so back in February. If that is the case, it seems to me that one must deduct from the so-called cost of $15 million the savings that result from the lower borrowings.

That was an important statement put on the record by Senator Kirby.

All I want to say at the moment is that the allegation of any cost is still unproven.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, we remain skeptical today, as we were then, and we await with interest the various ways in which estimates can be made, as the official candidly admitted before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Honourable senators, in introducing in the other place the bill which is now before us, the Minister of Finance took the opportunity, once again, to indulge himself in the rhetoric which has characterized his statements since November last and which was resplendently in evidence in his budget speech of May 23. I must say that the exhilaration which was apparently evident in the House of Commons among the Conservatives on May 23 has now totally dissipated. Today was the day of reckoning, when the Minister of Finance had to make his first major revision in what will be demonstrated to be a flawed budgetary document.

Senator Balfour: You are an expert on that.

Senator MacEachen: The Minister of Finance said a short time ago in introducing this particular bill in the House of Commons, that these problems are a bit of a vicious circle because high deficits can strain our abilities to deal with the job problem, and high employment, in return, reinforces the very high deficit. That is, of course, part of the fundamental ideology and rhetoric of the Minister of Finance and the government, and it is a theme to which I wish to return in some detail before I complete my statement.

The minister then goes on to say that the budget itself does propose some realistic, fair and effective actions to break this vicious circle. The leader of the Liberal Party, the night of the budget, said that it was unfair, and today the government acknowledged that in one major area the budget was unfair. The government moved to withdraw totally de-indexation of social security benefits applied to the aged.

Honourable senators, I was not in Canada when the budget was presented, and I regret that. I was absent because I was a member of the parliamentary delegation which the Speaker of the Senate led to the Federal Republic of Germany. On the night of the budget we were in Bonn, in one of the hotels there which had been "cased," prior to the Bonn Summit, by the staff of the Prime Minister and found to be unsuitable for prime ministerial repose. However, the parliamentary delegation led by His Honour reposed at this particular hotel, which I recall as the Steingenberger Hotel. Quite apart from the fact that it was unsuitable for the Prime Minister, I won't forget it because it was in that hotel, on the Friday morning, that I read the budget documents.

It was a dismal morning, indeed, especially when I read the declaration of the Minister of Finance relating to the treatment of the economic problems of the Island of Cape Breton. That really was a blow. So the Steingenberger Hotel will always remain in my mind as a rather unpleasant place to be, because you get rather bad news there.

I read the budget documents that day, and I have never read budget documents more carefully, because I had them on the airplane on my return journey and I was able to study them very carefully. When I got back to Canada, however, I immediately picked up the newspapers upon arrival and got to the first Canadian interpretation of the Wilson budget of May 23.

The first newspaper I picked up had the following headline: "Gasoline, Smokes, Drinks, Personal-income bite, you name it". "Taxes up, up, up as budget hits the ordinary Canadians hard." Further down the same page of that newspaper was a story entitled, "Budget hits poor, consumer groups say." Then, "Surtax cuts top budget highlights." I then turned the page of that newspaper and read, "Budget hurts poor, consumer groups say." Further on, I read: "Shoppers slam tax on pet foods and toothpaste;" then, "Civil service to shrink by 15,000 jobs over six years;" then, "Economy to grow 3.1 per cent but little relief for unemployed." I read another headline from the same newspaper which stated, and I point out that this was not from the Liberal opposition: "Unless you earn $10,000 a year, you will shell out more for income tax." On the next page I read: "Taxes up, up, up as federal budget socks it to ordinary Canadians;" and then, "$2 billion a year cut sought in transfer payments." Further, it stated: "Tories leave out pension pledge for housewives."

Honourable senators, that was the first newspaper that I read and that was quite enough to get a flavour of the budget. I then took up another newspaper and it simply confirmed what I had read in the first one. It said: "Ottawa increases the tax load. Budget boosts income taxes." That was my introduction to the budget as I read the Canadian newspapers on my arrival in Canada. Of course, the interpretation of those headlines is now widely known among the Canadian people, and the first evidence of their dissatisfaction was the reaction of the senior citizens, who, in the past month, have conducted the campaign which resulted in the return to full indexation of their pension benefits.

● (2210)

Honourable senators, what is perfectly clear, and what was clear then, is that the government did not receive from the Canadian people a mandate to increase massively the tax burden. Not only did the government not have any such mandate from the public but it also concealed very carefully from the public its intention in this direction. So much for consultation! What is the point and purpose of talking about consultation when you delete from the consultation process the most important items of public policy? That is exactly what happened. In fact, the Minister of Finance gave the opposite signals with respect to proposed tax increases because on November 8 he made it very clear in his economic statement that tax increases were not on his mind. His exact words were "Our immediate goal is to reduce the deficit through expenditure reductions and not through major tax increases." But we have had major tax increases. And the pledge made in November was again repeated by the Minister of Finance in an interview which he gave on Question Period in March, and once again he repeated the view that tax increases were out because they would serve to dampen demand.

That was not the only pledge broken by the Minister of Finance because the government also broke a major former commitment by its action to abolish the full indexation not only of the family allowances and old age security payments but also the abolition of the full indexation of the tax system. I know the position which was taken by the Conservative Party on indexation. One spokesman after another urged every Liberal Minister of Finance since Mr. Turner to keep intact the full indexation of the tax system. We know how fiercely the Conservative Party opposed even a suggestion that full indexation might be tampered with. In fact, a former leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Stanfield, was always held up as the person who first suggested indexation, and we were told constantly by his Tory friends that it was a feather in Mr. Stanfield's cap that we had indexation of the tax system, that it had been borrowed from Mr. Stanfield by Mr. Turner. They said, "You Liberals don't dare tamper with that great Tory idea."

Senator Balfour: What nonsense!

Senator MacEachen: That is the truth and Senator Balfour knows it. I know it and anyone who reads the modern political history of Canada knows it. On that point the Conservative Party retreated and broke a pledge which it made so frequently and so fiercely in the House of Commons and elsewhere. And the Tories ran ads. They ran ads in the newspapers creating bogus fears that the Minister of Finance of the day was intent on tampering with the indexation of the tax system. Well, it has happened and not only the de-indexation of the tax system partially but also family allowances and old age security. The whole structure of inflation protection has been eroded.

We were told in the Senate earlier that it would be improper for honourable senators to think of tampering with Investment Canada because it was sacred. Why was it sacred? Because the government had received a direct mandate from the people of Canada to implement Investment Canada. Would anyone say that an enjoinder of that kind would have the slightest validity in the case of the elimination of full indexation? Because the public were not told of the intentions of the government, they were not consulted about it, and it came as a bolt from the blue shattering the trust that the people of Canada had placed in the new government.

That is the first point that I have to make about the budget. Why have you broken all of your pledges or so many basic pledges without having consulted with or given any intimation to the people of Canada that you intended to do that?

I want to make another point about this budget, and I hope that some honourable senators opposite will attempt to prove me wrong. I make the statement that the budget itself offers no solution to the leading problem of the Canadian economy, namely, unemployment.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The Minister of Finance states, and I quote him, and I agree with him: "Our priority goal is jobs for Canadians." The budget does not offer new jobs for Canadians. In fact, when its impact on the economy is fully felt, the budget impact will be fewer jobs in the Canadian economy. You cannot take $4 billion plus out of the Canadian economy and expect to create additional jobs. The budget itself lacks internal logic and consistency. The link between the fiscal plan and the performance of the economy exists only in ministerial rhetoric and in what I consider to be the rather contrived draftsmanship of the budget papers.

The views of the Minister of Finance on the problems of the economy are clearly set out in this budget and earlier last November. In November in "A New Direction for Canada," he stated: "The growing public debt has become a severe handicap to economic progress and the most serious obstacle to economic growth." He reiterated that view in his budget speech of May 23 in these words "High deficits constrain our ability to promote growth and create jobs." The view of the minister is clear. One might say that the obsession of the minister is clear. Deficit reduction will lead to more jobs, more real output and more growth. The Minister of Finance says: "Clear away the obstacle of fiscal deficits and the economy will flourish."

Driven by a confident belief in this single theorem, dominated, as it were, by his own personal and one-dimensional obsession, the Minister of Finance like an untrained woodsman with a sharp axe is chopping blindly and cutting everything in sight—cutting, cutting, cutting and adding to the tax burden at the same time. Out of that, honourable senators, he claims, will come economic growth and more jobs.

One is tempted to say to the Minister of Finance "Think again." Consider the experience of the Government of the United Kingdom which also made it an obsession to cut, cut and cut. Today the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom is faced not with declining unemployment but with rising unemployment. She wanted declining unemployment, now she is faced with rising unemployment. Why is that? One must say that an economic policy putting forth deficit reduction as the single obsession and putting that in the window as the main objective has been implemented in the United Kingdom, but the results expected have not yet been achieved; the opposite results have been achieved. Mrs. Thatcher now confesses that she is mystified and disappointed. "I am mystified and disappointed," said the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom is now prepared to admit that possibly she and her government may have missed something. She said recently, referring to the budget given in the spring by her Minister of Finance, "We have to await the effects of this last budget."

● (2220)

That is about the fifth budget of the Conservative government. "We have to await the effects of this last budget, and as you know, any budget takes 12 or 18 months to work its way through the economy," says Mrs. Thatcher. "If we don't get the results we want, we will have to take another look." That is what Mrs. Thatcher is faced with.

What has the Minister of Finance missed? What he has missed is very simple; he has missed the conclusion staring at him out of his own budget papers, that you may ameliorate the fiscal problem without any significant amelioration of the unemployment problem. You may solve the fiscal problem—and let me tell you, honourable senators, I think that that problem ought to be addressed—but there is no necessary conclusion that you will solve the unemployment or the economic problem.

Let me put a few thoughts before you and examine whether there is any logic in them. The minister has laid before us his plan for deficit reduction. For last year the deficit is to be just under $36 billion, as Senator Doody has stated, or as one can derive from what he has stated. This year the deficit is to be $33.8 billion; the following year it is to be $32.7 billion.

Please observe, honourable senators, that in spite of what the Minister of Finance has described as an "unacceptable deficit," a "dreadful inheritance from the Liberal Party," a "bloated deficit," the economic growth in Canada in 1984 was an impressive 4.7 per cent. A big deficit with substantial and impressive economic growth for 1984.

For this year, despite the reduction in the deficit, growth will be less than it was in 1984; growth will be 3.1 per cent. For 1986, with a further reduction in the deficit, growth will be approximately 2.5 per cent.

These are the figures that are revealed in the budget papers of the Minister of Finance. For these three years, there is at least one fact; as the deficit is reduced, so is the rate of economic growth.

I am sure that many honourable senators are saying in their own mind that there must be something wrong because it was always thought that the solution to the economic problem lay in the reduction of the deficit which would in turn produce more growth. In 1984, with that dreadful Liberal deficit, there was 4.7 per cent growth. And the deficit comes down and so does economic growth. Of course, there is something wrong. What is wrong is that one can succeed in reducing the deficit; one can succeed in solving the fiscal problem without advancing to the goal of better economic growth and more jobs.

At the end of 1986, the Conservative government will have been in office for more than two full years. For that second full year the rate of growth will be almost one half less than it was in 1984. Why is it that if the constraint to job creation is the deficit, jobs and growth do not occur more rapidly as the deficit goes down?

I have mentioned the rate of growth in the economy; but what about unemployment? The reality is that, according to the minister's projections, after this government has been in office for more than two full years, after savage and senseless cuts, after—I was going to say after prime ministerial grandstanding at economic conferences and after endless photo opportunities—after all these two full years involving all these marvellous cuts and tax increases and a new tightening of the fiscal belt, the Minister of Finance is telling us that at the end of 1986 unemployment will be above the 10 per cent level. Why?

In April of this year there were approximately 1.4 million unemployed Canadians. By the end of 1986, after two full years of a new Conservative government, according to the Minister of Finance, with the intervening growth in the labour force, and at a 10.3 unemployment rate projected by the Minister of Finance for the end of 1986, the total number of unemployed will be 1,330,000 Canadians. At the end of 1986 we will still have, according to these documents, 1,330,000 unemployed.

Well, that is just a bit better than where we are now.

What is the point of a financial and economic policy that will produce little change in the number of unemployed at the end of 1986 in comparison to the number of unemployed today?

That is not all, honourable senators. Under one plausible scenario presented by the minister, unemployment will still be at 10 per cent, not only at the end of 1986, but at the end of the decade in 1990.

Why is the minister perpetuating a hoax on all of us by saying that what he is doing to reduce the deficit is bound to provide new growth and jobs? His own budget papers give that statement the lie.

I think there are a number of nagging questions that have to be asked. How is it possible from his ideological standpoint for the economy to have a growth rate of 4.6 per cent in 1984 in a close symbiotic relationship with that high and unacceptable deficit? The minister tells us that the new government created 200,000 new jobs. How is that possible side by side with this terrible deficit? How is it possible, in the light of the terrible overhanging deficit, that dreadful Liberal inheritance, to have that kind of economic growth? Perhaps he would explain to us why that is possible and why, as he reduces the deficit, the rate of economic growth in Canada declines. Perhaps he, or someone on his behalf, might explain to us why, despite his Herculean efforts, we end up with a 10.3 per cent unemployment rate at the end of 1986. And it is all in the budget papers.

● (2230)

Honourable senators, the fact of the matter is that in 1984 we had strong economic growth in spite of the deficit, brought about by a build-up of inventories and robust export growth. The deficit did not stop the growth because inventories were building up and we had a strong export market. These factors obviously swamped any adverse impact from the size of the deficit.

Why is this slowdown projected for 1986 despite the reduction of the deficit? Because the reduced deficit will not compensate for the slowdown in the United States' economy that is projected in the budget papers, and will not compensate for the continuing high real interest rates in the United States, which are also projected in the budget papers. I think the minister is on a very slippery slope indeed in putting so much reliance on his simple theorem, "Reduced deficits will, in themselves, produce economic growth."

I repeat: The fiscal problem has to be addressed on its own merits, but why hold out the hope that the pain surrounding deficit reduction is going to produce the jobs and growth we want in Canada? Of course, we want to know what will happen in this economy after 1986. The minister was quite categorical on this point in his economic statement of last November. He stated that over the second half of the decade, growth would increase an average of about 3.4 per cent while inflation would stay at or about 4 per cent for the remainder of the decade and that unemployment would remain unacceptably high—11 per cent through 1984 and then declining gradually to about 7 per cent by 1990. In November of 1984, the minister was saying that the 11 per cent unemployment rate would be reduced to 7 per cent by 1990.

In May, he is much less sanguine and much more tentative. He is no longer prepared to say that we will have a 7 per cent unemployment rate by 1990. He has made a very rapid retreat from that economic situation. In fact, he tells us quite clearly that what will happen to the Canadian economy after 1986 will depend principally on what happens in the United States.

In November, the Minister of Finance foresaw a budgetary action in the United States which would lead to lower real interest rates and better economic growth.

You may remember, honourable senators, that in my speech on that economic statement I drew attention to the very heavy reliance the minister was placing upon the movement of interest rates in the United States. In fact, in May, he recanted the position he took in November and is not now prepared to tell us that there will be a 7 per cent unemployment rate by 1990. In fact, so uncertain is he that, instead of a clearcut projection for the years beyond 1986, he has now asked us to choose amongst three plausible scenarios, each of which is dependent entirely upon what happens outside of Canada. The ranges of unemployment are from 7.3 per cent to 10 per cent. The minister makes it very clear in his document, "Canada's Economic Prospects 1985-90," tabled with the budget, that the course of the Canadian economy will depend not on what he does in his budget or in his next budget but on what happens in the United States. That is clearly stated. The following quotation, I think, is quite revealing. He said:

At the present time there is a high degree of uncertainty as to whether or not the United States will be able to achieve a reduction in the U.S. federal deficit sufficient to create the conditions that would allow for sustained economic growth over the medium term.

There is a high degree of uncertainty that the United States will take the policy measures that will lead to sustained growth over the medium term.

The minister then went on to state:

To reflect this uncertainty, three medium-term projections have been developed which differ in the degree to which necessary policy adjustments are assumed to be adopted in the United States over the medium term.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The minister, of course, has let the cat out of the bag. Whether we have 7 per cent unemployment or 10 per cent unemployment in Canada depends on what happens in the United States and not on what happens in the way of deficit reduction. That is all from the minister's own budget papers. It would have been much better for all of us if the minister had come clean and put this reality up front in his budget instead of putting it in documents carrying his own imprimatur, documents which not every citizen of the country reads but about which, if they read, they would say, "After 1986, the minister is telling us that what happens to unemployment in Canada depends entirely upon what happens in the United States."

Instead of doing that, the minister, in order to gain support for his massive tax increases and savage expenditure cuts, has made the premise that this "short-term pain", to use the expression of his predecessor, "will lead to long-term gain." A careful reading of the documents tabled by the minister reveals that what we are getting is short-term, medium-term and long-term pain. Again, that will be determined not by the extent of Canadian sacrifices but by the development of policy in the United States. That is the reality of the budget presentation.

When the minister states in his budget speech, "We have restored Canada-United States relations to the status worthy of two sovereign nations," he is obviously engaging in meaningless rhetoric because he has clearly demonstrated in his own series of plausible economic scenarios that for the years 1986 to 1990 sovereignty rests entirely with the United States and that what happens to the Canadian economy will depend on what happens in the United States. The policy options selected in the United States will determine the Canadian level of output, incomes and jobs. The policies of the Minister of Finance will have a secondary effect.

That is why I say that, despite the merits of controlling the deficit, it is a great mistake to put it in the context of economic growth and jobs. The facts argue greatly against that premise. The facts presented by the minister argue against it. After two full years, after what he regards as a Herculean effort to reduce the deficit, economic growth will be less in Canada in 1986 than it was in 1984; the number of unemployed at the end of 1986 will be only slightly less than the number of unemployed in Canada today.

The economic strategy advanced by the minister is bound to lead to frustration and disappointment. His economic views are uncertain and tentative. He told us in March that a tax increase would dampen aggregate demand. He told us that. But in May he introduced massive tax increases, to which he added additional amounts today.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the major revision of policy announced today by the government is the first step along the road of discovery yet to be travelled by this government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I am always more comfortable when applause comes at the end of a speech. While it might be comforting at the beginning, one hopes that it is deserved at the end.

We have listened, as one might have expected, to a very forceful and intriguing advocate in the person of the honourable gentleman who has just spoken, one who has filled the office of Minister of Finance and who is, therefore, more aware than most of the obstacles that a minister of finance faces and the difficulties he has in forecasting the future or in even deciding what the people will stand for at one particular moment in time.

While he has been eloquent in expressing to us his satisfaction that the government has made what he considers to be the first step in changing its fiscal policy with respect to the matter of old age pensions, I say to him that he is one who ought to know, because in his own career, particularly in the last budget that he was responsible for, he not only made the first step in retreating from his budget but the other 39 steps, bringing him right back to where he started from. So, he understands.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I want to be clear about that. It is easy for me to say this and to criticize the honourable gentleman. But I have some reason to know how difficult it is to be right in financial matters and how difficult it is to prepare a budget that people will applaud. It is almost impossible. He knows that very well; I know it well; and other people in this house are well acquainted with that fact, too.

He knows, for example, the problems inherent in forecasting. He has just given us a very lengthy analysis of the forecasts contained in the budget of my honourable friend, the Minister of Finance. He has told us something about forecasts. Well, if there is anyone in this house who should know the perils of forecasting, it is the honourable gentleman who has just spoken.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I think that the figures given by the Minister of Finance are excessively conservative with respect to what will happen in the years to come insofar as he has been bold enough—and I emphasize that word—to make any estimate as to what the future will bring. Excessively conservative. I expect it to be much better. My honourable friend was not excessively conservative in predicting what was in store for the period ahead when he was in office. As I have already told this chamber, in his budget of October 1980, he predicted a deficit for three or four years at about $12 billion, when in fact it turned out to be $32 billion.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Roblin: And he didn't do any better than that the second time he introduced a budget. On November 2, 1981, he predicted a deficit in 1985-86 of $10 billion, when, had not something been done about it by the present government, it would have been $38 billion.

So, you can see the perils of trying to forecast in the field of finance.

I am not saying this as a matter of criticism. How could he have known? Obviously, he couldn't have known. He had no idea. But he had to forecast, and he bravely did. But the consequences, the actual results that were apparent from those forecasts, were obviously unsatisfactory.

I have a hope—perhaps it is stronger than a hope—that the forecasts he has been quoting with respect to the present Minister of Finance will not be quite so unsatisfactory as his own record would indicate. But I do not want this thing to become an ad personam debate, because that never gets anybody anywhere; and I do not want anyone in this house to think that I am pointing a finger of accusation at my honourable friend because he was once Minister of Finance and made some mistakes. That is the lot of ministers of finance. And I am not saying that the present Minister of Finance is any different. He is going to make mistakes. He has made mistakes. We have admitted it today. So, let's be clear and let's be frank about that. I am only saying that one cannot build a sound policy on the kinds of arguments that my honourable friend has presented at some length to this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: One cannot build a sound policy on the basis of his arguments, and I am prepared to indicate why I think that is so. The main thrust of this budget is a combination. One of the principal factors is the question of the deficit: What to do about it?

As I said in the chamber the other day, why are we worried about the deficit? What is the reason the deficit is such a millstone around our necks, as some would have us believe? Why does the present Minister of Finance concern himself with the deficit, if all he had to do was to carry on the policies of my honourable friend and see it grow in an unlimited and uncontrollable fashion? What's the matter with a deficit?

One simple thing: the price of it. The price of the deficit is the interest that we pay. We paid 11 cents on the dollar to cover the interest bill from the tax money taken in from the people of this country in 1974. And what is it today? It is 34 cents on the dollar. Three times what it was in 1974.

Had we not had that threefold advance in the cost of the deficit per dollar taken in, what could we have done for the old age pensioners? Quite a lot. What could we have done for the employment stimulation that my honourable friend talks about? Quite a lot.

But that is not the case that we are facing. The case we are facing is one where we have an interest cost which must be brought under control.

Is there a member of this chamber who denies that statement? Can the honourable gentleman who has just spoken get up and tell me that I am wrong and that we have no obligation and no concern to bring the interest cost per dollar of taxes taken from our people down from the level of 34 cents, when we consider the economic state of the finances of the country and the needs of our people?

No one can contradict that argument. I defy anyone to contradict that argument.

All right. What do you do about it? You tax. That's right. You alter your services; you reduce your services. That's right. You call for sacrifices. That's right.

All of those things are in this budget. But in moderation. Nothing to excess. There is moderation in this budget in terms of its tax implications and in terms of the other factors that it affects. There is moderation in this budget. It could be a lot different. How different?

Well, the Leader of the Opposition, during the election campaign, said something about reducing the deficit by $9 billion. That is certainly not being done in this budget. But $9 billion was the target that he set for himself.

Well, I notice we have not heard very much from him recently as to how that would be achieved. But that is what he set for himself—a reduction of $9 billion.

We are more modest. We have not reduced our deficit by that amount—and we do not think we should. And the reason is clear. Because you want to be sure that those adverse effects of government economy and of higher taxes are not so excessive that they interfere with the economic growth of the country. I do not think that that has happened as a result of this budget, and I intend to give some information as to why I think that that is the case.

Let me deal with the second question that worries me about the deficit. If I follow the logic of my honourable friend, he is telling us that while he has some concern about deficits—which he is not, apparently, willing to quantify in any way—while he has a concern about deficits, what he is really saying to us is that we need more of the same.

What is the alternative to the policy the government has adopted of reducing the deficit? Why, to let it go up.

The alternative is to let it go up. And what would that do for us? It would help the unemployment situation. That was the logic of his argument. The logic of his argument was to go back to the policy that we had in which deficits were regarded as certainly not the principal concern of a Minister of Finance, or even a very important one, I suppose, because deficits will go up and the unemployment will go down at the same time.

● (2250)

Is that the experience of what happened? Is that what actually took place in the last ten years, when we have seen this increase in the deficit? Did the unemployment go down while the deficit was going up? No, it did not. It also went up, so we had the effect of a higher deficit and higher unemployment at the same time.

Senator Walker: And higher inflation.

Senator Roblin: Somebody says “and higher inflation.” I am not altogether sure that I agree with all of that.

One must be very careful, because I do not think that there is a person in this whole wide world who really knows, in a positive, emphatic sense, what we ought to do in our difficulties. We must agree that there are different ways of looking at this thing, and I am not so dogmatic as to say that only my friends and I know what the right answers are, because I think that they are struggling with this problem, the same as my honourable friend would be if he were in my position this evening, or even in the other place. Let's be frank about that. Let's indicate that, in some parts of the world, we have seen the problems of the deficits and unemployment operating in one way, and in some other parts of the world in another. We know our own experience, and that is all we have any control over. Here we see that rising deficits have not meant lower unemployment. They have meant unemployment, in fact, moving up with the deficit.

It might be argued that there are so many other factors in this mix that it is difficult to nail it down the way some of us would like to do. You must relate what is going on with the deficit and what is going on with unemployment with the economic trends throughout the world. That is a fact, and I would not be so foolish as to deny it, or so foolish as to deny that our economic situation in this country is gravely affected by the international situation; not just in the United States but everywhere. These are facts of life.

Therefore I do not come to this chamber saying that the budget of my honourable friend, the Minister of Finance, or my views on finance, represent the last word, or that we know it all, or that the solution is there. What I put to you is very simply this: We have tried the increasing deficit route; we have tried it and it has not produced what we hoped it would produce in the form of lower unemployment. It has not produced it at all. So our alternative, logically, is to carry on with what we were doing, which does not seem to be getting us anywhere, or to try something new, which is a very modest something new, let me tell you, because we are not crushing this deficit by a reduction of $9 billion, as was advertised by the Leader of the Liberal Party. We are much more cautious than that.

What we are trying to do is, first of all, stabilize the deficit; to bring it to a halt; to check it so that that interest cost to which I referred will gradually come under control. Then, if we can, to reduce it as the economy permits us to do so. I think that is a very important thing, to get hold of our deficit and get hold of our interest costs. I am a simple man. I do not understand many of the complicated arguments I just listened to, and I am frank to say so. Perhaps I will be criticized because I do not understand them well enough, but I am a simple man and I know if I do not get control over that interest charge that this country must pay, then the services I want to give the people will not be available; they will not be paid for; the money will not be there.

Therefore, if you take any kind of a long-range view on this thing, you must say: Get a hold on that interest cost, so that it becomes less of a proportionate burden. I do not think it will ever come down in terms of dollars, but in terms of percentage and proportion and ratio of the cost per dollar of tax money we take from our people, the burden of interest payments will start, first of all, to hold steady at 34 per cent, which it is right now, and then gradually decline. If we can do that, then perhaps we will have made some progress in bringing our national finances into some form of balance.

I would like to say a brief word about what has been happening recently in respect of our economy, because there have been hopeful signs. There have been signs that make us think we may be getting somewhere. Whether the government is to get all of the credit for it or not is a question I do not ask because, as I said before in this chamber, there are more factors than government at work and I am the first to admit it. However, I am saying to you that we were told last November, when we first heard from Mr. Wilson, and when he was cutting expenses quite drastically, that that measure would result in a loss of employment in the country. Perhaps that is what was thought; I do not know, but I know that the number of jobs went up. I also know that this spring, during the months of April and May, the number of jobs went up and they went up the highest amount in those two months than at any time within the last 12 years. If you take a look at the figures on employment for youth or employment for women or for any category of the population that we are particularly concerned about, some significant strides have been made. In fact, the total unemployment figure has improved considerably. It has gone down, roughly speaking, from 11 per cent to 10 per cent, which is 10 per cent of the grand total. This is a decided improvement. It is an improvement of several hundred thousand jobs that have been developed in the country during that time.

With respect to interest rates, we do not control them but we have something to say about them. The Bank of Canada is not entirely helpless on interest rates, although I will admit the dominant influence of the United States. We can look at an inflation rate that is holding steady; we can look at interest rates that are down three whole points within the last few months, which certainly must be a help to our economy, whatever the source of that decline. I claim no particular credit for all of it. Perhaps a little credit is due to the Bank of Canada.

When you look at the economic factors and when you look at the growth and you look at the unemployment situation, most of all you look at what the economic players, as I call them, are thinking as they look at the scene. It seems to me they are looking at a scene where they think there will be some improvement. I think there is a little more hope out there than there was before, and if there is a little more hope out there, then I am inclined to think that these estimates that tell us that more money will be spent in investment, in capital goods or in any other way in which money can be put to work, might lead one to believe that we may be able to make more progress than was previously thought possible.

Let me sum up; I have spoken too long. My needs are very simple. I just want to get that interest rate down as a proportion of the dollar we take from our taxpayers. It must be done if we are to free up the public resources so that the people can use them. That is the very fundamental point. That means you must take a stand on the deficit and it means you must take a stand on the whole fiscal program for which the government is responsible. That is what we have tried to do.

Have we done it right? Of course we have not done it perfectly right, and we have had to say so today. We had to say that, with respect to unemployment and with respect to the indexing of old age pensions, the policy proposed is not one that the people of Canada are willing to support. I think it only makes sense that, when you get yourself into a situation like that, you simply face the music and say, "If that is the case, then we will change it." Therefore we have changed it, and a lot of people will be critical of us; a lot of people will be happy. I only hope that we have done the right thing, and I believe we have. If there are areas where further consideration indicates—at least to me—that we ought to do something differently from the way we intended to do things and that we must make a change, I will be no more ashamed of it, and I will be no more reluctant to do it than my honourable friend was when he had to make changes.

As I say, ad personam arguments are out of this thing. We are all in it together. Criticism is fair. I liked my honourable friend's speech tonight. It was an eloquent, able, well prepared presentation. I salute it; I think that the logic behind it is faulty, from my point of view, but I am quite willing and prepared to agree that there should be a reasonable opportunity in the house to debate the economic issues of the country. I believe that, over time, the policies that are being espoused in the present budget will, on the whole, prove themselves to be worth pursuing and, on the whole, will lead to the economic growth and development of our country and, on the whole, give us the funds we need to improve the services that we give our citizens. And if that can be said of any budget, then I believe it will have served its purpose.

• (2300)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I listened with interest to the Leader of the Government, and I do not believe he has answered some of the questions raised by the leader of the majority in this house. He has not addressed the fact that the kind of policy he has been advocating, and that his government is advocating, has been tried in Britain and has failed signally. Cost-cutting and obsession with the deficit in Britain has produced an increase in unemployment, an increase in misery, a retreat in civility, and a destruction of the social peace.

There are other examples. The United States has shown much less concern with the deficit under President Reagan than the Mulroney government is showing, and certainly a lot less than Mrs. Thatcher.

Mr. Reagan talks like a "supply-sider," he talks like Milton Friedman, but acts like Mr. Keynes. He has gone in for stimulating the economy through public works, and to hell with the deficit.

Of course, he has planted missiles instead of trees—but it is the same thing in economic terms. In any case, Mr. Reagan did say on one occasion that he felt that trees were dangerous. They produced carbon dioxide, he said, which was polluting.

The Leader of the Government said that he wants to reduce the ratio in connection with our economy, our GNP, and government revenue, to pay off the interest on the deficit.

There are several ways of doing that, and the very best has been advocated by a minister of the Crown serving in this government, namely, Mr. Sinclair Stevens—and that is growth; and growth means that there will be a reward out there for investment, a reward due to the fact that the investor knows that there is a demand for a product. He will then invest to produce it.

But the measures that this government has taken are cutting demand. People will be buying fewer things, and if they buy fewer things, which businessman in his right mind is going to buy more equipment or activate more of his idle equipment in order to produce these "more things"? Therefore he will not hire back people who are now unemployed. If they are not hired back, they are either on unemployment or welfare, and that increases the deficit and they do not pay taxes. There is that aspect of it.

This is an aspect that the Japanese have understood very clearly, and what they do is to forget about the deficit or the national debt—and theirs is higher than ours. They worry about stimulating full employment.

There are other questions that the government does not ask itself. If a national debt of X is bad, then a national debt of three and a half times X should be worse. Well, our national debt per capita today is three and a half times bigger than it was in 1939. Yet today every Canadian, after allowing for inflation, has three and a half times more disposable income after taxes than he had in 1939.

How can that be—a larger national debt, yet we are better off? How can it be that in 1939, when the national debt was three and a half times smaller, only 5 per cent of our young people could get to university compared to 22 per cent now? We did not have a health service then, but we do have one now.

Only 42 per cent of our homes then had interior plumbing. It is now 92 per cent.

The national debt, the deficit, has grown, but the welfare of the country has also grown. Japan has a higher deficit than we do, a higher national debt than we do, yet they are better off, and they are growing. There are other ways of looking at things rather than the Thatcher way.

This is what our leader, the leader of the majority in this house, was trying to convey. He was very generous and very nice—much nicer than I am inclined to be—and he did not mention the fact that there is one thing that galls, and it is one of the reasons why there has been so much criticism in the press, and why some of us feel rather indignant about what has been presented in this budget. That is the sanctimoniousness of all the statements that we have heard; the fact that promises were made to people who can ill afford to have such promises broken, such as the elderly; all those sacred trusts that have been flying around, and the lecturing to which the country has been subjected—the lecturing about somehow we now have right thinking, prudent, frugal people who somehow are going to correct everything by cutting jobs and by cutting unemployment at the same time; by stimulating investment, but also stimulating saving; by doing contradictory things in a budget that contradicts itself and seems to represent the basic contradiction in the party which is now governing, which calls itself, by an antimony, Progressive Conservative—an antimony that does not make sense, as this budget doesn't.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-44, to amend the Western Grain Transportation Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-44 amends the Western Grain Transportation Act. This legislation represents a commitment to protect grain producers against sharp increases in freight rates, to remove the 31.5 million-tonne volume cap, to make railways more accountable to producers, to provide a more stable, predictable and rapid means, a more simplified means, of setting rates, and to enshrine the government's commitment to branch line rehabilitation. It is meant to provide producers with a stronger voice in grain transportation. The Western Grain Transportation Act was passed in 1983, two years ago. It replaced the historic Crowsnest Pass freight rate under which farmers paid an unchanging rate with a new rate setting formula, including a $658.6 million annual payment.

● (2310)

The producer's rate per tonne has risen from an average of $4.85 on August 1, 1983 to $5.74 on January 1, 1984 and to $7.70 on August 1, 1984. This represents a 58 per cent increase in one year and, indeed, it set a further price-cost squeeze on the economically embattled farming community in Western Canada and brought them fear of even higher rates.

In substance this is what the amendments to the act do. The first one is to set a rate ceiling. The freight rate ceiling is established to ensure that a producer's rate will not exceed the 1984-85 average of $7.70 per tonne in the next two crop years. If freight rates are set at a higher level than this by the Canadian Transport Commission, the railways of Canada will be required to absorb the difference. Although this ceiling is set, no floor has been set. This ceiling will not stop the announced decline this year to an average of about $6 per tonne in August.

The second of these amendments also provides, as does the first one, a degree of stability and predictability. This legislation will remove the 31.5 million tonne volume cap and it will protect producers against dramatic year-to-year fluctuations in their share of the freight rates through the introduction of what is referred to as a tally adjustment mechanism. This has been recommended by the Senior Grain Transportation Committee. At present, the Crow benefit is paid by the government only on the first 31.5 million tonnes with producers paying the full transportation cost beyond this volume cap. The result has been unstable rate systems that discourage increased production, as we have shown with the sudden rises in one year. This tally adjustment system will work to smooth out year-to-year fluctuations in freight rates.

The annual calculation will now be based on the extent to which the federal government has either over-paid or under-paid its share of the grain transportation costs. Any portion of the $658.6 million in annual benefit payments that is not utilized in one year may be utilized in future years. This is a rather complex formula.

Third, the Senior Grain Transportation Committee will be changed in its composition. The number of producer representatives elected to this committee will be increased to nine from four. There will now be two representatives from Alberta, two from Manitoba, four from Saskatchewan and, for the first time, one from British Columbia. British Columbia will now have the right to vote whoever they wish to have on this Senior Grain Transportation Committee. There will also be a representative on this committee for specialty crops such as peas, lentils, beans and so on, who previously was an observer and who will now become a full voting member. There has been a minor change in this, and I have included the latest insubstantive amendment, as those of you who were aware of the act as it was discussed at the Transport Committee meeting will notice. We must admit that this representation gives a stronger voice to producers on this committee which advises the minister.

Railway accountability is provided for by the amendments. This is an accountability to the clients and it is done because of the oligopoly that has been created in the situation of two major railway systems carrying all the grain. The railways will now be required to publish annual statements of their general investment plans for grain transportation. The onus will be on the railways to make their case before the CTC as to why any part of this information should not be made public. Previously, they were not obliged to do this. The railways will also be obliged to hold annual public meetings in each of the four western provinces to allow them to respond to concerns and suggestions raised by the producers. Finally, with regard to branch lines, in the past branch line rehabilitation has been a voluntary performance of the railways. Now, the government is committed to branch line rehabilitation and this will be statutorily included in the act, allowing the government to participate and formulate agreements with the railways and others to ensure the upkeep of branch lines.

I have been as brief as I can be because of the hour. I should point out that these amendments were brought to our attention in the Transport Committee meeting of about one week ago. The minister appeared. A great many questions were asked and I felt that they were answered to the satisfaction of the committee. I urge honourable senators to give second reading to this bill.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, in speaking to Bill C-44 I would first like to say that I support it and I hope that it will be given favourable consideration by the Senate. I support Bill C-44 in spite of the fact that the amendment putting a so-called freeze on the rate farmers will pay to ship grain during the crop years 1985-86 and 1986-87 is actually phoney window-dressing. The other changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act are generally beneficial and will be welcomed by farmers. Honourable senators will recall that when the original bill Bill C-155, the Western Grain Transportation Act, was before the other place and before the Senate many changes were proposed by the then official opposition, the Conservative Party. Because these amendments were not accepted they voted against the bill. For example, 14 specific objections were made to Bill C-155 by the Honourable Don Mazankowski, who is now the Minister of Transport and the author of this bill. Oddly enough, most of these objections have been ignored in Bill C-44.

I would also point out that during the last federal election campaign, many Conservative candidates in western Canada promised drastic changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act. Mr. Mulroney made a specific promise to freeze farmers' freight rates on grain at the 1983-84 level, as well as to remove the cap of 31.5 million tonnes on which the government would pay freight assistance on behalf of the farmers. However, before I go into details about the so-called rate freeze and the omissions from Bill C-44, I will cover those amendments which I believe will be welcomed by the grain growers of Canada.

Bill C-155 contained a volume cap of 31.5 million tonnes of grain shipped in any one crop year on which freight assistance would be paid. Under that bill, the farmers shipping grain are obliged to pay the full costs of shipping all grain in excess of 31.5 million tonnes in any crop year. The amendment proposed in this bill is an averaging arrangement which the government claims will have the effect of removing the 31.5 million tonne cap and replacing it with a tally adjustment mechanism. Simply stated, this is a new system for setting the rate where the increase in the volume over the cap in one crop year will be set against years when the cap is not reached. However welcome this move is to the grain growers, it does not remove the cap or the ceiling of 31.5 million tonnes a year.

Subclause 9(a) of Bill C-44 puts a limit of $150 million, plus or minus, as the outside limit within which annual adjustments can be made to compensate for large swings in the amount of grain shipped from year to year. These amendments pretend to remove the volume cap, a move which would be commendable although very costly to the government, but they do not remove the volume cap as was promised by the Conservatives in the election campaign. They simply create a new system for setting rates where the increase in volume over the cap in one year are set against the years when the cap is not reached. Granted, it will take out some of the violent swings, but it does not remove the cap. It is an improvement over what we have now, but when the $150 million limit is reached, the farmers will have to pay the difference. At $10 a tonne cost to the farmers, it will not take many years of high volumes to pass this $150 million limit.

To claim, as the government does, that Bill C-44 removes the cap is just not true, and the farmers will soon see through this misrepresentation. However, this change is a step in the right direction, and I hope that the government will go the rest of the way and fulfill its promise to remove the cap entirely so as to help farmers with their total grain shipments in every year.

Honourable senators, the addition of more farm representatives of the Senior Grain Transportation Committee is a good move and will be supported by farmers. As far as branch line rehabilitation agreements are concerned, they have been signed with the railroads completing the promised program. The full commitment has been kept. It is the present minister who has cut back the work to be done this year and moved the whole program back. Perhaps it is a good thing to put the commitment in the act. It will save the minister from future cuts by the Minister of Finance or the Deputy Prime Minister.

The requirement to have the railways make public the annual statements of their general investment plans for grain transportation is welcome and should make for better understanding between them and the shippers of grain, and, as well, allow farmers to monitor the progress being made in rail modernization.

These, then, are the amendments to the Western Grain Transportation Act contained in Bill C-44—some improvements, but a far cry from what we were promised.

Honourable senators, I will mention a few items that we expected to see in any amendments to the Western Grain Transportation Act and which are strangely absent from Bill C-44. I will first mention the method of paying the annual freight assistance. Honourable senators will remember the great debate as to whether it would be paid to the railways, direct to the farmers or a combination of both. The Tories in opposition, including Mr. Mazankowski, were for having all or part of it paid direct to the farmers.

I will not review the arguments, pro or con, of this question, but will just remind the Senate that there was no doubt that a Tory government would waste no time in making a change in this regard. In fact, Senator Balfour made an amendment to Bill C-155, which read as follows:

I therefore move . . . notwithstanding anything in this act, based upon the recommendations of the committee established under section 62(2) to examine the method of payment, the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the manner in which and the parties to whom payment of the government contribution, including the Crow benefit, shall be made.

What did this amendment mean? Well, simply put, it would give the government power to change the method of payment by regulation, without even waiting to see what the review committee recommended.

The minister said that we must wait for the review process as prescribed in the original act, but in 1983 the Tories could not wait. "Do it now" was their cry. In fact, Senator Balfour said, at that time and in this chamber, and I quote:

I submit to honourable senators that this alteration to the method of payment formula should be implemented without delay.

Senator Balfour went on to say, in effect, that corrective measures should be taken without delay before further economic distortions resulted from paying all of the money to the railways.

Honourable senators, I do not know whether he was speaking on behalf of his party at that time, but he was taking the same line as Mr. Mazankowski, the present Minister of Transport, who now says that we must wait for the review to take place next year before any change can be contemplated in the method of payment.

Senator Balfour: It is a personal point of view.

Senator Steuart: A personal point of view—well, it was the party point of view, as well, because I heard it on party platforms all over the west.

What a difference a year makes—or is it that the Tories have come to love the Western Grain Transportation Act they cursed so roundly and campaigned so hard against?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Phillips: Now, now, Davie.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, a further look at the Hansard of November 17, 1984, shows that Senator Nurgitz also got into the act. He introduced an amendment to Bill C-155 demanding that the Government of Canada return the so-called British Columbia coal lands to the Province of British Columbia. I have never heard of it since. I do not see anything in this bill referring to the B.C. coal lands and I cannot even find out if the Province of British Columbia has shown any interest.

It seems to have been part and parcel of the Conservative attack on every aspect of the Western Grain Transportation Act—an attack that was apparently motivated more by politics than by any real concern for the people of western Canada.

The proof of this would appear to be their acceptance of almost all of the act since becoming the government. The Conservative motto on the Western Grain Transportation Act seems to be: "Let's forgive and forget."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, there is one promise the Tory prime minister made that farmers will not forget, nor will they forgive him for breaking it. I refer to his promise to freeze the farmers' rates for moving grain at the 1983-84 level. The Conservatives now claim that Bill C-44 fulfills this promise. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The amendments in this bill provide for a freight rate ceiling for producers which will not exceed the 1984-85 rate level in the 1985-86 and 1986-87 crop years.

Hon. David Walker: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Steuart: Certainly.

Senator Walker: His Lordship has been waiting nearly two hours to enter this chamber. He then has to call in the House of Commons. Did the honourable senator not say, earlier, that he was in favour of this bill? If so, is it necessary that he finish his manuscript? Although I love to hear him speak—

Senator Steuart: If you were to sit down, Senator Walker, things would proceed more quickly. I am almost finished. If I were a Tory, I would not blame you for getting up and trying to stop me from telling the truth about this phoney piece of window dressing. If you don't mind, I will finish. As Joe Louis said, you can run but you can't hide.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: Where was I? The amendments in this bill provide for a freight rate ceiling for producers which will not exceed the 1984-85 rate level in the 1985-86 and 1986-87 crop years. This means that producers will not pay more than their existing rate, which currently averages $7.70 a tonne in the next two crop years.

● (2330)

Honourable senators, that is the Conservative government's rate freeze that they claim keeps their promise made to the farmers in 1984.

I remind you that the Tory commitment was to freeze rates at the 1983-84 level and not at the 1984-85 level which is 22 per cent higher than the previous year.

Senator Walker: No!

Senator Steuart: Yes, Senator Walker. The truth shall make them free and the farmers will know that. The rate was raised on August 1, 1984 a few weeks before the present government was elected—I admit that—raised under the Liberals. The present government was elected in September and had they intended to keep that promise, steps should have been taken to roll back the rates to the 1983-84 level, but they failed to act, so the rates increased by 20 per cent, costing western farmers more than $50 million.

Just listen to this, Senator Walker: What happened a few weeks ago was that the Honourable Don Mazankowski attempted to pull off a little sleight of hand. Obviously, he learned that the Canadian Transport Commission was about to announce the rates for the coming crop year, 1985-86, and that these would be 22 per cent lower than the rates for 1984-85. He rushed the bill into the house for first reading on April 26, 1985 because he knew that if he waited his so-called freeze would be exposed as the farce that it really is.

Senator Walker: Really!

Senator Steuart: Knowing the rates were being dropped, he brought in a bill stating that the rates for the next two years could not exceed the rates coming into effect August 1, 1985. He was also aware that because of our low grain stocks it is very unlikely that next year's rates will reach the high level of 1984-85, so this freeze will expire without providing any help to farmers or costing the Conservative government one cent. If they had frozen the rates at the 1983-84 levels, it would have meant something. Even if they had frozen the rates at the 1985-86 levels, it would have meant something. But by choosing the 1984-85 rates—the high point in the cycle—the minister is giving nothing to western farmers. His freeze is meaningless and the minister is trying to take credit for a rate reduction which occurred naturally under the act.

Honourable senators, let me point out that it was not just Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Mazankowski who made this commitment but in this chamber on November 17, 1983, Senator Asselin, who has now moved to higher planes, moved the following amendment to Bill C-155. He said then:

Honourable senators, because of the producers' current inability to pay what they would be called upon to pay by this legislation, and because the railway companies—

Note that, Senator Sinclair:

—do not need the extensive help at this time that the legislation before us would afford them, I move, seconded by Senator Macdonald, that clause 41 of Bill C-155 be amended as follows—

Then he mentioned a renumbering of a clause, but the intent of the amendment was:

Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the rate a railway company may charge a shipper for the movement of grain for the period January 1, 1984 to July 31, 1986 shall not exceed the existing rates in effect on August 1, 1983.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was a good amendment.

Senator Steuart: It was a good amendment and you believed in it then, and what happened to you on the way since then? You lost your faith, that's what happened.

Speaking for the Conservative Party, the senator demanded that the government freeze the rates as of January 1, 1984, right in the middle of the 1983-84 crop year, a rate under $6 a tonne freeze until July 31, 1986. That was a real freeze. It would have saved farmers many millions of dollars. I am sure it caused many of our poor western farmers to be fooled and they voted Conservative as a result of it in September 1984.

They were deceived. When they see this bill they will recognize it as a cynical, political trick and they will be outraged.

Honourable senators, I am afraid this is part of a pattern that is developing in regard to the handling of problems facing Canadian farmers by this Conservative government. There are heavy cuts in the budget of the Department of Agriculture, higher beef imports allowed into Canada hurting our national beef industry, American tariffs against Canadian pork with little or no help from the federal government and now broken promises to our grain farmers.

Despite its flaws and deception, I will support Bill C-44 because it does contain some small help for the farmers, and I hope that they will be able to encourage you to convince your cohorts on the other side to keep their promises and go the rest of the way.

Senator Walker: Hallelujah!

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am sure that we have all enjoyed the effective speech given by Senator Steuart. In my judgment there should have been an additional amendment to this bill. A presentation was made on behalf of the three prairie pools to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee asking for an amendment which, if agreed to, would have allowed the rules that apply to evidence being taken in a railway application for a variable rate to be maintained before the Western Grain Transportation Board. There was an application by the CNR in recent months to provide certain variable rates applying in Saskatoon and North Battleford. As I understand it, the rules of evidence in effect at that time were that the CNR had to justify this variable rate that went into effect as being of financial benefit to the CNR.

When they were challenged by the pools and others to produce evidence of their financial position, they refused and dropped the case. The pools felt that that rule should have been kept in place rather than being allowed to lapse, at least until the time the review was in with regard to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and that was a suggested amendment that I thought should have been in the act.

I believe that variable rates are something that are feared by small communities, by people along the branch lines and by producers who own their own elevator system. There are many good aspects to this bill. The window dressing that is there I think is pretty obvious, but for the record I wanted to mention that that was an amendment I would like to have seen in the bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: In light of the hour, we do not need to hear any more about grain. Once you start, you could go on for hours.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I am closing the debate with this remark: I am so pleased that Senator Steuart started out by saying that he supports the bill because when he got into the body of his remarks, I guessed that this was the most dastardly thing that had ever been perpetrated on the farmers of western Canada and, in fact, as we all know, it is a very good thing.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-61, to amend the Judges Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

● (2340)

He said: Honourable senators, I know that this bill is very close to your hearts and that you want me to go into great detail at this hour. Bill C-61 amends a number of statutes affecting the judiciary. It is designed to bring federal legislation into conformity with that of the provinces, and to make certain changes to the Federal Court of Canada, the Court Martial Appeal Court and the Pension Appeals Board.

First, the amendments affecting the Federal Court of Canada. This bill provides for an increase of one position for the Federal Court of Appeal and two positions for the Trial Division. In 1983, Parliament approved the addition of four judges at the Court of Appeal level and two judges at the Trial Division level. Those increases were in response to long-standing requests by the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice for more judges. Although the addition of these positions has brought about a marked improvement in the disposition of matters by the court, more judges are required, particularly judges instructed in the civil law, if the court is to maintain its present level of service to the people of Canada and is to keep abreast of its continuing heavy case-load.

Honourable senators, when the Federal Court of Canada was created in 1971, provision was made for at least four of the 12 judges of the court to be appointed from the bench or bar of the Province of Quebec, in order to ensure that the court had a sufficient number of judges with a civil law background. Since that time, the number of judges on the court has steadily increased. With the addition of these three positions, it will have more than doubled to 25. It is therefore appropriate to restore, as nearly as possible, the ratio which existed in 1971, by increasing the number of judges required to be appointed from the bench or bar of the Province of Quebec from four to eight. This will guarantee the court a sufficient number of judges to hear cases based on Quebec law, so as to permit these cases to be heard as expeditiously as those from other parts of the country.

Honourable senators, the amendments to the Judges Act are mostly of a technical nature. They provide salaries for the additional positions allocated to the Federal Court of Canada and for a total of 35 other positions already created or proposed under provincial law. Where provincial legislation is not yet in place, the bill provides for the provisions effecting these increases to come into force on proclamation, so as to permit the fullest co-ordination of effort between the federal and provincial governments.

Amendments are also contained in this bill which will amend the National Defence Act to bring the procedures of the Court Martial Appeal Court of Canada more in line with the operating practices of other appellate courts. The amendment will, in particular, permit the disposition of all matters short of an appeal to a single judge. At present, a panel of no less than three judges is required to hear any matter brought before the court.

Honourable senators, this bill will also authorize an increase from 10 to 12 in the number of members of the Pension Appeals Board. Board members are appointed by the Governor in Council from among the judges of the Federal Court, the provincial, superior, district and county courts. The board travels throughout the country and sits wherever the volume of cases justifies it. This increase, which has the support of the Canadian Judicial Council, will permit the board greater flexibility in scheduling hearings, and should permit better regional representation.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to you for second reading.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, since I cannot hope to emulate the flights of oratory of my honourable colleague, Senator Steuart, you will be happy to know that my remarks will be very brief.

As a member of the Senate, I feel somewhat responsible for at least part of the plethora of legislation, most notably the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which is now being challenged, examined and adjudicated upon in our courts of law.

We have heard that the courts are overburdened and our judges are overworked. Bill C-61 is designed to ease, at least to a certain extent, some of the strain and pain. This is one piece of legislation that our judges will welcome. I endorse it and recommend it to my colleagues for approval.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-63, to amend the House of Commons Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-63 amends the House of Commons Act. It essentially establishes a Committee on Internal Economy, very similar to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in the Senate. It is interesting to note that because, quite frequently, we hear that our Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is not operating that well.

However, the House of Commons has experienced some dissatisfaction with its management because the so-called backbenchers were not represented on the committee. This bill outlines the composition of the committee: The Speaker is the Chairman; the Deputy Speaker is a member; as well, two Privy Councillors are members; a representative of the Leader of the Opposition is a member; two backbenchers from the government side and the opposition side are also represented.

The bill was introduced this morning in the House of Commons, and there were two amendments made at that time. The first dealt with section 18 which had previously stated that, on dissolution of Parliament, every member of the Board of Internal Economy would continue in office until another member was appointed in his place. That has been amended to make it clear that the Speaker and Deputy Speaker shall be deemed to remain in office as such as if there were no dissolution. That continues the practice, honourable senators, of the Speaker continuing the administration as he formerly did.

• (2350)

The final amendment is to clause 2 which formerly stated that the act would come into force or be deemed to have come into force on September 9. The phrase, "deemed to have come into force," has been deleted. Clause 2 now states that the act shall come into force on September 9, 1985.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, since I graduated from the University of Hard Knocks during the dirty thirties and through life's ups and downs, I have learned a lot about people. During my 27½ years on the railroad as a brotherhood official, I met many employees in the various railway YMCAs where grievances were given a complete airing day in and day out. As the Honourable Senator Sinclair would know, the cinders would really fly.

This would give us the opportunity to visit the boss the next morning, and, through good communication, we were many times able to deliver the goods. The problems would be resolved before they got too hot to handle.

During my 16 years as an MP, I listened to the problems of thousands of residents in my riding. I listened; I acted; and, thus, I was able to help thousands of people.

In my opinion, the four additional members of the back-bench should have the opportunity to walk down the halls and go into the various rooms to listen to and talk with the employees. They should listen to their complaints and grievances and then act. That is what democracy is all about. If they listen and act before the smoke turns to flames, then they can avert a major blaze.

During my five years as Chief Government Whip, I constantly talked to employees, who were lined up outside my door, about grievances and complaints about the House of Commons. There appeared to be no one to listen to the complaints, no matter where they went. No answers were forthcoming. Naturally, this brought the request for a union to knock at the door of the House of Commons.

When Senator Sinclair, as president and chairman of CP, was negotiating rates of pay, he did not need to put anything in writing because he would act upon his decision. That was a sign of an honest, sincere, hardworking businessman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Turner: If his employees had grievances or complaints and they contacted the boss, they would never have to wait for an answer; it was given in short order.

The House of Commons officials appear to live in a different world. Many times they negotiate a contract with their employees, but seem to forget the increase in the cost of living and what their employees are going through. Therefore, dedicated, sincere employees, who have gone through long years of service for the House of Commons, are many times earning less money in terms of the increase in the cost of living. I believe this is wrong. This is not democracy. This is not the just society we all talk about.

If the new members on this board take time to listen to the employees and act on the many staffing problems in the House of Commons and in the Senate in a responsible way, many of the irritants could be eliminated and the staff morale would go up in short order. This would be democracy at work in Canada. Once again, the old saying in labour relations is appropriate: "You always get more with honey than you do with vinegar."

Honourable senators, I think Bill C-63 goes a long way and is a great step in the right direction.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I intended to pose a question to Senator Phillips when he terminated his speech, but, as Senator Turner rose faster than I did, I did not wish to interrupt him. Perhaps I may be allowed to put a brief question to Senator Phillips.

I believe the text of the bill is rather explicit, but I would like to hear from Senator Phillips some assurance that this legislation does not infringe in any way, shape or form on the rights and privileges of the Senate and the members of the Senate insofar as some of the facilities and the services on the Hill are shared. Can he give me that assurance?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Corbin, I see nothing in the bill to indicate any infringement on the rights and privileges of the Senate.

I presume the Board of Internal Economy will continue the work of the Internal Commissioners in the House of Commons and will not assume any other function than that formerly held and carried out by the Internal Commissioners.

I have asked for and received explanations on several clauses which I thought might affect the Senate. The explanations I have received from the legal authorities is that they have been transferred verbatim from the present act and inserted into this bill. Therefore, there should be no changes in the relationship between the two chambers.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Perhaps when Senator Phillips rises to close the debate he will deal with this question. I would refer to clause 1 of the bill, which would amend subsection 16(5). This is found at the top of page 3 of the bill. There it states:

The estimates referred to in subsections (1), (2) and (4) shall, on approval by the Board of Internal Economy, be transmitted by the Speaker to the President of the Treasury Board who shall lay them severally before the House of Commons with the estimates of the government for the fiscal year.

My question is: Does that parallel the provisions relative to the estimates of the Senate? Is it a statutory requirement that the Speaker of the Senate transmit the estimates of the Senate to the Treasury Board, which, in turn, is under statutory requirement to lay them severally before Parliament with the estimates of the government for the fiscal year? I realize that the estimates are tabled in the House of Commons.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in response to the question by Senator Stewart, I have to say that, yes, it is almost identical to the procedure followed in the Senate.

● (0000)

In the Senate the Speaker must present the estimates to Treasury Board. This clause authorizes the Speaker of the House of Commons to do the same thing, with the estimates then tabled in the House of Commons as opposed to the Senate.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the part of my question in which I am most interested relates to the statutory requirement that the President of the Treasury Board "shall lay them severally before the House of Commons with the estimates of the government for the fiscal year."

A distinction is made between the estimates of the House of Commons and the estimates of the government. There is a statutory requirement here which I interpret as meaning that the Treasury Board cannot then vary the amounts of the estimates brought forward from the House of Commons.

My question is: Can the Treasury Board vary the amounts of the estimates brought forward from the Senate?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I do not share that interpretation of that clause. Here we have a situation of two people not trained in law but interpreting it, each as he sees it.

I think the answer to Senator Stewart's question is that Treasury Board has final approval. There is a distinction between the estimates of the government and the estimates of the House of Commons. I have had the good fortune of hearing our former colleague, the Honourable Senator George McIlraith, explain that a number of times. But Treasury Board still must grant the money, the authority, to the House of Commons. Having done that, it then has no further control over that money.

The fact that the House of Commons asks for money does not mean that it is going to receive an unlimited amount from Treasury Board, any more than we in the Senate can expect similar treatment.

Senator Stewart: I do not wish to press the point, but can I assume that in giving this interpretation, the honourable senator is speaking for the government?

Senator Phillips: I would not make that assumption at all. I do not know anyone in government who would want me to speak on their behalf.

Senator Stewart: Then, we do not know what the bill means.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I certainly do not want to take up very much time, but I had in mind the same point as has been raised by Senator Stewart. If Senator Phillips is unable to provide a definite answer now, I think it is important that we have an answer as soon as possible.

There is provided for in this bill a method by which the estimates are prepared by the Clerk of the House of Commons and the Sergeant at Arms, each for his respective area. These estimates or proposed spendings then go to the Speaker, who signs them, and they are then presented to the Board of Internal Economy. The Board of Internal Economy is made up of two Privy Councillors, a nominee of the Leader of the Opposition or the Leader of the Opposition himself, and a number of private members. The fact that there are now to be four other members of the House of Commons appointed to the Board of Internal Economy is a new departure.

So, we understand the procedure up to the point that the Speaker signs the estimates and presents them to the Board of Internal Economy. I take it that at that point the board itself has the right to say "yes" or "no" to those estimates, or to vary them.

As I read it, it says "shall, on approval by the Board of Internal Economy . . ."; and then the next step is that the Speaker will transmit the result of the deliberations of the Board of Internal Economy to the President of the Treasury Board. This is where the delicate point is. Does the President of the Treasury Board and Treasury Board at that point have the right to say "yes" or "no" to the estimates, or to vary the estimates submitted by the Speaker, with the approval of the Board of Internal Economy?

I am wondering what the members of the House of Commons understand that to be. There will be no change in the present procedure if the President of the Treasury Board, speaking on behalf of the government, can say: "No, we think the amounts you have proposed are too much, and we are reducing them by thus and so."

My first reading was that the President of the Treasury Board was obliged, without any alteration, to put those estimates before Parliament. He would become a conduit. If that is the case, then it is an advance for the control by members of the House of Commons and a reduction in the authority of the executive. I want to know whether that is the case.

And if it is the case that now the Speaker of the House of Commons, with the support of the Board of Internal Economy, can put his estimates, with the President of the Treasury Board being only a conduit, can we be led to the view that the same treatment will be accorded to members of Parliament in the Senate; that is, that once we prepare our estimates and have them approved by the Internal Economy Committee and submitted by the Speaker, that Treasury Board will submit those also to Parliament?

I think it is a very important point. If members of the House of Commons have accepted the interpretation given by Senator Phillips, then I think they would want to reconsider the matter. But that is up to them. I would like to have clarification. They have passed the bill because it affects them. But if it means that once they have done all of their work through the Speaker and the Board of Internal Economy, the President of the Treasury Board can alter all of that and put in new estimates, then I think it is quite a different thing. I think we need clarification. If the honourable senator cannot give it now, then we would like a considered opinion from the minister who brought this bill into the House of Commons, that being the President of the Privy Council.

I would assert that the process applicable in the House of Commons should be applicable to the second house of Parliament and its members treated in precisely the same way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the interpretation developed by Senator MacEachen on the method of preparing the estimates and their progress through the Board of Internal Economy to the Treasury Board is correct. It is exactly the same method as that followed in the Senate, where the estimates are prepared, approved by the Internal Economy Committee, and then submitted to Treasury Board for approval. I have been a member of that committee for a number of years, and at no time have we assumed that the Senate would receive the exact amount of money asked for by the Senate. I do not believe, in the years that I have been a member of that committee, that we have had any great difficulty with Treasury Board. After all, the Treasury Board realizes that they, in turn, must come to Parliament for approval of a number of items, and I think that there has always been a certain spirit of co-operation.

I do not interpret the section as conveying any different authority to the House of Commons from that which it conveys to the Senate, but here again, neither Senator MacEachen nor myself is a lawyer, and even if we were, we probably would have to turn to a judge to get a proper interpretation. That is probably what I will do, that is, get a proper interpretation for it.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think that is a very important concession. Senator Phillips is now telling us that he cannot tell this chamber what that clause means. That being the case, I think Senator MacEachen's request for an authoritative clarification is very much in order, not because we wish to impose our views on the House of Commons but because, as Senator Phillips has said, there is a parallel between the treatment of the estimates of the House of Commons and the treatment of the estimates of the Senate.

It is all very well to say that there has always been co-operation and goodwill, but when you start using those words it is generally a clear signal that something will soon go wrong. I believe that when you are writing law, you ought to anticipate that what can go wrong will go wrong.

I think a clarification of the meaning of this clause would be most helpful.

Senator MacEachen: I know that it is irregular to speak twice on second reading. However, I suppose, to be totally regular, we should go into Committee of the Whole and then we could speak as frequently as we wished. I do not want to press that but I want to ask, how will we get the clarification? Must we wait until September, or will the Leader of the Government transmit a letter to me and to other members of the Senate, indicating the government's view as to this section. It is my view that if a literal interpretation is to be taken, when the President of the Treasury Board gets those estimates from the Speaker, he has no option but to lay them before the House of Commons. He cannot touch them. That is what it says to me. Please tell me if I am wrong in that belief.

Senator Phillips: I shall ask the President of the Privy Council to give us clarification and, either through my office or through the Internal Economy Committee, we will convey that information to those requesting it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator McElman: Provided we get the answers.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

• (0030)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I put the motion to adjourn, I would like to thank all of you on both sides of the house for being so generous and considerate of my weak attempt to carry out my job here. It has been a great pleasure for me and a learning experience. I hope that you will be tolerant when we return in September. Having said that, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, September 17, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to express some appreciation for the good wishes and the congratulatory remarks made by Senator Doody, who is presently acting as the Leader of the Government, to congratulate him on his excellent work in that capacity, and to assure him that we do not take his humility as a 100 per cent estimate of his self appreciation. I would ask him not to rely too heavily on a permanent attitude of goodwill from this side of the house.

Senator Doody: Hope springs eternal.

Senator MacEachen: Quite apart from that, I would certainly like to express to all members of the Senate on this side and on the other side best wishes for a good recess. I hope that we will return in September to lots of government business and to the plentitude that we have had over the past several days. If we had that kind of business in the early days of the sitting and over the course of the session it would certainly be a much more interesting place. I hope we can manage that when we return.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 17, 1985, at 2 p.m.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER

Thursday, June 27, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations made by Order in Council P.C. 1985-147, dated January 17, 1985, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, February 14, 1985, proceeded with that study and now presents the following interim report:

Your Committee has held 8 public meetings and has heard evidence from the Minister of Transport and officials from the Department of Transport, the Government of Saskatchewan, fire and police services and the private sector (see appendix). It has also received written briefs, including one from the Government of the Northwest Territories.

The subject-matter dealt with in the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations<sup>(1)</sup> (The Regulations) enacted pursuant to the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act<sup>(2)</sup> (the Act) is a complex one. The Government is empowered by the Act to make regulations on diverse aspects of dangerous goods, hence the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations, a 521-page document containing 88 pages of regulatory text and 433 pages of schedules and lists.

Certain parts of the Regulations came into force on January 23, 1985<sup>(3)</sup> and April 8, 1985.<sup>(4)</sup> Parts already in force are not regulatory in nature. In fact, the regulatory requirements as such contained in the Regulations are scheduled to come into force on July 1, 1985. Notwithstanding this, it cannot be said that they are "cast in stone", as they now stand. Two sets of proposed amendments have been published during the period your Committee was holding its hearings,<sup>(5)</sup> one of them containing 95 proposed modifications. Moreover, according to the testimony of Mr. John Monteith, Director, Regulatory Requirements, Department of Transport, Parts VI, VII and VIII are at this moment "skeletal parts".<sup>(6)</sup> Part XIV has yet to be published in the Canada Gazette Part I; this should be done in early 1986.<sup>(7)</sup>

Nevertheless, your Committee thinks it is necessary to report immediately on three points: first, the possible postponement of the date of implementation of the Regulations, which is scheduled to be July 1, 1985; second, the reciprocity of regulatory requirements between the U.S. and Canada; and third, the aspect of the enforcement of the Regulations.

With regard to the postponement of the coming into force of the Regulations, some organizations that appeared before your Committee were of the opinion that the implementation of the Regulations should be postponed. The suggested delay varies from two months to one year. Others said the date of July 1, 1985, was a suitable one. Your Committee was urged by some witnesses to support the coming into force of the Regulations on the scheduled date. Your Committee does not recommend that the date of the coming into force be changed. Many reasons directed this decision.

First of all, non-compliance will not be the rule. Evidence of this lies in the efforts deployed by the private sector to prepare. Second, fire and police services testified that the implementation of the Regulations will greatly assist in ensuring that public safety is enhanced. Finally, your Committee believes that the government is well aware of possible problems during the initial period of implementation. More specifically, your Committee draws attention to a statement made by the Minister of Transport before your Committee that "during this initial period, prosecutions will be placed only where there is very serious and flagrant non-compliance. Our feeling is that, since we are carving new ground here, we do not want to paralyse the industry. We want to be as firm as necessary, but fair as well".<sup>(8)</sup>

As to the second point, concerns were expressed by some witnesses that the implementation of the Regulations would bring a situation where American and Canadian regulatory requirements would differ. Those witnesses told your Committee that as a result of this, the traffic between the two countries could experience impediments that would restrict its current movement. This possible problem has been addressed by the proposed amendments published in the Canada Gazette Part I on May 31, 1985, and your Committee is confident that, when enacted, those amendments will constitute a proper response to the concerns of carriers in this respect.

The third point your Committee wishes to report on immediately has to do with enforcement personnel. This aspect of the subject-matter appears to be as yet at an exploratory level. Enforcement of the Regulations, not surprisingly, "... will be a fairly costly program..."<sup>(9)</sup> The government, your Committee has been told, has not made a firm decision so far as to how this program will be devised. Different alternatives to the creation of a "new bureaucracy" are being studied, including the use of fire and police emergency services, private security firms and other existing agencies. Also, agreements with the provinces have yet to be finalized. We are encouraged to learn that the federal government has reached a decision on its financial assistance for the enforcement program. Your Committee, noting that discussions with the province of Alberta involve issues of a constitutional nature, urges the federal government to pursue its negotiations. Needless to say that public safety, here again, will be enhanced when proper arrangements are made in this regard. Accordingly, your Committee recommends:

That the problem of enforcement personnel be given a very high priority.

Your Committee also takes note that a group made the suggestion that the Regulations be amended so that there would be a duty on truck operators and railway companies using water transportation services to disclose ahead of time to the master of the ship the contents of their cargoes. Your Committee would like to conduct a more in depth study of this and other points such as the relationship between the Regulations and statutes such as the Motor Vehicle Transport Act,<sup>(10)</sup> and the Canada Shipping Act,<sup>(11)</sup> particularly with regard to limitation of liability under this latter statute (sections 647-655). Your Committee also intends to give the second set of proposed amendments published in the Canada Gazette Part I on June 11, 1985, the close attention they require; none of the witnesses who appeared before us had a knowledge of the text of those proposed amendments.
